Mr. Chairman, this vote is a tough vote for the Members who are here present or those who are listening. The amendment, as I look at it, of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) is something that many of us fought very hard for during the committee hearing. We did it despite some pressure from people who were wondering if we are for or against apartheid, and that is not the case at all. It was a question of trying to keep the Export-Import Bank from, No. 1, being politicized for any reason and, No. 2, to leave where it is now the flexibility of the administration that they wanted upon which they have acted to stop direct loans, to limit insurance, and so forth, to 3 years. Since that time we fought hard against the Tsongas amendment. We have fought hard for 2½ hours here now for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS), an amendment which was a compromise amendment. I do know that Mr. TSONGAS certainly wanted to keep his original language in principle. The gentleman from Maryland wanted the principle of the Tsongas amendment, and we had principles on this side. We debated it for 2½ hours and came to the conclusion that the Evans amendment is in keeping with what the American industry is doing in South Africa. It is good, we hope, for those that it would aid and, therefore, we support the Evans amendment.

I would say, though, in all fairness that the administration supports the Ashbrook amendment. I think the gentleman should be shocked at that. I give him an opportunity to deny it, if he so desires.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman will yield, I do. I had no idea that in this isolated instance the Carter administration had shown some reformed reason.

Mr. STANTON. Maybe, then, the gentleman would in light of that withdraw his amendment.

Anyhow, they did write to me and say what they did want was to keep the flexibility, to allow the President to act as he has acted now to cut off direct loans; and that they are reviewing the situation; and that legislative authority currently exists to curtail such financing to South Africa; and that the administration is reviewing the prohibition of export-import financing as a policy option, and, therefore, they prefer that the flexibility to act on this issue remain available, and that, therefore, they would be for the Ashbrook amendment. It was a tough decision. Fighting as we did for the Evans amendment, I am compelled to support it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Chairman, while we may disagree with the policy of apartheid—and it is for certain I disagree with it—the bill before us will not alleviate this situation one wit. Punitive action against an industrial power like South Africa is only symbolic, and it does nothing to promote the aspirations of black people in that country.

One of the most respected black leaders in South Africa is the Zulu Chieftan, Buthelezi. In fact, it has often been said that he is to the black population in South Africa what Dr. Martin Luther King was to blacks in this country. Chief Buthelezi is constantly a thorn in the side of the white government in Pretoria, so he is his own man. What does he say about actions comparable to this denial of Eximbank guarantees to South Africa? Simply that it does not help black or white.

South Africa is a western country. It was a valuable ally in World Wars I and II. When countries deserted us right and left in the Korean war, South Africa came in and gave us support. In reality they have asked little of us. They have not slapped embargoes on us. They do not hold back valuable minerals that we need for industrial development and jobs because they disagree with our foreign policy. Yet, every time I turn around we are trying to kick their backsides.

South Africa is making progress in racial relations—perhaps not as fast as we would like. But how long did it take this country to give blacks voting rights? How long did it take this country to allow blacks to eat in restaurants as a part of national policy? Oh, how forgetful we are, how sanctimonious.

If we truly want to help blacks in South Africa, we will encourage American countries there to continue their policy of equal pay for equal work, we will work quietly and firmly to encourage Pretoria to relax racial restrictions, and we will stop trying to grandstand to the rest of the world with punitive, churlish legislation that only intensifies the problem.

The rest of the world is geting a little fed up with our cries of "foul ball," especially at a time when we seem to have trouble getting our own house in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ASHBROOK) there were—ayes 14, noes 36.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announced that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared.

A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 116, noes 219, not voting 99, as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. AUCOIN

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to section 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AUCOIN: Page 4, line 19, immediately after "China" insert the following: "unless the President finds that this would not be in the national interest."

Page 4, line 22, immediately after "China" insert the following: "unless the President finds that this would not be in the national interest."

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment as I indicated, is a perfecting amendment to section 6 which is a section that would at some future time, put in place the machinery for the Eximbank to provide lines of credits for transactions of U.S. exporters with the People's Republic of China.

My purpose in offering this perfecting amendment is not to get into the substance of section 6. Suffice it to say that section 6 is in the bill for two reasons. It was passed by the Subcommittee on International Trade and by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, by substantial margins. The section is in the bill for two reasons: No. 1, this country is running a trade deficit and last year that trade deficit was some $29 billion. It also recognizes that that kind of a trade deficit weakens the dollar, encourages inflation, saps our economy, cripples our ability to put people to work, and does general economic damage to our country.

Secondly, it recognizes a phenomenon that is taking place in mainland China and that is that that country is embarked on an unprecedented industrialization program.

It recognizes that because of that change in policy, mainland China is becoming a prime buyer in the international trade community. A number of our own trading competitors in the world; namely, Japan and the Common Market, are now very aggressively taking advantage of that market because of the concern they have for their own economies and because of the concern that they have for their own balance-of-payments position.

So what this amendment says is that we also ought to give the United States the opportunity to follow the same course and not let that mainland China market go to our competitors in the future.

There have been some who have said that by the provisions in section 6, forces the President's hands in a way that may not be desirable; namely, that it removes discretion on his part.

It is because of that concern that I offer this perfecting amendment. It has been read by the Clerk and I think that makes the motion clear.

It allows the President to play a trump card and say that such transactions shall not be applied if he in his own judgment feels that those transactions would somehow not be in this Nation's best interests. It is because of that concern and my anxiousness to respond to it that I offer this amendment. I hope the subcommittee chairman who has worked diligently on this bill is prepared to accept it, and I would hope that the ranking minority member would be prepared to accept it as well.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to commend the gentleman on his perfecting amendment. I do think it improves this section of the bill, and we are prepared to accept it on this side.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the ranking Republican Member.

Mr. STANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As the gentleman said, there will be an attempt in a moment to strike the entire section, but this particular perfecting amendment is a good one, and we certainly accept it.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I am very pleased to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding and for being very pleased.

As I understand the gentleman's position, in the quest to solve our balance-of-payments situation and in our quest for employment for our people, the gentleman is suggesting that where it is not against our national interest that we deal with Communist countries, whether they are a champion for human rights or not, we should deal with them under those circumstances. Do I understand the gentleman's position correctly?

Mr. AUCOIN. My response to the gentleman from Florida is simply this: As he himself stood in the well a few minutes ago and said in the case of the South African amendment, the Eximbank is an instrument by which this country can improve our trade posture, can improve our balance-of-payments deficit, and that, furthermore, there are such overriding concerns in this area that trade really ought to be a natural kind of question and ought to be distinguished from foreign aid which is an entirely different matter. As a result, yes, we ought to be trading as aggressively as we can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. KELLY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. AUCOIN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. AUCOIN. We ought to recognize that trade is not a gift to another country; trade is something that works to our advantage; and, more than that, trade does not convey any form of approval of the country that this Nation is trading with.

Mr. KELLY. If the gentleman will yield further, then the gentleman is recognizing that when we go forth in the world to sell, we have to meet the competition on the terms of the competition, and the idea of our imposing limitations, political limitations, is just inconsistent with the purpose of what we are trying to do here.

Mr. AUCOIN. The gentleman knows that is my position and that is the principle he enunciated, and other Members on his side of the aisle have enunciated, and Members on this side of the aisle have enunciated as well. I think it is a position that argues in favor of not only the perfecting amendment but also section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any efforts to perfect the legislation, but as soon as it is perfected I want to offer an amendment which would strike the entire section. I will argue about that later. I will offer the amendment that our colleague, the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) was going to offer. I would like to offer that amendment immediately upon the completion of the action on the perfecting amendment. I do not think that title VI can be perfected. The perfecting amendment does not take care of the basic objections that I want to discuss in just a few moments. I merely want to advise my colleagues in the Committee that this effort will be made immediately after the Committee completes its work on the efforts of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) to perfect the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VANIK

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. VANIK: Page 4, line 14; strike out section 6, lines 14–22.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, the language that I seek to strike by striking title VI is the language that would provide authority for the extension of Export-Import credits to the People's Republic of China. The views in support of my amendment are in the report which has been prepared by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) and Messrs. BLANCHARD, D'AMOURS, GRASSLEY, GREEN, STEERS, and WYLIE. Their views set forth reasons for which this amendment ought to be adopted.

I want to point out to my colleagues that the Trade Act of 1974 set forth a very responsible studied approach to the whole problem of trade and the extension of credits.

I think what we have here is an effort to run around the flank of the Trade Act and circumvent it in order to do something special for the People's Republic of China.

Now, I cannot speak with any expertise on human rights in the People's Republic of China. All I can say is to my knowledge they do not even have an office where one can apply for an exit visa. I do not believe a form exists in the People's Republic of China where one can apply for an exit visa. For all I know, there might be 25 or 30 million people that might be trying to get out of the country. We have no way of knowing whether there is any kind of respect for human rights. The country is still a closed place.

I think to make this overture at this time to get around the Trade Act of 1974 would be a dreadful mistake. I do not think we ought to do it. As a matter of fact, as far as I know, the country has not even asked for this.

Now, my colleague talks about trade deficits. I have been dealing with the problem of trade deficits very seriously and for a long time. I do not think there is anything in the prospect of this trade to any degree we can measure that would justify us for unilaterally moving forward and opening up the gates of our Treasury, of our Export-Import Bank, to finance trade in a special way to the People's Republic of China.

I suppose there might be some advantages for certain ports on the Pacific coast that might have the benefit of tremendous China trade; but there is nothing to indicate at this time that this action ought to be taken. I think we ought to have the opportunity to study our relationship with the People's Republic of China. I think that at this point it would be a mistake to single out the People's Republic of China and say that they meet our standards or they meet our expectations in the area of human rights and, therefore, they deserve this special privilege over and beyond that that might be extended to other countries. At some other time we may be able to accept the objectives of title VI, but we are not ready at this time.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I know the gentleman's State has some wheat to sell and I would hope we might fully explore such sales.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope my interest extends beyond the price of wheat, important as that is.

The gentleman said that he views this as an effort to run around the Trade Act of 1974. It is my opinion, supported by members of the committee that produced this legislation, that this language would not affect the Trade Act of 1974, that the Jackson-Vanik amendment with its strictures on immigration policy would continue in full effect, notwithstanding this new language.

Mr. VANIK. What does it do? Tell me what the bill does.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it might be better if the author of the language would respond.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I will be happy to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I am not the author of the language, but I am very much a supporter of the language because I think it does something beneficial for our country.

It is the official policy of our country that we move toward normalization of relations with the People's Republic of China and some think we ought to move much faster than we are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. NEAL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. VANIK was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I personally do not think we ought to move faster than we are.

I was in China earlier this year and spoke with Teng Hsiao-ping, Vice Premier of the country, and he told me they would like to normalize relations. He said, "We would like to normalize relations, but," he said, "we can wait. We are in no hurry." He said, "We can't wait a hundred years, we can't 200 years, but we can wait."

I think we can wait a little while, too. Although I do not think we should normalize relations under their conditions concerning Taiwan, it seems to me the provisions of our bill offer a symbolic gesture to the People's Republic of China. We would be saying to them that we want to continue and expand the initiatives we began in 1972.

We have some strategic interests in common. They want to contain the Russians; I think we also would like to contain the Russians. I certainly think that is important. And one Member pointed out earlier in the debate, the Japanese have signed trade agreements with the People's Republic of China to export to that country something like $20 billion worth of goods and services over the next several years. Why should we not trade with them. We could certainly use the jobs and profits and a reduction in our trade deficit.

We are in no way saying we should endorse their standards. We are not making a statement on that in any way whatsoever. All we are saying is that we are willing to talk and deal, in a nonhostile way, with 25 percent of the world's population.

By adopting this amendment, we would in no way affect the Trade Act of 1974, and we would in no way modify the Jackson-Vanik language that is a part of our law. I am not even sure we would promote exports in the near term. This is symbolic, almost purely symbolic.

We would only be saying that we recognize that 25 percent of the world's population exists, that we would like to be in dialog with it, and that hopefully we might end up selling some of our products to those people.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say in response to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) that I can see a time in the future we might reach this point. But this would give the People's Republic of China a preference, would it not?

Mr. NEAL. No; it would not.

Mr. VANIK. Certainly it would give them a preference over the Soviets and over some other countries?

Mr. NEAL. That is quite correct.

Mr. VANIK. Are we sure we want to do that? Does the Committee on International Relations have any feeling about this? It seems to me that committee should have been involved in this issue.

This certainly is a great dramatic change of policy, and it affects our relationships with other parts of the world. I am concerned, because as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Trade, I think it creates problems that I do not think we are prepared to handle at this moment.

I do not think we have reached a point in our relationship with China that we want to loan for their purchases, particularly since they have not asked credits. We are now involved in trade and I think we ought to have a broader experience in this trade without moving into the credit business.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, this language would not really allow us to extend credit, because the Bank would still be bound by the Jackson-Vanik language and the Bank's own human rights language.

I think the gentleman is quite correct in saying the Chinese probably would not take advantage of it to any great extent. Again, though, it would be symbolic. We would be saying we are interested in trade and we are interested in opening up a trade dialog with that country. It is an interim step.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman indicated he thought there would problems. Could the gentleman tell me what those problems might be?

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I think we would have problems with other trading countries that are not given the same preference.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have served with the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) for nigh on 24 years. I have always numbered him as among the righteous and the right over those years, and he is entitled to be wrong in one instance in those 24 years.

What does the language before us which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) seeks to strike do? In my judgment, it is largely symbolic. It is a good symbol. Life, after all, is made up of symbols.

The language does not lay a glove on the Jackson-Vanik amendment. The People's Republic of China, in fact, does not permit free emigration of its people, and so they would be hoist on that petard. It in no way ties our hands on human rights. The bill before us contains human rights provisions, and the Chinese provisions on habeas corpus are, to say the least, Pickwickian, as are those on adversary procedures.

Furthermore, the President, under the projected language of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN), wears the pants on this. He decides whether Ex-Im may be used, just as he does in the case of Poland and Romania, and it seems to me quite bizarre that we should be tougher on the People's Republic of China, no friend of the Soviet Union, than we are on Poland and Romania, who are now the permanent or intermittent hosts to the Red Army.

I would not want to oversell this bill. I rejoice if the farmers in the district of my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY), have been able to sell a few grains to China. But I would not look for, as a result of this bill, any great expansion of American exports.

Neither would I like to join those from our country who sometimes dance on the Chinese wall, whirling the knotted cord toward the Soviet Union. I do not think we should get into geopolitics here. But what is involved here, I say to my friends, is the idea of friendship between the people of this country and one-quarter of the people on this globe, 950 million Chinese men, women, and children.

The Chinese Government has not asked for this. But I think it would be an excellent thing for world peace if, in this very mild, light-handed and symbolic way, the Congress signified that it too is willing to do what it can for world peace and try to solidify a friendship between the people of the People's Republic of China and the people of this Republic at a time when friendship with all people is never more important than it is today.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would agree with the gentleman that we should not today oversell this provision, because really what it does is put in place a piece of machinery in the charter of the Eximbank that would allow the transactions with China, but the controlling factor is the Jackson-Vanik amendment——

Mr. REUSS. And the human rights provision.

Mr. AUCOIN (continuing). And the human rights provision of the charter of the Eximbank itself. But it does put in place machinery, so that at some future date, these transactions, with the help of the Eximbank, could take place.

I think it is also important to recognize that while we are taking this modest step—I would not even call it a step, I would call it a half step—our trading competitors are outcompeting us in every part of the world. They are moving. Japan has just signed an 8-year trade agreement with China. The Common Market has entered into a 5-year agreement with mainland China. They use institutions similar to the U.S. Eximbank.

So I think we should keep these things in mind in taking this modest step at this time.

Mr. REUSS. The most succulent articles to the greatest cuisine in the world, to the Chinese and the Americans, are carrots.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MEEDS. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

I point out that the manifestation of good will carried in this amendment is the major benefit of the proposal of the gentleman from Oregon during a period of time in which we are embarking on new relations with the People's Republic of China.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak, but I cannot listen while we tiptoe through the tulips toward this splendid gesture and talk about succulent meals and $20 billion which Japan is going to enjoy.

Yes, this section 6 is only a symbol. However, what kind of symbol is it? It is happening all over again. We do not really mean that we are concerned about human beings. We do not really mean it when there is $20 billion hanging out there somewhere. No matter what is happening to the people, we do not really mean it. We want a symbol.

Mr. Chairman, right this minute, if it is felt that we should cement and encourage good relations and the development of peace in the world, the President has the power at any time he wants to recommend a change on behalf of this country. It is right there in the law. All he has to do is to recommend that the Eximbank credit be extended to these companies wishing to do business there.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing needed here. There is nothing but a symbol. This Congress, through one vote during 1 hour of 1 day, says one thing; and at another hour of the same day it says something quite different.

I do not know what the world thinks of us. I do not think there is a single department of the Government which wants this section of the bill, not the Treasury, not the State Department. Nobody wants this section of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the only people I have heard from are the Northwest Council of Businessmen, from the northwestern part of our Nation. Those are the only people who have at all suggested to me that they support this particular section.

It is hard to listen to the arguments we have heard today. We seem to be playing games with each other and with the world. There is no reason to step forward at this moment, when we know of the delicate negotiations which are going on, and not leave these powers in the hands of the President where the present law puts them and where they belong, so that he can deal with the interests of this country as the law requires him to do. There is no reason for Congress to step forward once again and give another symbol. For what? For what reward?

Mr. Chairman, I have just finished letters in an effort to try to get two more people out of China. They are grown sons who want to see their dying mother.

Can I get them out? No.

Again, Mr. Chairman, let us not fool ourselves as to what we are doing here. This is not necessary in the interest of international peace. Our President has peace in mind. In sending emissaries there, he has made it clear that he has this in mind. We should leave these powers in his hands and let him offer this as some kind of reward when we see something done.

Mr. Chairman, I urge this House not to step forward into places where we do not belong, doing things that we should not do.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, when this legislation, specifically, title VI, was before the committee, it was thoroughly debated. The gentleman from Oregon held several important hearings on this legislation.

Our decision to support the administration or the legislation of the gentleman from Oregon is not taken lightly. It was not some whim which somebody came along with.

First of all, let us look at the record of the consideration of the Trade Act.

I understand the position of the gentleman from Ohio in protecting the Jackson-Vanik amendment. Believe me, if I had any choice here today, I wish we had had the subject of the Jackson-Vanik amendment before us because I certainly would like to see that repealed.

However, Mr. Chairman, there is one important principle that was stressed by a gentleman who appeared before our subcommittee on this legislation.

I think it applies not only to this amendment, but the entire Export-Import Bank philosophy as well. Appearing as one of the witnesses before our committee was the former Under Secretary of State, George Ball, who served in that capacity in previous administrations for 6 years. On this specific subject of aid to China he made the following important observation:

> Have we forgotten that the Export-Import Bank credits are not designed to help foreign countries, and the extension of such credits should not be considered as a special privilege we are conferring on foreign governments? If foreign governments—in this case China—cannot buy their goods from the United States on the basis of financing comparability, then they will buy from some other country. It is just that simple.

Second, he made a final concluding comment:

> In conclusion, if I can make one further observation . . .

Mr. HYDE was speaking about South Africa at that time—

> . . . I myself feel that there has never been any very clear evidence that discriminatory provisions that restrict trade or deny economic benefits to foreign governments ever bring about benign change within those countries.

So, we have the philosophy of a man with great experience. Whether or not it is this amendment or an extra-strong human rights amendment, whatever it is, we have not by this method done it.

If we desire to do it, we should do it in the committee chaired by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), the Committee on International Relations. This language which we are addressing to amend and change the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon, first of all is in the bill at the pleasure of the President. Now, we say at the pleasure of the President in the national interest he can leave it in, so it is not too important a point one way or the other. But it should never be in there in the first place.

Finally, let us get out of the business of involving the Export-Import Bank in foreign affairs. Let us not forget that we have an organization here that supplied 440,000 jobs last year to the American people; that financed $8.5 billion for American businesses to 157 countries abroad. It did so without spending one penny of the American taxpayer's dollar. It contributed $36 million back to the Treasury. It has already returned to the Treasury what it took to finance the Bank in 1945. So, I support the gentleman from Oregon in his offering of the amendment, because it gets back to that principle, gets back to the banking position.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak on this matter, but I think the gentleman made the best case for the defeat of the provision in the bill and for a vote in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) to delete it. Mr. Chairman, I opposed the Jackson-Vanik amendment, but this issue is another matter. Why should the United States make an exception for the People's Republic of China.

The House International Relations Committee, as of the present time, has not studied this matter in the detail which it requires. I believe it is premature. For example, it has come to my attention that in some instances in the past domestic industries already having a contract to sell have been denied export licenses on the basis of human rights violations in the purchasing countries. Why should we now make an exception and agree to a provision where a nation that consistently denies human rights would have the privilege of preferred credit. I hope the Vanik amendment is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

(At the request of Mr. ZABLOCKI and by unanimous consent Mr. STANTON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes).

Mr. STANTON. We respect the gentleman for his views. Would not the gentleman agree with me that the language should never have been in the Export-Import Bank bill?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. If the gentleman will yield further—I thoroughly agree. It does not belong in this legislation; so lets take it out by voting for the Vanik amendment.

Mr. STANTON. In the last minute that I have left, let me simply conclude by saying we respect certainly the position of the gentleman from Wisconsin wholeheartedly, but when it comes to legislation for the Export-Import Bank, just one little symbol, we still have the Jackson-Vanik amendment, and I think truthfully in all respect those who oppose it are opposing something that really does not make that much difference at all.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have already made most of the points I feel necessary to make myself with regard to this issue. I simply want to respond to a couple of additional points that have been raised.

The gentleman from Ohio has indicated his provision would somehow provide special treatment for China. I would have to tell my colleagues, and so has the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, that already we have three and soon we will have four Communist nations who are not pillars of human rights who are receiving Ex-Im Bank help: Poland, Yugoslavia, Romania, and Hungary.

When it comes to trade generally we simply cannot say we will subject the questions of trade to the requirement that other countries have to come up to our understanding of human rights, or we will be left with only a handful of trading partners, a Canada or an Australia, and even those would, I suppose, have to be reviewed on a quarterly basis!

The gentleman from Ohio indicated we needed more study for this proposal. That suggests, wrongly, that this is an 11th hour amendment that came to the floor without adequate consideration. I have to tell my colleagues that detailed hearings were held in the Subcommittee on International Trade. We had lengthy testimony from not only witnesses of the caliber of Mr. Ball but also people from industry and organizations that are expert in the field of trade.

I would like to quote from the testimony of Christopher H. Phillips, president, of the National Council for United States-China trade. He said:

"It seems clear that the continued unavailability of Eximbank financing to American companies exporting to China will increase their competitive disadvantage in the China market. . . . Recently, the Chinese have begun to seek longer term financing arrangements of up to as much as 10 years. Such financing is not possible in the United States without Eximbank guarantees or participation."

Someone raised the point that China has not asked for Export-Import Bank credits. I have to say to my colleagues: Why should they? They can trade with Japan. They can trade with the Common Market. There are other people in the world they can trade with—and they are doing so today. I mentioned the Japanese trading agreement entered into with the Japanese equivalent of the Eximbank this year. But in more particular response to that issue, I would like to quote from a remark quoted in the Wall Street Journal by Sun Fang, the deputy secretary general of the Canton Trade Fair. He was asked specifically about this question whether or not China would use these credits if they were made available to the Chinese exporters. He said:

The Japanese Eximbank doesn't extend credit to us (China); it extends credits to Japanese enterprises that sell to China. A similar arrangement provided by the U.S. would be . . . one that would be an internal affair (of the United States).

If the United States wants to help their own businessmen in this way it obviously would be helpful to the U.S.-China trade.

Of course China is not asking for this. We ought to be asking for it ourselves. We ought to be concerned about our balance-of-payments deficit. We ought to be concerned about the fall of the dollar and we ought to be concerned with unemployment in our own country that could be corrected by some day overcoming the balance-of-payments deficit. We ought to be asking for it. And that is exactly what we are trying to do by taking this preliminary step.

I urge the defeat of the amendment.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Vanik amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the debate, but I am intrigued by, first of all, the North-South difference of opinion in Milwaukee, and then the question as to whether or not this whole thing is substantive or symbolic, and I have not figured it out yet.

My friend the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin), who authored the original section 6 would have you believe, when you listen to the gentleman, that this is the most significant step to improve our relationship and trade between mainland China and the United States since the People's Republic of China was formed in 1947 or 1948. Yet the chairman of the full committee, my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin, Henry Reuss says it is not important at all, but it is an important symbolic step.

I was going to ask our friend the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin) whether or not anything could be done about trade without this, and I think the answer is yes, if the President so determines it.

My concern here is that we will be establishing a separate provision for China different than that for Hungary, different from that for Poland, different from that for Yugoslavia and different from that for Romania. And we are creating a situation in which we are saying that we hope something might happen in terms of China trade. But the gentleman has not done it all the way. Had the gentleman added a section 6 applying universally to the Soviet Union, to Poland, Hungary, China, East Germany, to whatever other country it might be, including South Africa, saying that we wanted to have particular relationships, that would have been fine, but the gentleman did not do that. The gentleman has just picked out China.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. STEIGER. No, I will not yield, because I have not completed my statement. The gentleman chose not to yield to me while he had the floor and I will not yield to the gentleman now until I finish. I will be happy to come back to the gentleman later if I have time.

So what we have to look at is what we have done like in Jackson-Vanik. Some say they do not like Jackson-Vanik, they do not like Jackson-Vanik in the Eximbank and I do not like Jackson-Vanik in the Eximbank, and I do not like it in the Trade Act, but that is the law. And that is what we will have to live with.

But at least we have made the arrangements with Poland, with Romania, with Yugoslavia, and with Hungary and we went through a series of hearings, and that is what we did, but that is not what you are doing with this.

This is the wrong place, this is the wrong step, the wrong symbol, and, beyond that, it is not substantive at all because, the President of the United States can do this very thing under the law as it stands now. You do not have to select out China for this purpose.

So I do not believe it ought to be done. I believe the Vanik amendment ought to be adopted.

Now I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin).

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me, and I must apologize to the gentleman for inadvertently not yielding to him after I had promised that I would do so.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is wrong on two points. He has mentioned Congress proceeded under the terms of the Trade Act when it gave similar credits in trade with Poland, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Romania. But the truth is that Yugoslavia and Poland were treated separately by action of Congress; when credits were allowed in trade with those two countries, a separate distinction was made for those countries. We seek a similar step today in trade with China.

Mr. STEIGER. This was done prior to the Trade Act in 1974 in which the debate centered on Jackson-Vanik on the question of extending MFN privileges to them, because those countries were being traded with separately prior to that time.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEIGER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Of course, that is exactly the point I was making. They were dealt with separately. They were dealt with separately at the time for particular reasons. The precedent has been established. There are reasons why we should deal separately with China now, given what is happening in the world, given what is happening in our economy, and given what is happening to the dollar. The gentleman is wrong in those two particulars.

Mr. STEIGER. I am sure that the gentleman from Oregon would understand that his view of my wrongness is different from my view of his wrongness. I think the Vanik amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to let the historic record pass before we vote on the Vanik amendment and, hopefully, delete this section. The present state of Red China was referred to by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. Fenwick), and was well described in the supplemental views in the report, concerning the quality of the nation with which we are dealing. She specifically referred in the report to the rating that Freedom House, which is internationally recognized in estimating each country's desire and ability to protect civil and political rights, has given, listing the People's Republic of China in the next-to-worst category. This places Red China in a worse category than the Republic of South Africa, which just was the subject of 2½ hours of debate.

We have heard arguments put forward that this is both a substantive and yet a symbolic move toward the Red Chinese. The question is, What is the purpose for such a symbolic move? Have they given us something to warrant this? I am unaware that we have any obligation based on the history of this country. In three decades of existence Red China has turned out to be one of the most barbarous and absolutely repressive regimes of this century. The other body produced a report a few years ago in which one of the noted American-Chinese experts, Prof. Richard Walker of South Carolina, estimated after a thorough study, a lifetime of familiarity with the country, that in the course of all of the history of Chinese communism, anywhere from 34 million to 64 million people perished, not just as a result of warfare but systematic executions at the hands of the several governments.

According to the 1977 Report of Amnesty International this murderous history has not changed. As a result of the recent change in regimes upon the death of Mao, there were wholesale executions which were protested by international organizations, immediate convictions and death on the spot for large numbers of people.

The gentlewoman referred to the problems about emigration which is totally denied.

I can understand the desire of the businessmen of this country to make money. I have referred many times on this floor to the desire for a segment of American business to confirm Lenin's estimate that one day the Communists would buy from us the rope that they would use to hang us. Nevertheless a majority in this Congress has decided to place political restrictions on international lending institutions as we just did regardng South Africa. So we must take into account the civil and political rights record that Red China has established. If we want to adopt a similar amendment, as the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) offered in regard to South Africa, and establish a specific program of principles to which the Red Chinese must adhere and live up to over a period of time, then we can judge whether or not we should increase trade. But to appease communism simply in the hope of making money is a Judas-like policy we should avoid.

I might say I will anticipate the gentleman from Iowa and say that his amendment may provide the mechanism, when it is offered, to establish a standard of human rights for our prospective trading partners.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Without getting into the substance of this discussion, I just want to—I do not know whether it is to correct the gentleman—at least state that I have the ranking hereof the nations by Civil Liberties and Freedom House, and they put them in the same column as South Africa.

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman is not correct as far as political liberties. Freedom House rates South Africa much higher in the political rights of its citizens than the People's Republic of China.

Mr. AUCOIN. They are ranking the same on civil rights.

Mr. BAUMAN. Since we are all so much concerned with human and civil rights, we ought at least to take into account that factor when Red China is considered.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

To save 5 minutes of debate, I will support the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Vanik amendment to remove the proposed exemption for the People's Republic of China. I had a similar amendment drafted. It would maintain the current prohibition on Export-Import assistance for transactions with the PRC and other Communist countries.

I am at a loss to understand why of all nations the People's Republic of China has been selected for such special treatment. It certainly is not because that country has any greater degree of liberty or concern for human rights than other Communist countries. In fact, the PRC is one of the most repressive regimes now operating in the world.

The PRC shows totalitarianism at its worst. Thought reform, execution of political dissidents and mass murders are a way of life. I do not need to reiterate the scores of articles and speeches I have put in the RECORD over the years.

I urge my colleagues to eliminate the proposed exemption—an exemption that the PRC has not earned and does not deserve.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I voice support for the language that is presently in the bill. It is my understanding that the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) will offer a perfecting amendment to that language which, in my view, will make it still better; but with or without the perfecting amendment, I believe it serves the public interest. I feel it is entirely proper for this committee to bring this language before us.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee on International Relations, made a point that this had not been before the Committee on International Relations, and that is certainly true, but it is not for want of opportunity. This bill was reported by committee more than a month ago, and it was in the process of deliberation for several months prior to that; so the Committee on International Relations certainly had ample opportunity to deal with this subject if it wished to.

I say it is entirely proper for this committee to bring the language before us, because I view the Export-Import Bank not as a means of being nice to foreign countries, not as a means of passing out favors to this regime or that regime, but as an aid to U.S. business enterprises that wish to develop business in countries where it is difficult directly to reach the customer. For that reason I supported the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK), which would have stricken the language about South Africa, because I felt it was unfortunate for the Congress to put impediments upon the activities of the Export-Import Bank.

The point needs to be underscored also that this language does not impair or set aside or restrict in any way the Jackson-Vanik amendment that is the law of the land and this language does not presume to alter that one bit. This language would have effect only if and when the People's Republic of China meets the conditions of Jackson-Vanik.

Now, the question has been raised, Is this symbolic or substantive? It is symbolic until that time, until that time if and when the People's Republic of China meets the standards of Jackson-Vanik. Until that time it is a symbolic gesture of cooperation, of interest and better relations with the People's Republic of China; but symbols are very important and I hope this language will survive.

The point also needs to be made that this does not impair in any way the interests of the Republic of China, the regime on the island of Taiwan. This relates only to the People's Republic of China and United States commercial transactions that might develop. It is an aid to U.S. enterprise in dealing with the People's Republic of China.

Those of us who have been to China recently know full well that Western nations are doing a lot of business in China and United States firms need every possible assistance in order to compete effectively so the United States can get its share of that business.

The point that has not been mentioned so far, that I think is most important of all, is that if a record vote occurs on this amendment, and I assume it will occur, this will be the first time, to my knowledge and recollection, that this body has ever gone on record on a question of policy toward the People's Republic of China.

Now, if as I believe this is a symbolic gesture that probably will not have substantive effect for several years, perhaps for a very long time. I ask you to ponder carefully whether you feel it is in the interest of our Nation to have a recorded vote on the record in a negative vein rejecting a symbolic gesture of cooperation with the People's Republic of China. Is that really the step that we should take at this juncture?

You may say, "It is not my choice that we have this before us today."

I am not on the committee that reported it, either, but we have to deal with reality and very soon you and I are going to face the decision whether or not to enter our vote "yes" or "no" on a symbolic gesture of friendship and cooperation with the People's Republic of China.

I would hope that at this juncture when the administration is obviously trying to maintain good relations with the People's Republic of China that we would carefully consider this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FINDLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, Dr. Brzezinski just returned from the People's Republic of China. Many of us have been there. We have established an acquaintance with many of the officials there. There is strong evidence that the People's Republic of China has opened a new chapter in its relationship with the outside world and its internal policy as well. If I had the time and you had the patience, I would be glad to go into the details of these changes, but these changes are most promising.

Now in the wake of those developments, in recognition of the obvious desire of our administration to strengthen our ties with China for national security reasons, not to mention economic reasons, is it really prudent for this body to turn down language which represents a symbolic gesture of cooperation and friendship to the People's Republic?

I think not, and I implore my colleagues to join me in voting "no," in other words, to sustain the language that is now in the bill and vote "no" on the amendment to strike the language out. I do implore my colleagues to think carefully on this issue. I implore you to vote "no" on the amendment.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to commend him for an absolutely outstanding statement.

I hesitate to take the floor in opposition to the position of my esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK), with whom I usually stand shoulder to shoulder, but I think the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) has put his finger on the possibly grave implications of this amendment in terms of our national security interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. SEIBERLING, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FINDLEY was allowed to preceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, it may well be that a key factor restraining Moscow from an even more adventuristic foreign policy than it is now engaged in is the fact that, starting with President Nixon's trip to China, the Soviets have had greater cause for caution, when contemplating aggressive activities in Europe or elsewhere, because of the serious possibility that they might have a rear to defend in East Asia.

Mr. Chairman, I think that has a very important bearing on our defense budget and on our entire national security posture.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) that in my opinion our relationship with the People's Republic of China is worth at least 50 divisions vis-a-vis the Soviet Union.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to commend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) for his excellent statement and say that I agree with him 100 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. NEAL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FINDLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, I would like to point out further that on the question of human rights, the provision in this bill which the Vanik amendment would seek to strike, would not exempt the People's Republic of China from the human rights provisions that exist in the Bank now.

I think the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) helps to clear up the point as to whether this has symbolic merit or substantive merit, and I think the point was well made that its present merit is a symbolic one. We are saying that we clearly have a strategic interest in common with the People's Republic of China; that we have an interest in providing jobs and profits in this country; and that this Bank exists to serve our needs, not the needs of another country. We are saying also that it does have an important symbolic value in opening the door and beginning a dialog with a quarter of the population of this planet.

We are not in any way saying that we approve of their system of government or their way of life. We are just saying that we want to begin a dialog.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) for his eloquent statement.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that I find myself in a little bit of a quandary on the Vanik amendment. On the one hand, I would at least like to see the People's Republic of China treated the same as the other countries with which it is listed in Freedom House in relation to its ranking with other nations on political rights and civil liberties. On the other hand, I am wondering why the People's Republic of China has to be given any kind of special consideration.

I understand that the President could extend the provisions of the Eximbank to Red China just as he does to, for example, Yugoslavia or Saudi Arabia or Poland or Peru or Pakistan or Kuwait or Jordan or any of these other countries which are listed in this column as to their rankings by Freedom House.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) makes a very good point. The gentleman who was in the well and who just completed his statement said that a vote against the Vanik amendment would be symbolic. All the Vanik amendment does is to continue the present law, and the present law permits the President to waive the prohibition against Eximbank's activities relating to all transactions with the People's Republic of China if he wishes to do so. I cannot see where there would be any symbolism in just maintaining the law as it presently is.

Mr. HARKIN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, that is where my quandary starts, and I submit that it is true.

But on the other hand, if in fact we have a country like China, which has sort of been closed to the outside world for so long and has been sort of closed to our influence for so long, if we are trying to open it up a little bit and make our influence felt, and if we can do something for closer ties so that our influence on these things like political rights and human rights can have more effect in that country, then I would be opposed to that amendment. And that is the quandary I raise. Do we have to take an additional step to move closer to this opening up?

Some of these other countries I just mentioned, like Yugoslavia, Saudi Arabia, Peru, and Pakistan, we have dealt with those countries over a long period of time and our influence is felt in those countries. That is not true in the case of Red China. So do we have to take a little bit of an extra step, such as the gentleman from Oregon is stating, to get to this position? I do not know.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I do not know if the gentleman was on the floor when I made the argument pretty much as the gentleman is making now, with respect to South Africa, and that is, to the extent that it is permitted, the President can waive, and so on, and is able to exercise some leverage toward the accomplishment of the objective that all of us, I hope, espouse and seek. And that is available in the present law.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REUSS. I thank the gentleman for yielding very briefly on this issue.

In our foreign policy, what does the Executive do and what does the Congress do? Some of the finest initiatives in our foreign policy have been taken by the Congress.

Mr. HARKIN. Oh, I agree with that.

Mr. REUSS. It is the Congress which said, "Let there be a Marshall Plan," was one; it was the Congress which said, "Let there be a Marshall Plan," and one came into being; it was the Congress which said there ought to be a Peace Corps, and the President took it up and there was a Peace Corps.

So if we believe that the friendship of one-fourth of the world's population is a good thing and will make them toe up to the human rights standards, as the gentleman has so eloquently and consistently espoused, I cannot think of a better thing to do than to knock down the Vanik amendment.

Mr. HARKIN. I guess again this quandary of mine relates to whether or not we ought to, as I said, bring this relationship with China along so that it puts them in the same kind of relative position as these other countries.

If this bill does that, then I would be for it. If, however, it carves out some kind of special exemption and difference for these other countries. I would be opposed to it.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, we did it specially for Yugoslavia, we did it specially for Poland, and I believe rightly. Here, as I say, is one-fourth of the globe's population. I do not think it is out of order for us to take up China as we are today.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for his remarks, because I do not want to be put in the position of voting, for example, against the Vanik amendment and then be accused of trying to thwart our further relationship with the People's Republic of China. That I do not want to do at all. I want us to move ahead with that kind of relationship. And so I am sorry that the debate has sort of revolved around that aspect of it, that a vote against the Vanik amendment is a vote against our proceeding ahead with the relationship with China.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HARKIN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has come to the very essential, fundamental point. A vote for the Vanik amendment cannot be viewed as other than a vote against friendly cooperation with China. Even though it is almost totally symbolic, it will be inevitably so viewed. And that is why I feel that the vote that is soon to come is of such great historical importance. The first time that this body has been on record with a nay-and-yea vote about policy concerning the People's Republic of China, it would be a pity if the vote comes out in the form that will be viewed as negative against further cooperation with China.

Mr. HARKIN. I just do not know why the President does not do it himself, just as he has with every other country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 179, noes 138, not voting 117, as follows:

Messrs. MOFFETT, RISENHOOVER, HUGHES, GIAIMO, EARLY, McEWEN, McHUGH, CORNELL, RINALDO, and Mrs. HECKLER changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

Messrs. ANDREWS of North Dakota, PREYER, ANDREWS of North Carolina, and CUNNINGHAM changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WRIGHT, having assumed the chair, Mr. MINETA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to proceed at this time for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority whip the program for next week.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague, the distinguished minority whip yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank the distinguished minority whip for yielding.

The program for the House of Representatives for the week of June 5, 1978, is as follows:

On Monday the House meets at noon for the Consent Calendar and three bills on suspension. Votes on suspensions will be postponed until the end of all suspensions.

First, H.R. 185, amendments for movement of Coast Guard personnel;

Second, H.R. 183, amend intervention on the High Seas Act;

Third, H.R. 12140, Federal Water Pollution Control Act amendments.

H.R. 12250, boundary waters canoe area, under an open rule, with 2 hours of debate;

H.R. 12481, insular areas authorization, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate;

H.R. 12505. solar power research and development, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate.

On Tuesday the House will meet at noon for the Private Calendar, with three bills under suspension. Votes on suspensions will be postponed until the end of all suspensions.

First, H.R. 8394, Refuge Revenue Sharing Act of 1978;

Second, H.R. 12637, North Pacific Fisheries Act amendments;

Third, H.R. 12668, Polar Living Marine Resources Conservation Act of 1978.

They will be followed by H.R. 12240, intelligence authorizations, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate, and

H.R. 12426, New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate, but the rule and general debate only will be taken on Tuesday.

On Wednesday, the House meets at 10 a.m. on the Treasury-Postal Service appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979 and on the Labor-HEW appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979.

On Thursday, the House meets at 10 a.m. to complete consideration on H.R. 12426, the New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978, and to complete consideration of the Labor-HEW appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979.

On Friday, the House meets at 10 a.m. on the House joint resolution providing for urgent supplemental appropriations for black lung and on the transportation appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979.

During the legislative days reserved for appropriations bills, other legislation may be scheduled on days when early completion of appropriations bills makes time available. Among the bills that are subject to being so-called up, but not necessarily in this order, are the following, Mr. Speaker:

H.R. 11493, Amtrak Improvement Act of 1978, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate.

H.R. 12433, Housing and Community Development Act amendments, under an open rule, with 2 hours of debate.

H.R. 15, ESEA Amendments of 1978, under an open rule with 1 hour of debate.

H.R. 12005, Justice Department Authorizations, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 9400, Civil Rights for Institutionalized Persons, to complete consideration.

H.R. 11983, FEC Authorizations, under an open rule with 1 hour of debate.

H.R. 10285, Commodity Exchange Act Extension, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 3350, Deep Seabed Hard Minerals, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 12432, Civil Rights Commission Act of 1978, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 12452, CETA Amendments of 1978, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 7577, Economic Opportunity and Community Services Amendments of 1978, subject to a rule being granted.

H.R. 8099, Water Rights for the Ak-Chin Indians, under an open rule, with 1 hour of debate.

H.R. 12157, the Export-Import Bank bill, to complete consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the House will adjourn by 3 p.m. on Fridays and by 5:30 p.m. on all other days, except Wednesdays.

Conference reports may be brought up at any time. Any further program will be announced later.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the distinguished minority whip, for yielding.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

Might I inquire on that supplemental notice in what order those measures might be considered? Am I to assume that, for example, the Export-Import Bank bill, while listed last and being under consideration today and will probably be carried over, would those bills in which we have not completed consideration be given higher priority than those in which we have not even dealt with?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, we will try to do that, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois; but as I earlier indicated, the bills will not be called necessarily in the order in which I read them.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, might I also ask of the majority whip that we would have at least a day's notice on the rule on the FEC authorization; could we be assured of that?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, we always try to give that assurance, I might say to the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished minority whip.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1978

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on May 26, 1978 the President approved and signed a bill of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 10392, an act to establish a Hubert H. Humphrey Fellowship in Social and Political Thought at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars at the Smithsonian Institution and to establish a trust fund to provide a stipend for such fellowship.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, although I was able to speak in behalf of the Vanik amendment yesterday to extend the tuition tax credit to elementary and secondary schools, I was forced to miss the actual vote due to an important commitment in my district. Had I been present, I would have, of course, supported passage of this amendment. In addition, I would have opposed the second Vanik amendment to increase the credit to 50 percent (an amendment on which I was incorrectly paired in favor), opposed the Mikva tax deferral amendment, and supported final passage of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit.

ANNUAL REPORT ON OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH ACTIVITIES IN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress the annual report required by Section 19b of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, entitled "Occupational Safety and Health Activities in the Federal Government." The report summarizes the Government's programs for the protection of the safety and health of its employees during 1976, activities prior to the beginning of my Administration, and was prepared by the Department of Labor.

The report indicates that not all agencies of the Federal Government have in the past fully followed guidelines set forth by the Department of Labor for workplace safety and health programs. This Administration is studying ways to improve the workplace safety and health efforts of all Federal agencies, including those programs that affect Federal employees. I intend that reports covering the years of this Administration will reflect significant progress in that regard.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 2, 1978.

FEDERAL RESERVE'S QUARTERLY REPORT TO JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE SHOWS MONEY GROWTH DOWN, BUSINESS LOANS AND INTEREST RATE UP

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BOLLING) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, the Joint Economic Committee and the Federal Reserve Board have an agreement under which the Board submits quarterly written reports on financial developments to the committee. We have just received the Board's report on developments in the first quarter.

The rate of monetary growth slowed quite sharply in the first quarter falling to an annual rate of 5 percent after a rate of almost 8 percent for 1977 as a whole. The Fed attributes this slowdown to the decline in economic activity caused by the severe winter weather, the coal strike and a slower than usual pace of tax refund disbursements by the Treasury. However, it is obvious that the Fed has also deliberately undertaken to tighten monetary and credit conditions.

The first quarter also witnessed a marked slowdown in the growth of saving deposits at bank and thrift institutions. The rate of expansion of saving deposits by individuals declined substantially, while saving deposits of business and State and local governments actually declined in absolute terms. Much of the decline in the growth of saving deposits for individuals came in small deposits. After growing by $13.7 billion in 1977, small-scale deposits in savings accounts went up only $1.1 billion during the first quarter, in part because the ceiling interest rate at banks and savings institutions is now below the interest rate on other short-term market instruments for the first time in years. This is a somewhat ominous sign not because it reflects financial disintermediation, but because it coincides with a sharp and worrisome rise in consumer debt.

Both short- and long-term interest rates rose in the first quarter. The rise in short-term rates continues an upward trend that began more than a year ago. Short-term rates are now ranging between 6 and 6½ percent—about 200 basis points above their 1976 lows. Long-term interest rates have also begun to rise. For example, the average rate on new commitments for conventional mortgages on new homes increased from 9.10 percent at the end of 1977 to 9.30 percent at the end of March. This is the highest mortgage rate since 1974.

Bank lending to business expanded sharply during the first quarter. Data from the largest banks indicate that this growth was widely distributed among industries, with increased bank lending to manufacturing, trade, construction, and service industries. However, this expansion of bank lending is less a reflection of growing business demand for funds than of the increasing costliness of obtaining funds by other methods. High long-term interest rates have discouraged businesses from issuing long-term bonds, and continuing low stock prices during the first quarter discouraged equity issue. Apparently, businesses are switching to short-term credit because of the cost and difficulty of raising long-term funds.

Mortgage lending declined in the first quarter. Some of the decline is attributable to the bad weather which hampered home construction, and some of it is attributable to the slow inflow of savings into thrift institutions.

Overall, Mr. Speaker, I am not encouraged by this quarterly report because the financial conditions described in it are a threat to the continuing growth of production and employment in our economy. That threat might have been removed had the advice of the Joint Economic Committee—to maintain growth of monetary aggregates at roughly their 1977 levels—been heeded.

Looking to the future, Mr. Speaker, I hope the news will be better and that the Fed will modify its restrictive policies. The second quarter is half over and some economic signs are better. During June and July the Joint Economic Committee will hold its midyear hearings and then report on the state of the economy to the Congress. I hope that our report will be more optimistic than this one from the Federal Reserve. However, much of that is up to the Fed itself.

I include herewith the Federal Reserve's report on domestic financial developments in the first quarter and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

DOMESTIC FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE FIRST QUARTER

Growth of the major monetary aggregates slowed during the first quarter of 1978, apparently reflecting in large measure the effects of the weather-induced lull in the growth of economic activity. The rate of increase in M–1 for the quarter was well below the average for all of 1977. Inflows to commercial banks of interest-bearing deposits subject to regulatory ceilings also weakened, as did deposit flows into nonbank thrift institutions, thus contributing to slower growth of M–2 and M–3 for the quarter.

As flows into deposit accounts subject to regulatory ceilings abated in the first quarter, commercial banks continued to rely on managed liabilities to help support the expansion of their loan portfolios. Banks issued substantial amounts of large-denomination time deposits, which are not subject to regulatory ceilings, and increased their use of nondeposit sources of funds. Thrift institutions, especially savings and loan associations, were able to extend sizable amounts of mortgage credit, though at a pace below the record high levels of late 1977; they financed these extensions in part by stepping up their borrowing from Federal home loan banks.

The total volume of credit raised by nonfinancial sectors in the first quarter appears to have remained around the high level of the fourth quarter of 1977. Businesses increased their borrowing slightly as a rapid increase in their bank loans more than offset a reduction in their use of other forms of credit. In the household sector, mortgage financing slowed from the record pace of the fourth quarter, while consumer credit remained strong. Credit demands by the U.S. Treasury were again heavy, reflecting another sizable budget deficit. State and local governments maintained their borrowing close to the pace of the fourth quarter, as they continued to refund in advance debt obligations issued at higher interest rates.

In early January the Federal Reserve raised the discount rate on advances to member banks from 6 to 6½ per cent; this action was designed to help stabilize conditions prevailing in international exchange markets. Concurrently, the System became less accommodative in the provision of reserves to the banking system through open market operations, and the rate on Federal funds (overnight loans of immediately available bank funds) increased to about 6¾ per cent from 6½ per cent in December. The Federal funds rate remained at the 6¾ per cent level to mid-April, as growth of the monetary aggregates was generally within longer-run ranges set by the Federal Open Market Committee. Most other short-term interest rates rose along with the Federal funds rate in early January. Over the rest of the quarter, however, many of these rates tended to edge lower; some of this decline stemmed from the substantial demands for Treasury bills by foreign central banks, which were investing dollars purchased in foreign exchange markets. As a result, many short-term market rates increased only about 5 to 10 basis points, on balance, over the quarter.

Increases in interest rates on many longer-term securities in the first quarter equaled or even exceeded somewhat the upward movement of short-term rates over that period. Like short-term rates, yields on intermediate- and long-term instruments shifted upward with the rise in the Federal funds rate in January. This movement tended to reinforce a rising trend in long-term rates that had been evident through December as investors revised upward their expectations about the future strength of demands for money and credit. Long-term rates showed little change in February and early March, but began to rise again in late March and early April, apparently reflecting market concern about indications of an acceleration in the rate of inflation and the possibility of a more restrictive policy stance by the Federal Reserve.

MONETARY AGGREGATES AND BANK CREDIT

Largely because of the slower growth of economic activity, the pace of expansion of M–1—currency and privately held demand deposits at commercial banks—declined to an annual rate of 5 per cent in the first quarter, about 2¾ percentage points below the average rate for 1977. Special factors—including severe winter weather the lengthy coal strike, and a slower-than-usual pace of tax refund disbursements by the Treasury—led to a slight decline in M–1 during February. By late March, however, these factors were no longer restricting money demand, and expansion in M–1 resumed.

M–1 grew at about the same rate as GNP during the first quarter, and as a result, velocity—the ratio of GNP to M–1—increased only very slightly. Apparently, the substantial rise in interest rates that occurred between April and October of 1977 was no longer prompting further efforts by the public to economize on cash balances and the upward movements of rates in the first quarter had only a small effect on money demand. Moreover, in the first quarter, as in the previous 5 quarters, M–1 grew about in line with expectations based on historical relationships among money, income, and interest rates. Earlier in the current economic expansion, the effects of financial innovations on cash-management practices had given rise to extraordinarily large increases in velocity.

[4] Nondeposit sources funds include borrowings by commercial banks from other than commercial banks in the form of Federal funds purchased, securities sold under agreements to repurchase, and other liabilities for borrowed money, plus gross liabilities to own foreign branches (Euro-dollar borrowings), loans sold to affiliates, loan repurchase agreements, borrowings from Federal Reserve Banks, and other minor items.

Note: Changes are calculated from the average amounts outstanding in each quarter. Annual rates of change in reserve measures have been adjusted for changes in reserve requirements. Data reflect revisions from benchmark adjustments and from new seasonal factors.

Growth of M–2 also slowed in the first quarter—to an annual rate of about 6½ per cent from 8 per cent in the fourth quarter. The reduction in M–2 growth resulted from a slowing of inflows of savings deposits to commercial banks as well as moderation in the rate of increase of M–1. The rate of expansion of savings deposits held by individuals declined sharply in the first quarter, and savings accounts of businesses and of State and local governments contracted for the third consecutive quarter.

Flows into small-denomination time accounts at banks, which had slowed markedly in the fourth quarter, continued to expand at a reduced pace in the first 3 months of 1978. The slow growth of savings and small-denomination time deposits was attributable to the rise in market interest rates in the second half of 1977 and early 1978, which brought yields on market instruments maturing in 4 years or less well above regulatory ceilings on deposits of comparable maturity. The relative attractiveness of returns available in credit markets during the first quarter was reflected in a substantial rise in fund flows to money market mutual funds and in noncompetitive tenders in auctions of Treasury securities. As in the two previous quarters, growth in M–2 was supported by the issuance of large time deposits (other than negotiable certificates of deposit (CD's) at weekly reporting banks), which are not subject to rate ceilings. Increases in these deposits accounted for more than three-fourths of the increase in the time and savings deposit component of M–2 in the first quarter.

Faced with weak inflows of deposits subject to regulatory ceilings, banks—especially large ones—again relied heavily on managed liabilities during the first quarter to finance the accumulation of earning assets. Total large-denomination time deposits, including both negotiable and nonnegotiable CD's, increased more than in the fourth quarter, and other borrowings—principally repurchase agreements and purchases of Federal funds from nonbanking institutions—also rose more strongly. The average level of borrowing by member banks at Federal Reserve discount windows fell substantially, however, as the spread between the discount and Federal funds rates generally narrowed.

The use of managed liabilities enabled banks to expand total loans and investments at an annual rate of 10½ per cent in the first 3 months of 1978, the largest gain since the second quarter of 1977. The faster growth of bank credit was accounted for by an increase in holdings of Treasury securities in February, which reversed the pattern of disinvestment that had prevailed in the previous two quarters. Portfolios of other investment securities, which had risen throughout 1977, were essentially unchanged in the first quarter. The expansion in loans eased only slightly from the rapid pace of the fourth quarter, as real estate and business lending remained strong while net credit extensions to consumers slowed somewhat.

BUSINESS CREDIT

Bank lending to businesses—as measured by changes in business loans net of holdings of bankers acceptances—surged to an annual rate of 20 per cent in the first quarter. Both large and small banks experienced rapid increases. Data from the largest banks indicate that growth was distributed widely across industries; loans to manufacturing, trade, construction, and service industries displayed particular strength. Term business loans at these large banks expanded more than $2 billion, the greatest quarterly increase since late 1974. These loans, which have maturities of 1 year or more, accounted for half of the first-quarter expansion in total business loans net of bankers acceptances at the largest banks. This acceleration in term lending apparently is related to heightened demand for such loans by corporations. Survey data indicate that interest rates on term loans rose more than rates on similar market instruments in the first quarter, and that banks generally were no more willing to make fixed-rate term loans than they had been in other recent months.

The volume of short- and intermediate-term funds raised by businesses from nonbank sources was a little lower during the quarter. On balance, commercial paper issued by nonfinancial corporations was about unchanged, with a sizable gain during March roughly offsetting declines in January and February. Those earlier declines had resulted mainly from repayments of paper issued by public utilities during December to cover temporarily inadequate cash flows. In March, however, commercial paper issued by utilities declined less than seasonally. Growth in business loans at finance companies abated somewhat from the very rapid pace of the fourth quarter, with automobile-related credit again accounting for most of the advance.

As businesses in general increased their reliance on bank borrowing during the first quarter, the volume of new long-term financing declined markedly. Gross bond and equity issuance by U.S. corporations fell to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $34 billion, the slowest quarterly pace since 1974.

Public bond offerings by most categories of issuers dropped off sharply during January and February, but recovered somewhat in March and April. The volume of industrial and public utility issues was particularly light. Offerings by financial concerns, however, picked up toward the end of the quarter, resuming the historically high pace of late 1977. Private placements of corporate debt are estimated to have moderated in the first quarter.

Yields on long-term corporate bonds continued to rise during the first quarter, partly in response to increased investor apprehension about an acceleration in the rate of inflation. The Federal Reserve index of yields on recently offered Aaa-rated utility bonds rose from 8.48 per cent at the end of 1977 to 8.75 per cent at the end of the first quarter of 1978. Rates climbed further during April, reaching their highest levels since mid-1976. The slower pace of new bond offering and the concurrent rise in bank term loans this year may reflect a reluctance of potential corporate borrowers to enter into long-term obligations at existing interest rates. Following the widespread strengthening of balance sheet positions during 1975–76, many corporations are capable of turning to short- and intermediate-term borrowing and of slowing their accumulation of liquid assets without reducing their liquidity positions to unacceptably low levels.

Stock prices were generally lower on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) during the first quarter of 1978, at least partly in response to conditions of uncertainty created by the decline of the U.S. dollar on international currency markets, a temporary slowing in domestic economic expansion, and a more rapid rate of inflation. Over the quarter, the NYSE composite index declined 5.0 per cent from its level at the end of 1977. As during 1977, however, stock prices of smaller firms generally outperformed those of the more highly capitalized corporations that dominate the NYSE index. Both the American Stock Exchange (AMEX) index and the National Association of Securities Dealers Automated Quotation (NASDAQ) over-the-counter index—which reflect the stock price performance of smaller corporations—registered further increases during the first quarter.

A vigorous rally in the stock market in April returned the NYSE index to its level at year-end and carried the AMEX and NASDAQ indexes higher. The rally—reportedly sparked by heavy stock purchases by institutional and foreign investors—appears to have been spurred partly by a stabilization of the U.S. dollar on international currency markets, by indications of a resurgence in domestic economic activity after a weather-related winter slowdown, and by evidence that economic policy actions were being undertaken to slow the rate of inflation.

The generally lower level of stock prices on the New York Stock Exchange limited the incentive for new corporate equity issues during the first quarter. The volume of new issues, estimated at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $7 billion, was the smallest since the trough in stock prices in late 1974. Public utilities, which tend to have less flexibility in adjusting their debt-to-equity ratios, continued to account for the bulk of new equity issues.

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

In the municipal securities market, gross bond issuance proceeded at a $41 billion annual pace during the first quarter. Although down somewhat from the record quarterly levels of 1977, volume remained large by historical standards. Repeating the 1977 pattern, advance refundings of outstanding higher-coupon issues accounted for about one-fifth of new offerings. A sizable decline since late 1975 in interest rates on tax-exempt bonds—particularly lower-rated issues—remained a strong incentive for refunding, although a Treasury Department ruling in late 1977 placed tighter limits on the type of issues that may be refunded in advance.

The Bond Buyer index of long-term tax-exempt yields was about unchanged on balance over the first quarter. While net acquisitions of municipal bonds by commercial banks slowed during the first quarter in the face of the increased volume of business loans, continued strong demand for tax-exempt investment outlets by property-casualty insurance companies, investment companies, and individuals have helped keep rates on tax-exempt bonds in an historically low range relative to taxable yields.

The Treasury borrowed a total of $20.8 billion net (not seasonally adjusted) during the first quarter to help finance a $25.8 billion budget deficit and a $3.7 billion deficit of off-budget programs. Increases in outstanding marketable obligations accounted for $15.6 billion of the net borrowing, primarily in the form of notes and bonds. Net financing by Federally sponsored credit agencies jumped to $4.5 billion, the highest level since 1974, as the Federal Home Loan Bank System and the Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA) borrowed to help finance their support of the residential mortgage market. FNMA acquired $2.1 billion of mortgages in the first quarter, and the Federal home loan banks advanced $1.1 billion (not seasonally adjusted) to savings and loan associations.

Continuing the pattern of late 1977, foreign official institutions and State and local governments remained major sources of demand for Treasury obligations during the first quarter. Foreign official institutions increased their holdings of marketable and nonmarketable securities by $13.7 billion, primarily investing dollar proceeds acquired from intervention in foreign exchange markets. State and local governments, using the proceeds of advance refunding operations, invested $2.5 billion in special nonmarketable Treasury obligations.

MORTGAGE AND CONSUMER CREDIT

Net mortgage lending during the first quarter of 1978 was at an estimated annual rate of $126 billion, down sharply from the record pace of $142 billion during the final quarter of 1977. Reduced lending on residential properties accounted for the entire decline, as expansion of nonresidential mortgage credit continued at its pace in late 1977. Among major lenders, the slowdown was most pronounced at depositary institutions, where net mortgage acquisitions declined in the face of a weakening in deposit inflows. Delays in construction due to bad weather may have further disrupted mortgage flows during the early months of the year.

Largely because of their smaller cash flow, savings and loan associations, the largest suppliers of residential mortgage funds, reduced their net lending by more than 15 per cent from recent record levels. These associations also curtailed new mortgage commitments; the result was the first quarterly decline in outstanding commitments (seasonally adjusted) since 1974. The slackening in deposit growth also forced savings and loans to rely increasingly on advances from the Federal home loan banks, and on other borrowed funds, to help meet takedowns of mortgage commitments. Outstanding advances increased $3.6 billion on a seasonally adjusted basis, reaching a level above the 1974 peak. Savings and loans expanded their holding of liquid assets (seasonally adjusted) during the first quarter at the greatly reduced pace of the previous quarters. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board, in an attempt to free additional funds for mortgage lending, reduced its minimum liquidity requirements for the associations, effective May 1.

Among other major lenders, commercial banks also slowed their net mortgage acquisitions significantly from the strong pace of late 1977, in part because of increased demand for business loans. Mortgage lending by life insurance companies, primarily on nonresidential properties, changed little. The flow of funds into markets for mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration or guaranteed by the Veterans Administration held up relatively well, as reductions in issues of mortgage-backed, pass-through securities guaranteed by the Government National Mortgage Association (GNMA) were roughly offet by increased mortgage purchases by FNMA. A general increase in home-mortgage interest rates since late 1977 made the purchase price on outstanding 4-month FNMA purchase commitments attractive to mortgage originators possessing such commitments.

The combination of slower deposit flows into thrift institutions, sustained demand for mortgages, and a rise in interest rates on other long-term instruments pushed home mortgage yields higher during the first quarter. Average rates on new commitments for conventional mortgages on new homes increased from 9.10 per cent at the end of 1977 to 9.30 per cent at the end of March, the highest since 1974. During the quarter, rate ceilings on Government-underwritten home mortgages were raised by 0.25 of a percentage point to 8.75 per cent. Nonrate terms and credit standards are also reported to have tightened somewhat in recent months; many lenders, for example, now are said to be insisting upon larger downpayments.

Consumer installment credit, the other major source of household financing, expanded at a record seasonally adjusted annual rate of $37 billion during the first quarter. Automobile credit, buttressed by a sharp recovery in new-car sales in March, continued to account for more than 40 per cent of total growth in installment credit.●

BLEAK BUSINESS CLIMATE FORECAST IN CALIFORNIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply troubled by an article which appeared in the New York Times last weekend on the dismal economic conditions which affect the business community in southern California. I am having the article printed in the RECORD following my remarks. I urge each of you to read it, with a thought to the effect we in Government can have on the potential for business growth. Taxation, a policy for dealing with inflation, and the delivery of public services are just a few of the factors which determine the prospects for a healthy business climate in every congressional district in the country.

As this article points out, Government policy has intimidated major corporations from locating in my home State. It started early in the 1960's when the State began lavish spending programs for welfare and other social services which require raising more taxes. Regulatory programs expanded, placing severe restrictions on business activity in the areas of health, safety, and the environment. The costs of these programs is also staggering.

The California Manufacturers Association, a coalition of labor unions in the State, and the California Business Roundtable, have submitted a package of proposals to the California Legislature which place greater emphasis on creating an atmosphere of economic vitality.

The policy of Governor Brown and his administration has done considerable damage to the attraction of new firms in the State. Corporate income is taxed at a higher rate than 48 other States. California expenditures for welfare-oriented programs are 50 percent above the national average, contributing significantly to this burden on the business community. The tax on inventories which businesses store has drained corporate treasuries. California is also one of only three States which levies a tax on its total profits derived from conducting business in the State.

A poor policy for planning the development of energy resources has also discouraged business from looking favorably at California. Since the Brown administration took office in 1974, electrical generating capacity has fallen to less than half of its level during the previous 4 years. There are problems with developing other resources such as natural gas, oil, and coal, and an attitude of hostility toward nuclear fuel pervades the Governor's office.

The regulatory bureaucracy in Sacramento has done a real job by inhibiting the issuance of business permits. The Governor's people in a position to facilitate business growth have taken a confrontational approach in entertaining business interests. With such a high rate of unemployment in the State, an open door to the businessman would seem to be in order. Cosmetic steps, like catchy slogans—"California Means Business"—are not about to induce a company to spend millions on setting up shop, or expanding, in California.

Today's Wall Street Journal, in an article by James M. Perry, aptly describes the mood of Californians toward their Governor:

> Californians . . . are tired of hearing about the legendary mattress on the floor and the dates with rock star Linda Ronstadt as well as . . . the potential that lies in everybody's garbage pail.

According to one poll-taker,

> Californians these days have real problems, and they've decided they need a practical, down-to-earth problem solver to deal with them.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the way business has been pushed around in California of late, there certainly is the need for quick and positive action.

The article follows:

LURE OF CALIFORNIA FADES FOR BUSINESS

(By Robert Lindsey)

LOS ANGELES, May 26.—"Housing costs are too high . . . Taxes are too high . . . The transportation system is bad . . . More and more of our young executives won't accept a transfer here."

In a curious echo of the complaints that business and industry began to fling at New York City more than a decade ago, business leaders here say they are alarmed that southern California, once one of the more desirable assignments in corporate America, has lost its luster.

Industry executives say that it is becoming increasingly difficult to recruit personnel in other cities to take jobs here and that more and more executives are refusing transfers here.

Moreover, they say relatively high operating and living costs are stimulating a flow of jobs out of the region and deterring additional employers from locating here.

"If the future doesn't look any better than the recent past, industry will continue to leave the county," Robert Draine, a senior vice president of the Coldwell Banker Company, a real estate concern, told a public hearing on the county's future last week.

NO REPLACEMENTS

"We are not getting the new industrial firms that are willing to move into the county today to replace those that are moving out," he added.

Daniel R. Miller, a senior vice president of Daniel, Mann, Johnson & Mendenhall, an engineering company, said at the same hearing: "We are facing increasing difficulty in attracting top professionals here, or to transfer individuals here from our other offices, because the area is now being perceived as a problem city, one in which it is undesirable to live."

Many Los Angeles County companies, such as the Fluor Corporation, a large engineer-construction concern, have moved south to the open spaces of fast-growing Orange County. But severe shortages of moderate-priced housing are blamed for a labor shortage there that has begun to slow up growth and prompt some companies to leave this suburban refuge.

David Methvin, who founded Computer Automation in a garage with $15,000 10 years ago and built it into a major manufacturer of minicomputers, with $60 million in annual sales, said the labor shortage, a high tax structure and an "antibusiness attitude in California" had prompted him to move part of his operations from Orange County to Austin, Tex.

EXPANDING ELSEWHERE

Still other expansion will occur in Dallas, Portland, Ore., and in Ireland he said.

"We won't expand any more in California; we don't need its problems." he said. "Our ability to recruit people into California and a shortage of labor has become excruciatingly painful in the last year and a half, and it led us to look elsewhere.

"People tell us, 'I can't afford to move to California; the taxes are too high; I'll have to pay twice as much for a house."

"Add that to the antibusiness attitude of the Brown administration and the high taxes and all the government regulation that has helped raise the price of houses, and I think if you took a poll up and down the street here you'd find just about every other electronics company saying the same thing; they can't afford it."

"There's a large exodus of business leaving the state," he said.

Whether or not the administration of Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. has discouraged business is a political issue in the state.

The Governor denies it, citing the creation of almost 500,000 new jobs in the state last year. But, as more decisions such as that by Mr. Methvin have been made, he has repeatedly had to defend himself against assertions that he has slowed the growth of the economy by overly rigid regulations. Candidates in the state's current Republican gubernatorial primary campaign have used this as one of their principal points of attack.

The state's taxes are also a major issue in the June 6 primary election, focused on Proposition 13, which would limit property taxes to 1 percent of the market value of a home and impose strict limits on additional taxes.

Although taxes, growing freeway congestion, the impact of rising gasoline prices on automobile commutation expenses, and other problems are mentioned by industry executives, they say that high prices for housing are the most often cited complaints among people refusing to move here.

Although housing costs have jumped nationally in the past three years at much faster rates than in the past, the rise has been much more spectacular here. The Real Estates Research Council, an industry group, estimated this week that in April the average price of a single-family home sold in this region was $83,200, $27,000 above the national average.

In more desirable areas and communities that middle and senior management executives seek out, costs are much higher, usually beginning at about $150,000. In Orange County, the median price of a new home recently passed $110,000.

"We had one man who worked for a company in Manhattan and lived in Westchester and came out for a final interview with our chief executive officer," a personnel executive for a large insurance company here said.

"He figured his home in Westchester is worth at least $100,000, but when he came here he said he couldn't touch anything comparable for less than $225,000. He got on the plane the next day and said goodbye."

To cope with the problem of employees and potential employees increasingly turning jobs down here, L. D. Norris, manager of employee relations policy and procedures for the Atlantic Richfield Corporation, said his company was considering giving employees an extra cost-of-living stipend during their assignment here, one that would not continue if they were later transferred elsewhere.

Most of the resistance to being transferred here, he said, "involved the high cost of housing and taxes," although he added that he suspected that some people used these as an excuse because they did not want to leave where they were living now.

RAPID PRICE RISE

Mr. Norris said, "Related to some parts of the East, New York and Philadelphia, for instance, costs aren't all that different, but even for people in these areas the rapid run-up in housing prices here has been a serious factor. But in Houston, the South and the Southwest, the difference in housing prices is really substantial."

He said that if employees were willing to drive longer and live in less prestigious communities, it was still possible to buy homes for less than $70,000. But, he added, this often does not satisfy the workers and it sometimes presents sensitive problems in the office if it does.

"One of the problems we are encountering," he said, "is that when new arrivals come out here, they experience peer pressure to live in certain [prestigious] communities."

He said their peers at work had often bought their homes in the early 1970's at much lower prices, before the recent torrid inflation, but the newcomers cannot afford homes in the same areas.

It is not uncommon, Mr. Norris said, for a new employee to find that many of the people whom he supervises live in what is perceived to be a more prestigious community and in a larger home, "and this presents human relations problems." ●

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ABOUT NEW YORK CITY'S FINANCIAL SITUATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, next week the House is scheduled to consider H.R. 12426, the New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978.

The bill would provide Federal loan guarantees for New York City securities to help the city to get back into the municipal bond market.

I am pleased that so many of my colleagues are studying this legislation very carefully and seeking to learn more about New York City's financial problems. To help in this effort, I call to my colleagues' attention a question-and-answer sheet on New York City's financial situation which has been prepared by Mayor Koch's office.

This fact sheet and a brief summary of H.R. 12426 follow:

NEW YORK'S FINANCIAL SITUATION QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

1. Q. What is the City requesting from the Federal government in order to become financially self-sustaining by Fiscal Year 1982?

A. The City is seeking Federal guarantees of $2 billion which could be used either for seasonal loans or for long-term loans to finance true capital projects. These capital projects would protect the revenue base of the City and reduce operating expenses. The guarantees would last up to fifteen years, and the City would pay a guarantee fee of .5% each year on the amount guaranteed.

2. Q. Aren't there more than enough funds within New York to meet the City's financial needs?

A. While there are more than ample financial resources within New York, the ability to lend and the willingness to lend are unfortunately not the same thing. As seen by the failure of the City's Note Offering in November, the private credit markets remain closed to the City of New York, even though the City has repaid its Federal loans on or ahead of schedule and has met all other obligations to its creditors. To overcome the continuing concerns expressed over fiduciary requirements and other issues, the City has requested Federal guarantees of some of its securities which it will market over the next four years.

3. Q. In 1975, the City said the Seasonal Financing Act would be the only financing help it needed from the Federal government. Are there any assurances that the guarantee program is the last Federal financing help the City needs?

A. In 1975, City and State officials believed that the three year Seasonal Financing program would allow sufficient time for the City to balance its budget in accordance with the MAC Act and thereby regain access to the credit markets. Although the City expects such a balanced budget for the Fiscal Year ending June 30, 1978, the market problems were more severe than anyone realized and the City has not been able to sell its securities publicly, as seen in the failure of its Note Offering in November. Part of the problem is that the budget does not conform in all respects to generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP). By Fiscal Year 1982, it will. In addition, the seasonal loan facility did not enable the City to make the capital improvements necessary to attain long-term vitality. Without that vitality, investors lack assurance that the balance between revenues and expenses can be maintained. While no one can predict the future with certainty, City officials believe that the Federal guarantee program will give the City time to achieve a record of balanced budgets while reducing past financing pressures so that it can enter the market on its own strength at the expiration of the proposed four year program.

4. Q. What will be the cost to the Federal government?

A. It is expected that the guarantee will, like the Seasonal Financing Act, produce a profit for the Treasury. This profit will come from the guarantee fee the City is offering to pay the Federal government. The Federal government will have made over thirty million dollars from the Seasonal Financing Act by June 30, 1978 as a result of the premium the City has paid for this facility over the Government's interest cost.

5. Q. What has the State done to help the City?

A. As Secretary Blumenthal said in his testimony, New York State has taken major steps to help. It now advances $800 million annually to provide working capital for the City. It funds 75% of the costs of the City University senior colleges. It is assuming responsibility for funding the City's courts. It established the Emergency Financial Control Board to oversee the City's budgets and borrowings. Most recently, Governor Carey provided the City with $250 million in additional aid to help the City balance its fiscal 1979 budget and he pledged over $75 million to help pay for the transit settlement.

6. Q. Why can't the State guarantee the City's bonds?

A. The State of New York is constitutionally prohibited from lending its credit in this way.

7. Q. Why has the State cut taxes by $750 million if the City needs more help?

A. As previously mentioned, the State has provided $250 million for Fiscal Year 1979 to help the City balance its budget. The tax cut is designed to stimulate economic activity within the State. In the past, businesses left the State because of the heavy tax burden but it is believed that the tax cut will stop or at least reduce the outflow. To the extent this happens, it will benefit the City. Even with the tax reductions, New York will continue to rank as one of the highest in per capita State and local tax collections.

8. Q. When will the City obtain a truly balanced budget?

A. As mentioned, the City has taken many steps to obtain an equilibrium between its revenues and its expenses and it expects to have a balanced budget in the current fiscal year in accordance with the MAC legislation. As outlined in the Four Year Financial Plan submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury on January 20th, the City expects to have a budget balanced in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles in fiscal 1982.

9. Q. Won't a high labor contract make a balanced budget difficult to achieve?

A. The Fiscal 1979 Executive Budget is balanced and provides for a reasonable labor settlement, and the Four Year Financial Plan identifies additional funds for labor costs in the following years without increasing the City's projected budget gap.

10. Q. What is the impact of New York City's financial problems on other localities?

A. One example of the impact of New York's financial situation on other localities became evident shortly after the fiscal crisis became fully public in July 1975. According to Dr. John E. Peterson of the Municipal Finance Officers Association, municipalities in every state experienced increases in the interest rates on the bond sales. He estimated that the added-interest costs of state and local borrowers was $147 million in the first year.

SUMMARY OF H.R. 12426

Short title: New York City Financial Assistance Act of 1978.

Financial assistance: Would provide $2 billion in loan guarantees to New York City, guarantees to be for no longer than 15 years, but could be for short term, thus providing standby seasonal assistance.

Termination: Authority to issue guarantees would terminate June 30, 1982.

Conditions of eligibility:

City must be unable to meet its borrowing needs in the private market or elsewhere—by determination of the Secretary;

City must achieve a true budget balance by the fourth year;

City must achieve budgets balanced according to accounting principles prescribed by Secretary of the Treasury during previous three years;

An independent fiscal monitor must be in place for entire period guarantees are outstanding;

A substantial portion of City's financial needs must be met through commitments from other public or private sources;

Secretary must determine there is a reasonable prospect of repayment of obligations to be guaranteed;

City must agree to an annual independent audit of its books;

Interest rate on obligations must be reasonable and in line with other guaranteed obligations.

Limitation on guarantee amount: The bill would limit guarantees to $2,000,000,000 in principal and accrued interest.

Guarantee fee: Secretary must assess a guarantee fee of at least one-half of one percent of outstanding principal.

U.S. remedies:

In event of default, Secretary is required to withhold Federal payments to City or State as offset against the default.

In event of insolvency or bankruptcy, bill provides that the United States has priority claim over other creditors. Bill does not provide for waiver of this priority claim.

Inspections, audits and reports: Full authority is provided for Treasury to inspect all pertinent documents relating to the City's financial affairs. LEGISLATION TO AMEND SECTION 1002, TITLE 38, UNITED STATES CODE, REGARDING WIDOW'S BURIAL RIGHTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, under current Federal regulations pertaining to burials in national cemeteries, if a veteran's widow subsequently remarries, she automatically relinquishes her right to be buried with her former spouse.

This is unfair in a situation where a widow remarries during her later years, but who upon death wants to be buried with her former spouse.

I am, therefore, Mr. Speaker, today introducing legislation which will remedy this unfair situation, which currently exists in section 1002 of title 38, United States Code. This legislation will not in any way dilute the veteran's benefits or entitlements, and I should think the number of situations this remedial bill will affect would be minimal indeed and, therefore, would cause very insignificant additional costs to the U.S. Government. It will simply grant the possibility—the choice—of being buried with her former spouse.●

FOUR U.S. ATTORNEYS TO TESTIFY AT HELSINKI COMMISSION HEARING ON SOVIET LEGAL THEORY AND PRACTICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, four prominent U.S. attorneys will testify this week before the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe about the current wave of repression in the Soviet Union aimed at human rights activists.

Scheduled to appear at the Commission's hearings are former Attorney General Ramsey Clark; civil rights legal experts, Edward Bennett Williams and Alan Dershowitz; and noted Soviet legal expert, George Fletcher, of the University of California.

The hearings will focus primarily on the legal pretexts that Soviet authorities have used to arrest and try members of Helsinki monitoring groups who have sought to pressure the Soviet Government to comply with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accord. Earlier this month, a founder of the Helsinki monitoring group in Moscow, Yuri Orlov, was sentenced to 7 years imprisonment and 5 years internal exile for alleged anti-Soviet propaganda activities.

Clark, Williams, and Dershowitz have all taken an active interest in aiding the defense of Helsinki monitoring group members Aleksandr Ginzburg, Anatoly Shcharansky, Mykola Rudenko, and Oleksiy Tykhy as well as Orlov. All but Ginzburg and Shcharansky, who are imprisoned awaiting trial, have been convicted and sentenced by Soviet courts, because of their Helsinki-related aitivities. U.S. attorneys have been refused permission by Soviet authorities even to attend the trials of the accused men.

The hearings are scheduled for 9 a.m. Tuesday, June 6 in room 2212 of the Rayburn House Office Building, where two new Commission studies will also be released. The studies include biographical information on Helsinki monitoring group members and background on Soviet law and legal procedures used against them.●

TRUTH IN LENDING—IT IS WORKING FOR AMERICAN CONSUMERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the 10th anniversay of enactment of the original truth in lending bill. This landmark legislation and its important amendments has proved to be the greatest single aid to American consumers than any other credit measure to emerge from the U.S. Congress in recent years.

Prior to truth in lending, consumer awareness of credit terms was remarkably low. Truth in lending required financial institutions to spell out credit terms in full and established stiff civil liability to creditors not complying with the act.

Under truth in lending legislation, for the first time creditors were required to inform borrowers that the 3-percent interest charge per month they were being charged actually meant an annual interest rate of 36 percent. Will Ogburn of the National Consumer Law Center in Boston recently gave an example of how financial institutions disguised true credit terms prior to truth in lending, in an article which appeared in the Washington Post, May 28.

Ogburn said:

Finance companies traditionally charge the highest interest rates. Sometimes, before the Act, you could see a finance company advertisting 8 percent interest on a 36-month loan. But what they didn't say was that the consumer would be charged 8 percent of the full $1,000 for all three years, even though some of the balance had been paid off in the first two years. In fact, the true interest on that loan was 14.55 percent, which was higher than the bank loan at, say 10 percent. But because the finance company didn't have to conform to the same reporting methods, it looked like a better deal.

Truth in lending has effectively stopped such practices by finance companies.

Consumers also had little knowledge and understanding of financing charges on credit cards prior to truth in lending. The Federal Reserve Board conducted a study of consumer awareness of interest rates just before the Truth in Lending Act was enacted, just after enactment and again last year. Awareness of credit card interest rates was raised substantially. Prior to the legislation, only 26 percent of consumers studied were aware of the annual interest rates they paid on credit cards. One year after the law was passed, 63 percent were aware of credit charges and in 1977 that figure had risen to 71 percent.

No one doubts that truth in lending has had an overwhelmingly positive effect on consumers. The Federal Reserve has called the bill "possibly the most important legislation in the credit area."

Since the initial legislation 10 years ago, various amendments have both strengthened truth in lending and effectively dealt with changes in the credit market. In 1970, an amendment was added to prohibit the distribution of unsolicited credit cards, a much needed amendment since the number of credit card users had jumped from 5 million in 1965 to 50 million by 1970.

The truth in leasing amendment to the bill was another greatly needed amendment, passed in 1976. Due to the increase in Americans renting rather than buying their homes, truth in lending requirements were extended to cover leasing agreements.

And now the Senate has voted out another amendment to this legislation, an act called the truth in lending simplification bill. Proponents of the bill maintain that this legislation will aid consumers further by "simplying" credit terms and making them more readily understandable.

I support simplification of truth in lending. However, simplification must be done in a manner which retains all the consumer safeguards available under the legislation as originally passed. The truth in lending simplification bill as reported by the Senate does not achieve this.

Mr. Speaker, I am not of the opinion that omission of credit terms in the name of simplification is of benefit to the consumer. Nor do I believe that eliminating the important right of rescission, the right for a borrower to have 3 days to back out on any agreement in which he gave a second mortgage on his home, is in the best interest of the consumer. Nor is the easing of creditor's liabilities for noncompliance with the law in the best interest of consumers, in fact, it is these very same stiff penalties which have helped make truth in lending such a success in its original form.

All the above provisions are in the bill voted by the Senate May 10. Truth in lending has proved a tremendous success. Countless studies point to the benefits provided under this legislation. Consumer awareness of credit terms has been raised a remarkable degree. In light of the huge success of this law, the logical question is why continue to tamper with this legislation and run the risk of weakening the act. In my judgment, this will be the only effect of the "simplification" of truth in lending as now proposed.●

ZIMBABWE AND UNITED STATES POLICY IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. DIGGS. Mr. Speaker, for the record, I think the following article clearly lays out a perspective on future development in Rhodesia-Zimbabwe that should assist us in arriving at a sober approach to promoting peaceful change and development in southern Africa. Unfortunately, at present the Congress and the administration have allowed a preoccupation with Soviet and Cuban activities in Africa to obscure our real interest in developing a positive and nonideological policy in that continent—one which will reap positive benefits for Africa and America over the long term.

Because of our tendency to react to developments in Africa within the intellectual framework of a persistent anti-Communist mind-set, our diplomatic and aid relations, particularly in southern Africa, risk becoming hostage to our hysteria toward the Soviet Union and Cuba jeopardizing our long-term interests in Africa as a whole. Thus we have continued a negative, nonrecognition policy toward the People's Republic of Angola thereby at least indirectly contributing to the climate of instability engulfing both Angola and neighboring Zaire. And merely because Mozambique adopted a "leftist" course in its sovereign pursuit of its domestic political and economic development, Congress saw fit to place stringent restrictions on administration flexibility in southern Africa by prohibiting economic assistance to Mozambique. This is a good example of the type of congressional restriction that urgently needs to be repealed.

Hopefully, American policy toward Rhodesia-Zimbabwe—as that entity undergoes a difficult and unpredictable transition to real majority rule and independence—will not be intolerant of the course of development that Zimbabweans may deem necessary to pursue in building a new nation. The following article by Roger Ridell from the May–June 1978 issue of Africa Report, in my opinion, offers a timely analysis of development alternatives that may confront a future independent Zimbabwe. Athough the author clearly leans toward a socialist development path for Zimbabwe, he notes—as we should—that in the case of Angola and Mozambique, "Compromises are being worked out to marry the desire of these new states for self-reliance with the need of the companies to make a profit" and that "Dependence on the East also works against the goal of self-reliance" as does total dependence upon the West. This seems to me to offer the type of perspective that should govern future administration and congressional responses to the basic human needs of development in both Zimbabwe and Namibia. It is for this purpose that I recommend the following article to my colleagues:

WHAT ECONOMIC ROAD?

(By Roger Riddell)

A central factor in the current conflict over Rhodesia's future is the economic structure which will emerge in independent Zimbabwe. At the risk of oversimplification, it appears that the supporters of the internal settlement would opt for the present pattern of economic development, with perhaps the introduction of some marginal changes associated, for example, with the removal of racially discriminatory legislation. The leaders of the Patriotic Front, on the other hand, favor a more radical structural change and the establishment of a self-reliant and socialist economic path for Zimbabwe.

The attempt to examine the implications for Zimbabwe of opting for these two very different economic futures is fraught with difficulties. At least two-thirds of the country is covered by guerrillas, and the Rhodesian authorities appear to have abandoned large rural areas in the northeast and southeast of the country. Increasingly, the proponents of radical change and "moderation" have moved further apart. Support for the more radical Patriotic Front forces of ZAPU and ZANU in the rural areas (where 80 percent of the population live) is still high, according to recent reports from foreign journalists and missionaries. There appears at present to be little hope that the internal settlement will lead to a cessation of the fighting, and economic scenarios that paint a rosy picture of early stability leading to economic boom injected with large inflows of Western capital are politically naive.

In 1975 the combinations of the economic effects of the war and the world recession brought a halt to the expansion of the Rhodesian economy. Before then, Rhodesia's capital expansion had been remarkable in the experiences of Third World economies.

In the 20 years to 1975, the economy grew at an annual average rate in real terms of 5 percent; in that year, gross domestic output was valued at $3.2 billion (at present, U.S.$=Rh$0.65) and the population of the country stood at 6.3 million. Primary production accounted for 48 percent of total domestic product with agriculture, mining, and manufacturing contributing 17, 6, and 25 percent, respectively.

The country is now self-sufficient in food production; it produces more tobacco than any country in Africa and it exports substantial amounts of maize, beef, cotton, and sugar as well as tobacco. Rhodesia also has the largest industrial base of any country in Africa, except South Africa. Its extractive mining industry is technologically advanced; it exports chrome (Rhodesian chrome is of the highest quality and Rhodesian reserves account for about one-third of Western reserves), nickel, asbestos, copper, and gold.

Rhodesia has had its own iron and steel works since the 1930s; its electrical power needs are supplied by the huge Kariba dam which is soon to be supplemented by the new thermal power station at Wankie. Finally, the country has a comprehensive road and rail system which links it to the sea via South Africa, Botswana, Zambia, and Mozambique.

When the United Nations imposed economic sanctions in 1965 and the country became legally isolated from the world community, the economy soon revived, and in many ways gained strength in its "isolation." A large number of manufacturing industries have been set up behind an externally imposed protective wall and have prospered because the lack of foreign exchange has curtailed the importation of both capital and consumer goods.

Nor did the imposition of sanctions prevent Rhodesia from exporting her much-demanded agricultural and mining products to world markets, although the need to avoid detection has certainly lowered the price paid to Rhodesian exporters. In some cases, such as with the Byrd Amendment, United Nations sanctions have been blatantly ignored, in others trading has taken place less openly.

By 1975 the value of Rhodesian exports was approximately 60 percent higher than before UDI. Restrictions on the repatriation of profits by foreign companies added further buoyancy to the economy, and in the first 10 years of economic "isolation" real growth was even higher than in the previous 10 years.

But this impressive record has led to the creation of a rigid economic structure which benefits only a tiny minority of the population. Historically, the dynamic productive sectors of the economy have been intricately linked to the developed market economies so as to create an outward-looking, export-oriented and dependent growth path.

During the federal period (1953–1963) foreign capital accounted for over 50 percent of total investment. By UDI in 1965, nearly 70 percent of net profits accrued to foreign companies, and today the percentage is certainly higher. Since UDI, foreign capital has constituted 37 percent of total investment and a far higher proportion of productive investment.

This outward-oriented growth path has helped to create (with the assistance of state intervention) a small highly developed and dynamic modern sector supported by a vast underdeveloped residual sector. This growth path has led to huge benefits for the small white population, which has serviced the growth, and the increasing marginalization of the large African population.

Land has been the key factor in the evolution of Rhodesia's economic structure. Today some 63 percent of the population lives in the Tribal Trust Lands (TTLs) where the vast majority exist in subsubsistence conditions. The average annual income of the 675,000 subsistence farmers in the TTLs is not more than $200.

The Tribal areas are currently carrying three times as many people as they are able to support. Both the grazing land and the cultivated land are in a state of crisis. Over 50 percent of the land is either bare or heavily overgrazed and over 17 times as much land is being used for dryland cultivation as is ecologically desirable.

As one might expect, the Tribal areas are becoming increasingly incapable of feeding their population; starvation is reported, and larger and larger quantities of food are now having to be brought in from the white commercial farms. The growth of "protected" villages (see Africa Report, September–October 1977) has made this crisis situation even worse.

At the other end of the scale is the white population, which consists of only 250,000 people, only 4 percent of the total (a smaller number, it is said, than the number of British people living in California). Half of Rhodesia's land is given over to white occupation, and there are currently 6,682 farms covering 35.7 million acres.

In contrast with the acute overcrowding in the African areas, large areas of white land are either unused or under-ultilized. Much of the white farming is inefficient and the majority of white farmers are only able to survive through the payment of large direct and indirect subsidies. More than 60 percent have such low incomes they do not qualify for income tax payments and in the current financial year, agricultural subsidies and assistance to predominantly white agriculture amounts to $92 million.

Outside agriculture, whites own the local capital, manage the foreign-based enterprises, and hold the top positions in the civil service as well as in service industries. This is well illustrated by the fact that in 1974 the whites contributed over 99 percent of all personal income tax paid in Rhodesia. For this white elite, annual average income is $8,585 and in the last 10 years has increased by over 50 percent in real terms. Most white families enjoy the benefit of low-paid black servants, which has enabled wives to seek employment. Nearly 50 percent of white women work outside the home, so family income is on average far higher than these figures indicate.

Between these two extremes is the African labor force employed in the modern sectors of the economy. The TTLs are not only important because they hide the impoverished majority in the rural areas, but also because they are the source of cheap labor for the rest of the economy.

In 1977, there were nearly one million Africans employed in the modern sectors of the economy. Of these, 40 percent were employed on commercial (white) farms; here the annual average wage was $300, in contrast with an estimated poverty line for a family of six of not less than $900 a year.

In relation particularly to working conditions in this sector, the International Commission of Jurists stated in 1976 that "one of the most blatant forms of modern slavery existing throughout the world (is) the status of certain black workers in Rhodesia" (The Guardian August 11, 1976). The majority of the rest of the African labor force is employed in the urban areas; the average wage paid to these workers in 1977 was $1,100, in contrast with the urban poverty line of $1,652. More than 80 percent of the urban black work force receive incomes below the poverty line.

African workers are able to survive with such low wages because of the accommodating mechanism of the Tribal Trust Lands. The shortfall in necessary income is largely made up through continual support from the Tribal areas: Sometimes food is sent to the urban areas, more commonly a worker's dependants live and are provided for in the TTLs. In this way the development of the modern sectors of the economy and the high wages paid to the elite are built upon the underdevelopment of the Tribal areas and the low wage structure of the blacks.

What is likely to happen if Zimbabwe, while removing overt racial discrimination, encourages the expansion of the present dynamic sectors of the economy and opens the doors more widely to foreign capital to build upon its already entrenched position within the Rhodesian economy?

The present strategy has failed to absorb the present work force into productive employment. In the period of Rhodesia's most rapid economic expansion, from 1969 to 1975, expansion in the modern sectors of the economy led to the creation of about 50,000 new jobs a year. Over this period, the annual level of investment was about $690 million a year. Yet, during this time, the modern sector failed to provide employment for at least 45,000 men and 210,000 women—the potential work force was not being absorbed.

In the next 10 years, some 110,000 new jobs would be needed each year to absorb the growing work force. But for this to occur under the current strategy and with the present composition of capital, even higher levels of investment would be necessary and real growth would have to be at least 11 percent a year, in real terms. For a number of reasons this is highly unlikely to occur.

In the first place, foreign companies, since UDI have been prevented from repatriating their profits abroad, would be likely to lower their rates of reinvestment, particularly in a climate of political instability.

Secondly, there is likely to be increasing pressure to move away from the present institutionalization of subpoverty wages for the black labor force. In 1975, total black wages amounted to $660 million and gross operating profits were $1.51 billion. To double the wage bill (and even then not all employees would be receiving anything like an adequate wage) and channel profits to the provision of essential services, particularly to the rural population, would lead to a drastic cut in present profit levels.

Thirdly, any future economic strategy would need to place far more emphasis on raising the levels of incomes of those living in the rural areas. As the total potential work force cannot be absorbed into modern sector employment, policies would have to include both increasing investment in the Tribal areas and resettlement of the excess Tribal population (at present some 500,000 families) onto the unused and underutilized commercial and plantation land.

A recent estimate shows that at least 75 percent of European land would be needed to accommodate the present excess Tribal population and to enable them to obtain a modest income from the land. But such a resettlement scheme would not only require something like a tenfold increase in investment in traditional agriculture, but would also confront head-on the protection of white property rights which the internal settlement scenario demands as a sine qua non for any future policy. And to complete the circle, a channelling of such high levels of investment to subsistence agriculture would lower the rate of expansion of the modern sectors of the economy.

Other areas significant for the future are the debt problem and the outflow of funds. In the past few years, the present government has not found it possible to increase the general level of taxation, and rising government expenditure has been met through government borrowing. In the current year, the government has borrowed $240 million alone, while in the period 1967 to 1974, public sector borrowing amounted to $590 million.

Under this scenario, a future government would also be committed to repaying its foreign debts to maintain its international credit worthiness. The present foreign debt of the Rhodesian government, payable to bond holders on the London stock market, the British government, and the World Bank, stands at about $189 million. In addition, there may well be a sizable amount of secret debt contracted since UDI. Finally, current pension payments of the government amount to $50 million and current provisions allow for this to be paid abroad.

Then there is the problem of outflows of funds from the country resulting from future foreign capital investments and international loans. In the period 1966 to 1974, new foreign investment of about $384 million was exceeded by outflows of about $600 million. This net outflow of capital will be exacerbated by future foreign investment, however greatly, the need for capital in the scenario demands such investment.

To this the repayment of international loans must be added. The proposed Zimbabwe Development Fund includes the provision of international loans to an independent Zimbabwe government of about $750 million over a five-year period.

All this, plus interest, would have to be repaid in the future—and the experience of Third World countries shows that international debt repayment is now a major economic problem severely handicapping domestic economic policies. Under the present economic path, a future Zimbabwe would have to depend largely on the international price of her mineral and agricultural exports—over which she could exert little control—to meet these debts.

The experiences of Zambia and Kenya, which have both followed policies of export-led growth and an openness to foreign capital, are relevant. Kenya is now facing severe balance of payment problems, domestic inflation, and increasing unemployment—not all of which are attributable to the oil price rises of the early 1970s.

Recent reports from Zambia show that she is experiencing acute difficulties in meeting her external debt obligations. Her debt service ratio rose from 3.1 percent in 1970 to 9.1 percent in 1976 and by 1977 outstanding debt stood at $1.67 billion, amortization was $119.7 million and interest payments were $66.2 million. Although Zambia's problems center on her almost total dependence upon copper exports, the Zambian case should sound a warning for those who advocate export-led growth for a future Zimbabwe.

Finally, and most importantly, this whole "moderate" scenario depends critically upon the ending of the war and the creation of a stable economic climate which would encourage the incredibly high levels of foreign investment and capital necessary to produce a continuous real growth rate of some 11 percent a year.

The war has already led to an acute economic crisis. Gross national product fell by 3 percent in real terms in 1976 and a further 7 percent in 1977. At present the war is costing $1.2 million a day, and accounts for over 40 percent of current government revenue.

In February this year, industrial production was at its lowest since 1971, and by June last year the numbers of African employees had already fallen by 40,000 since two years previously. The crisis is showing in company reports: More Wear, a leading Rhodesian firm, recently reported a loss of $3.5 million over the year, while Cadbury-Schweppes reported a fall in taxed profit of 75 percent.

The Swiss government's recent economic sanctions on Rhodesia have affected exports; for the second quarter of 1978, a 20 percent cut in import allocation for foreign exchange has been announced following a similar cut for the first quarter.

Since the war is unlikely to cease in the short term, a deepening of the current economic crisis can be expected. Not only is the present economic strategy unlikely to solve Zimbabwe's future economic problems, but it seems that the crisis so widely predicted if radical change were to occur has already arrived.

In September last year, commenting on the Anglo-American settlement proposals, the leaders of the Patriotic Front stated the problem of Zimbabwe as the destruction of colonialism and its institutions; the attainment of genuine independence; and the democratization not only of the vote but of all institutions and the way of life in Zimbabwe.

Fleshing this out into its economic implications and incorporating other statements of both Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe, it is clear that a radical change away from settler-colonialism towards a more socialist self-reliant economic structure is being demanded.

For this to take place, radical restructuring of the economy would be necessary. What is demanded is capital expansion which would give the highest priority to providing productive employment for all and channeling the results of growth to the needs of all Zimbabweans—the poor and marginalized as well as the rich. For this to occur, it would be necessary to remove the power that foreign and settler capital have on the present economy, and to shift away from the tight dependence of the economy on the West.

Given the particular structure of the present Rhodesian economy, it would seem that a Zimbabwean socialist economic strategy would aim at the following:

The nationalization of all land, the resettlement of large numbers of peasants onto the unused and underutilized white land, and the creation of a system of communally owned farming units throughout the rural areas. This would provide the basic framework for productive agricultural employment for what is in Rhodesia largely a rural population.

The reorganization of industry so that manufactured goods are geared to mass consumption (food, clothing, housing materials, etc.) rather than to luxury items (expensive furniture, exotic toiletries etc.).

Critically related to this radical restructuring of agriculture and industry is the need to control and change the production processes and financial operations of foreign capital, which has been largely responsible for the present export-led growth strategy that has led to growing inequalities and increasing debt.

Finally, it would be important to narrow the wide differentials in income levels, initially through lowering the vastly inflated incomes of the managerial, industrial, and bureaucratic categories of the work force.

Carrying out such a strategy implies radical changes right through the economy. Not only would such a course of action be vigorously opposed by the small, yet powerful, group of people who gain from the present economic structure (black as well as white), but it would require continued widespread political support and considerable organizational ability for it to be achieved.

Within Rhodesia at the present time, the socialist strategy has been dismissed as unworkable by white businessmen and farming groups and by the daily press. The examples of Mozambique and Angola are cited as evidence of the hopelessness of Zimbabwe attempting to travel along such a path.

Both Angola and Mozambique have undoubtedly faced enormous economic and social problems. They have both attempted radical land reform and changes in their agricultural systems, and Mozambique, in particular, has attempted to initiate a system of communally owned farming units for the rural population.

To date the results have certainly been disappointing: Some peasant groups have tried to resist these changes, food production has dropped markedly, and food is having to be imported. However, many of the problems have been country-specific, not related to strategy as such.

In Mozambique an excessive dry period has hindered progress, while in Angola the failure of commercial agriculture has been largely due to the cessation of seasonal migration from the south of the country. In both countries, however, the future looks brighter: in Mozambique a vigorous new program is underway, aided by large amounts of foreign capital and technical assistance and in Angola hundreds of foreign assistants are helping to boost production of the country's cash crops through training programs.

By comparison, a future socialist Zimbabwe would already have the advantage of a highly developed commercial agricultural sector. As long as production levels on these farms are maintained (probably not more than 2,000 out of the total of 6,682 white farms), then the possibilities for radical change would appear far more promising than in either Mozambique or Angola.

Resettlement onto white land would not be difficult because the overcrowded African lands lie adjacent to the unused and underutilized white areas. The present marketing system could be used as a framework for the future and the trained agricultural extension staff could provide the basis for future extension work.

Controlling both local and foreign enterprises in a socialist Zimbabwe would probably entail the expropriation and nationalization of a large number of operations would have to be made in particular sectors for either longer or shorter periods.

The decision to expropriate would depend upon a whole range of factors such as: the willingness of companies to cooperate with the socialist path of development, the integration of an enterprise in the wider economy, the need to maintain levels of foreign exchange, alternative options for extraction and production, levels and availability of local and foreign expertise, implications of withdrawal.

The control of foreign capital, however, is highly unlikely to lead to the total withdrawal of transnational corporations for the foreseeable future, nor to the cutting off of trade with the West. It has been found to be in the interests of both Mozambique and Angola and of the key foreign companies for these companies to stay. Compromises are being worked out to marry the desire of these new states for self-reliance with the need of the companies to make a profit.

In Mozambique, radical rhetoric has given way to pragmatism, and relations with the West have expanded in recent months. The Angonlan oil industry is in the hands of Western capital, and this sector at present provides some 90 percent of the country's critical foreign exchange earnings.

Western companies operating in Angola include Gulf Oil, Texaco, Fiat, Volvo, and de Beers, while in Mozambique, South African interests still play an important role. Furthermore, trade with Western countries has by no means ceased. Brazil and Portugal are opening up trade with Angola again.

Nevertheless, the dangers of maintaining links with private foreign capital while restructuring the economy away from dependence on the West and export-led growth should not be underestimated. For this reason, both Angola and Mozambique have opened up economic links with the East, to shake off the grip that market forces have had on their colonial economies. The Soviet Union and Cuba are actively involved in Angolan reconstruction, and in both countries East Germany, Romania, Yugoslavia, and Hungary are all providing assistance. Of course dependence on the East also works against the goal of self-reliance.

A future Zimbabwe can expect large inflows of aid from the West as well as from the East to help her particular path of reconstruction. In Mozambique, agricultural development is being financed by $50 million from Scandinavia, while Holland and West Germany are participating in reconstruction as well as all the United Nations agencies.

There can be little doubt that even if the Zimbabwe Development Fund, as envisioned in the Anglo-American proposals with its inherent problems of future international debt, does not operate, Britain and the United States would provide major aid and development assistance in the future.

One problem needing careful consideration in a possible socialist Zimbabwe is the availability of skilled manpower. Between 350,000 and 500,000 Portuguese left Angola around the time of independence, causing a critical manpower shortage and the abandonment of certain enterprises. For Zimbabwe, some Western analysts have argued that a 10 percent loss of skilled whites would bring the economy to the brink of disaster. However, the experience of Angola and the gloom of the pessimists need to be put into perspective.

In the first place, there is already a growing exodus from Rhodesia. In 1977, there was a net emigration of 12,000 whites (some 5 percent of the white population). Thus, there would even be a skilled manpower crisis with the perpetuation of the present economic structures.

Secondly, some 6,000 trained Zimbabweans live abroad at present, many of whom are likely to return once independence is finally achieved. Thirdly, there has always been a considerable amount of on-the-job training in Rhodesia so that black "assistants" are often as skilled as their white counterparts. In addition, one positive effect of the war which has drawn a large proportion of the skilled white labor force away for military service has been the rapid increase and acquisition of skills by black workers left behind to maintain production.

Finally, the experiences of Angola and Mozambique shows that alternative sources of foreign skilled manpower would probably be available both to keep essential services in operation and to run training programs for Zimbabweans. Certainly, however, a strategy which has as one of its primary goals the alleviation of poverty would have to include a relative lowering of salary for the elite, and this raises problems which a socialist government would need to address.

Both economic options for a future Zimbabwe present enormous problems. The first would initially seem to present the most attractive alternative because it entails little structural change; but it offers little chance that the basic economic problems of the country will ever be solved.

The alternative presents an incoming government with huge short-term problems of reconstruction. They are not, however, insuperable and because this second strategy would address the needs of the poor majority, it holds out the greatest hope for the war-weary Zimbabweans.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23, 1978, states that, due to previously scheduled commitments in the 16th District of Texas, I was unable to be present for the vote on final passage of H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. However, on May 19, 1978, the date of that vote, I requested from the Office of Sergeant at Arms to be paired in favor of passage of H.R. 39. I was given a "general pair" with Congressman JOHN MYERS, as indicated on the copy of the pair sheet provided me by the Office of the Sergeant at Arms. This pair was omitted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 19, 1978.●

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE AWARDED HONORARY DOCTOR OF HUMANE LETTERS DEGREE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform my colleagues that my neighbor and good friend to the west in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Mr. CONTE, this past weekend was honored by Georgetown University. Congressman SILVIO O. CONTE was awarded an honorary doctor of humane letters degree at commencement exercises at that school on May 28.

SILVIO CONTE and I came to the Congress together 20 years ago. We have fought many legislative fights together and I have always been proud to be his colleague. He is certainly worthy of this recognition from this fine school. At this time, I would like to insert into the RECORD the citation awarded to Congressman CONTE with his honorary degree:

SILVIO O. CONTE

Born, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, November 9, 1921.

Served with the Seabees, Southwest Pacific Theater, World War II.

Educated, Boston College; Boston College Law School, LL.B., 1949.

Elected to Massachusetts State Senate, 1950; served to 1958.

Elected to 86th Congress, November 1958; reelected to each succeeding Congress.

Member, platform committee, Republican National Convention, 1960, 1964, 1968, 1972, 1976.

Member, House Appropriations Committee, House Small Business Committee.

Ranking Minority Member, House Transportation Subcommittee.

The President and Directors of Georgetown College: To all who shall view these presents: Greetings and peace in the Lord

This man from Berkshire County in Massachusetts is a man who exemplifies the very heart and being of our country. Our country was founded and is carried on by Americans who have risen to political stature because of their determination to study and work and to be deeply perceptive of the needs of their fellow Americans and to struggle for ways to help these needs through governmental process.

Silvio O. Conte went to the local schools in Pittsfield and served in the Armed Services in World War II. Seeing the necessity to further his education, he worked his way through law school. Then his motivation to serve the public led to his being elected a Massachusetts State Senator. After eight years he was elected to the Congress of the United States, representing the First Congressional District of Massachusetts.

In Congress his consistent and amiable drive for the needs of health and education in our nation has gained for him the respect of his colleagues on both sides of the Congressional aisle. His specific interest in the field of mental health has enabled this program to advance and advance. His personal interest as a member of Appropriations Committee has added funds for thousands of patients in need.

In the great spirit of the independence of the Berkshire man, he has again and again helped with legislation for the small businessman. In the international field again and again he has struggled for funds for the neediest nations.

Georgetown in its own perspective of advocacy for the God-given rights of education for all according to the individual's talents and the inalienable right of each to work and prosper as an individual recognizes the singular contribution this man of Berkshire has made toward these ends in his Congressional career, and therefore the President and Directors of Georgetown University proudly proclaim the Honorable

Doctor of Humane Letters, honoris causa

In testimony whereof they have issued these their formal letters patent, under their hand and the Great Seal of the University at Georgetown in the District of Columbia, this twenty-eighth day of May, nineteeen hundred and seventy-eight.

HENRY CABOT LODGE SPEAKS ON LIFE AND WORK OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on April 4 of this year the distinguished former Senator, Henry Cabot Lodge, was a principal speaker at the Marshall Foundation Dinner at the Washington Hilton Hotel honoring the life and work of Gen. George C. Marshall. Senator Lodge was for many years an illustrious Member of the U.S. Senate and voluntarily left the Senate to join the Armed Forces of our country abroad. There he also rendered distinguished and dedicated service. Out of eminent experience and close proximity to General Marshall and his work, Senator Lodge was peculiarly fitted to illuminate the significance of Gen. George C. Marshall the man and Gen. George C. Marshall the architect of the great economic and humanitarian program that saved Europe from communism which bears his name. I had the privilege to attend this dinner.

Most of us who were there had been a part of the Washington picture when General Marshall was such a dominant figure here. It revived tender memories for us all to hear the eloquent and moving address of Senator Lodge which received a stirring ovation. It is well in these critical times that we review the life and career of General Marshall, one of the greatest of all Americans, and what America did through him in the leadership of the free world in war and in peace. No one is better qualified to bring that noble past back to the present than Senator Lodge. I, therefore, ask, Mr. Speaker, that Senator Lodge's address appear in the body following my remarks.

ADDRESS OF HENRY CABOT LODGE

When I look at the last fifty years, I am impressed that life expectancy is up 50%, that the working day has been cut 1/3, and that per capita output has more than doubled. I can never forget the defeat of Hitler's attempt to impose a racist police state on the world in a war of unprecedented scope. I remember that after the war there was the wisdom to build NATO, form the U.N.—and to go to the moon. And, of course, and of unique interest to us—there was the wisdom of General Marshall to invent and then to carry out the Marshall Plan.

Long before there was any thought of European recovery—and while the war was roaring full blast—General Marshall's achievements had been prodigious. As Chief of Staff during World War II he had directed the creation of the World War II Army and Air Force, determined the worldwide strategy for our armed forces and chosen virtually all the Generals. Any one of these accomplishments would have entitled the author to a big place in history. But, after the war, came the Marshall Plan which in sober truth prevented Europe from being overwhelmed. These achievements, in war and peace, justify the statement that General Marshall stands out as the greatest American of the 20th century.

The Marshall Plan laid the economic foundations for a peaceful Western defense against Soviet pressure. It started a generation of postwar economic growth, preventing another depression-and-war cycle like that of the 1930's. A European framework was hammered together within which West Germany and Italy could come back into the free community of the West. For the first time since Charlemagne in the 9th century Western Europe moved towards regional unity manifested today in the Common Market and other European institutions. And for the first time in all history a peacetime community of the nations on both sides of the North Atlantic began to emerge.

The Marshall Plan promoted the security of the United States by strengthening our friends. We did not seek to profit at the expense of a wartorn Europe but rather to relieve its woes. We must not forget the wisdom of that approach. National security is achieved not just by military power—indispensable though that is—but by taking actions which subtract from the number of our potential enemies and add to the numbers and strength of our friends. This thought is typical of General Marshall, by its sagicity, its magnanimity, and its love of his fellow man.

These are but a few examples of General Marshall's achievements. They explain how it was that a man of the quality of the late Ambassador Charles E. Bohlen could say:

"I have never gone in for hero worship, but of all the men I have been associated with, including Presidents, George Catlett Marshall is at the top of the list of those I admire. He had the ability to evoke loyalty, respect and affection of those who had the privilege of working with him. He was a man of integrity. You felt the firmness as if it were written in large letters all over him.

The existence of nuclear weapons introduces a new danger into the world and raises the question of whether we can continue to use methods for nominating our candidates for President which worked well in the past. Public opinion in the future should demand that our candidates for Presidential nominations be drafted instead of emerging from the usual competitive scramble. My reading of history tells me that only two of our Presidents—Washington and Eisenhower—were actually drafted for their first nomination for President. (I omit the many times when a sitting President "drafted" himself for a second term.) The traits which are needed in a President in modern times will undoubtedly not be those which are required in a man who fights for the Presidency in the usual way—such traits as scrappiness, competitiveness and no small amount of artfulness and lust for office. The President in the 21st century will have to be primarily concerned with avoiding nuclear war. His second priority may be to administer the government so that it will actually work in spite of all the roadblocks which over the years have been built into it. Both of those tasks call for talents which are quite different from those which are needed to win a party nomination and to get elected in the usual way. Both require a basic change in public opinion.

Clearly the pressure of our convention system requires the wrong kind of activity by candidates; candidates should concentrate on avoidance of nuclear war and not become absorbed in campaign strategy and tactics. When a truly superior man appears he should be brought to the front by a "college" of eminent citizens of widely different backgrounds especially chosen for the purpose and not be required, as he is by present circumstances, to "jawbone" the delegates.

Is the drafting of men for Presidential nominations at least not worth thinking about? If the public started judging men on their capacity to avoid war, their knowledge of the world and of weapons and their ability to surround themselves with the ablest advisers—instead of on their skill in raising money or their ability physically to withstand the fatigue of campaigns—I believe the country would be safer.

I do not need to tell this audience that the talents I have just mentioned are precisely those which General Marshall had in such abundant measure. Alas, we cannot bring him back to life, but we can at least work to keep his memory green, to educate ourselves on all that he did and the way in which he did it and fit ourselves to act in his spirit.

This, I submit, is one of the goals of our Foundation. All of you here in this room are tremendously busy people. There are many interesting and valuable things which you can do with your time. And yet, I venture the guess that when in the years ahead you look back on your connection with the Marshall Foundation, you will feel that you gave your time and energy for a great cause. It is no exaggeration to say that if, someday, we are able to act as General Marshall would have acted, we will on that day save our country.

He was, of course, an expert on weapons and foreign relations. To suggest how he would deal with the problems which we face in 1978 is speculation, but I believe that he would be concerned by the current arms race with the Soviet Union and, in his oft-quoted phrase would not be "fighting the problem", but would be trying to solve it.

Finally he was an incarnation of loyalty to the American ideals on which our country was founded. These ideals are as good today as they were when the United States committed itself to them in the 18th century. They should underlie all our plans.

I refer, of course, first to the words of the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal" and have "certain inalienable rights" among which are "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness". But I also stress the words written thirteen years later in the Preamble to the Constitution, which I shall now quote. And I shall ask each of you to ask yourself, as I cite each separate phrase, how well we have succeeded—and are succeeding—in making each phrase live.

I quote the Preamble: to "from a more a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic transquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

You may agree with me that we have done better with some than with others. Clearly, the "inalienable rights" of "all men" have not yet been assured: the constutional mandate to "establish justice" has not yet been carried out; and "domestic transquility" does not everywhere exist.

The words of the Preamble are not only adequate, they are also noble. By way of ideals we need nothing more. Otherwise enthusiasm for what is bad will surely triumph over lack of enthusiasm for what is good. This enthusiasm must come from the feelings of the people individually. Without ideals we face the disaster described with such sombre drama by W. B. Yeats in which "the best lack all conviction, while the worst are full of passionate intensity". Light—which is truth—and heat—which is enthusiasm—used to be together. Somewhere along the line they become divorced so that today we have truth without enthusiasm and enthusiasm without truth.

Lincoln in his first inaugural address spoke of "the struggle for maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men; to lift artificial weights from all shoulders; to clear the paths of laudable pursuit for all; to afford all an unfettered start and a fair chance in the race of life."

I close by quoting Lord Bacon. He said: "It is not what men eat, but what they digest, that makes them strong; not what we gain, but what we save that makes us rich; not what men read but what they remember that makes them learned, and not what we preach, but what we practice that makes us Christians. These are great but common truths, often forgotten by the glutton, the spend-thrift, the bookworm, and the hypocrite."

I conclude by saying that these truths are epitomized in the life of General Marshall. They are dependable guides for the future and, our foundation, in our efforts to keep his memory green, does a noble work.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 15

By Mr. CORRADA:

—On page 106, revise section 136(a) to read as follows:

"SEC. 136. (a) WITHHOLDING.—Whenever the Commissioner, after reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing to any State educational agency, finds that there has been a failure to comply substantially with any assurance set forth in the application of that State approved under section 141 or 161, the Commissioner shall notify the agency that further payments will not be made to the State under this title (or, in his discretion, that the State educational agency shall reduce or terminate further payments under this title to specified local educational agencies or State agencies affected by the failure) until he is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until he is so satisfied, (1) no further payments shall be made to the State under this title, or (2) payments by the State educational agency under this title shall be limited to local educational agencies and State agencies not affected by the failure, or, (3) payments to particular local educational agencies shall be reduced, as the case may be. Where partial payments to a local educational agency are continued under this subsection, the expenditure of those payments shall be subject to such conditions as the Commissioner deems appropriate in light of the failure which led to the partial withholding. Pending the outcome of any proceedings under this subsection, the Commissioner may suspend payments to such agency, after such agency has been given reasonable notice and opportunity to show cause why such action should not be taken.

—On page 106, in section 136(C) of title I, insert the following after the second sentence: "In any case in which a State educational agency desires to enter into a compliance agreement, but alleges that full compliance with the requirements of this title is genuinely not feasible until a future date, the Commissioner shall hold a hearing at which that agency shall have the burden of demonstrating that immediate compliance is not feasible. The Commissioner shall provide an opportunity for parents, their representatives, and other interested parties to participate in that hearing. If the Commissioner determines, on the basis of all the evidence presented to him, that immediate compliance is genuinely not feasible, he shall make written findings to that effect before entering into such a compliance agreement with that State educational agency. Any compliance agreement under this subsection shall not be exempt from disclosure under any provision of section 552 of title 5, United States Code."

—On page 373, add a new section 456: "USE OF RECOVERED FUNDS

"SEC. 456. (a) Whenever the Commissioner has recovered funds following a final audit determination with respect to any applicable program, he may consider those funds to be additional funds available for that program and may arrange to repay to the State or the local agency affected by that action not to exceed 75 percent of those funds upon his determination that—

"(1) the practices or procedures of the State or local agency that resulted in the audit determination have been corrected, and that the State or the local agency is in all other respects in compliance with the requirements of that program;

"(2) the State or the local agency has submitted to the Commissioner a plan for the use of those funds pursuant to the requirements of that program and, to the extent possible, for the benefit of the population that was affected by the failure to comply or by the misexpenditures that resulted in the audit exception; and

"(3) the use of those funds in accordance with that plan would serve to achieve the purposes of the program under which the funds were originally granted.

"(b) Any payments by the Commissioner under this section shall be subject to such other conditions as the Commissioner deems necessary to accomplish the purposes of the affected programs, including—

"(1) the submission of periodic reports on the use of funds provided under this section; and

"(2) consultation by the State or local agency with parents or representatives of the population that will benefit from the payments.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commissioner may authorize amounts made available under this section to remain available for expenditure, subject to such conditions as he deems appropriate, for up to three fiscal years following the fiscal year in which the audit determination referred to in subsection (a) was made.

"(d) At least thirty days prior to entering into an arrangement under this section, the Commissioner shall publish in the Federal Register a notice of his intent to do so and the terms and conditions under which payments will be made. Interested persons shall have an opportunity for at least thirty days to submit comments to the Commissioner regarding the proposed arrangement.".

By Mr. McCLOSKEY:

—On page 349 strike out line 1 and everything that follows through line 17 on page 150 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(k) The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare shall not disclose the identity of individual schools, local educational agencies, State educational agencies, or institutions or post-secondary education (as described in section 1202 of the Higher Education Act of 1965) which participate in any Federally funded research study, funded in whole or in part through the Education Division of that Department, which necessitates an assurance of the confidentiality of identity in order to obtain the full and candid response of individuals participating in the study, if such study—

"(1) is limited to a specific sample or selection of such schools, agencies, or institutions;

"(2) is not required of such schools, agencies, or institutions by any statute or regulation pertaining to the Federal education program or programs which are subject of such study for the purpose of any auditing, monitoring, or enforcement duty or procedure;

"(3) is based on the voluntary participation of such schools, agencies, or institutions; and

"(4) is conducted only after a notice describing and justifying the proposed study has been published in the Federal Register for the purpose of obtaining public comment thereon by the officer of that Department initiating the proposal not less than thirty days prior to any action upon the proposal.".

By Mr. VENTO:

Page 2, lines 19 and 20, strike "and the recreation area".

Page 3, lines 2 through 4, strike "and the natural character and the environmental quality of the lakes, streams, and shorelines of the National Recreational Area,".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

COMPLEX NOMINATING METHOD

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to address my distinguished colleagues on a subject that is discussed and debated every 4 years but about which nothing is ever done. I am speaking of the method by which our Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates are nominated by their respective parties to run for those offices.

About a year prior to a Presidential election and for about 6 months afterward, the word is always "reform." Unfortunately, there is not enough time to change the method before the election and too much time after it. So much, in fact, that the ideas, no matter how good they are, are forgotten.

The present nominating method is complex, frustrating, time consuming, and very costly. In 1976, there were 30 separate State nominating primaries lasting from February to June. Currently, there is talk of expanding that number to 40 in 1980. Clearly, the situation is getting out of hand.

Another flaw in the system is that the people are not directly responsible for nominating their party's respective candidates.

We elect delegates to the national conventions who, in turn, nominate their party's candidates for the two highest offices in our land. Personally, I believe it would be much better in every sense of the word if the nominations were done by the voters themselves.

For these and other reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the "National Presidential Direct Primary Elections Act of 1978." It is the purpose of my bill to both eliminate the inequities in the present system and to greatly simplify it. This can be done with relative ease with little or no interference with any current Federal election law.

Rather than allowing the 30-plus States to have individual primaries, my bill calls for every State to have a primary on the same day, along the same lines as the general election in November. This shall occur on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in May. With this system, there is no need for conventions or the maximum amount of $2 million for which a political party can qualify to hold such an event.

By using such a system, as I am proposing, we are providing the people of this country with a direct voice in choosing their leaders. This is the purest form of a democracy that can be obtained in the United States.

My bill also provides for a simple method of qualifying oneself for inclusion on a ballot of a particular State. It is based on regions of the country that are nearly equal in population. It also includes an alternative qualifying procedure, both of which allow for all political parties, no matter how minor, to participate in the system.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read this short, simple bill for the sake of the people they represent. Further, I ask that the committee to which it is referred take action on it as soon as possible. Thank you.●

OFFICIAL U.S. NEGOTIATING TEAM TO VISIT ADEN

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, for 4 long years I have been encouraging in every way possible the resumption of diplomatic relations between the United States and the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen—a small but strategically important country located on the Arabian peninsula at the mouth of the Red Sea.

In that endeavor I have journeyed to Aden twice and held countless conferences with U.S. and Aden officials—citing the growing importance, of Aden, in light of military and political developments on the Horn of Africa.

From my first experience with President Salem Rubyai Ali in 1974 and during two subsequent interviews with him, I have been convinced of the desire of the Aden Government to establish a cordial relationship with the United States. In fact, during my most recent talk with President Ali in January of this year in Aden, he dictated a warm personal message which I delivered personally to President Carter.

From this review, you can imagine my satisfaction and joy at having the privilege of announcing that Aden will welcome a U.S. negotiating team later this month. The team will consist of four senior officials of the U.S. State Department, who will be authorized to discuss U.S.-Aden affairs, including the resumption of diplomatic relations. I have confirmed the facts with the Aden mission at the United Nations, New York.

The first sign of friendship occurred in May, 1974, when President Ali granted my request by releasing into my care a constituent Ed Franklin of Pike County, Ill., who had then served 16 months of a 5-year sentence on a spy charge. Franklin was a victim of circumstance, convicted because, as a tourist, he unintentionally photographed a security area in Aden.

A few months later President Ali responded to another of my requests releasing two other U.S. citizens from prison. Last September President Ali visited New York to participate in United Nations deliberations and told me, in an interview, that his government would welcome improved relations with Washington.

It has always been my view that diplomatic relations are mutually beneficial, offering advantages to both governments. They are a convenience, indeed a necessity to effective work for peace and understanding.

The opening of a U.S. diplomatic mission in Aden, which I hope will soon be a reality, would make possible a new avenue for U.S. influence for peace and stability in a region where Soviet influence is substantial.

The U.S. mission was closed on demand of the Aden Government in 1969 in the wake of a Middle East crisis.●

NATURAL GAS PRICING AGREEMENT WILL DISCOURAGE DOMESTIC PRODUCTION

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, only on a few rare occasions does one find a concise but yet accurate analysis of Federal energy policy and the implications of this policy on domestic energy development. Prof. Lawrence J. White of the New York University Graduate School of Business Administration recently provided us with such an occasion in a letter to the editor of the New York Times concerning natural gas pricing. In case my colleagues missed Professor White's excellent analysis of the recent natural gas pricing agreement reached by the House/Senate energy conferees, I ask that it be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The letter follows:

[From the New York Times, May 21, 1978]

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor:

The current legislation before Congress to deregulate natural gas prices may well prove to have counter-productive effects. By allowing for a gradual increase in prices between now and 1985, with free market prices to reign after that date, the legislation could set back the cause of deregulation for many decades.

If natural gas prices reach free market levels in 1985, they must necessarily rise faster than the free market price between now and then; whether this faster rise occurs smoothly over the seven years or occurs all in one jump in 1985 is irrelevant to the reasoning that follows. Finally, assume for the sake of argument that the free market price of natural gas and the costs of exploration and drilling increase at roughly the annual inflation rate.

Now, consider the incentives of a natural gas producer who is planning his exploration and drilling activities: Each year between now and 1985 he asks himself, "Should I explore and drill this year, or wait until next year (or until 1985)? And, if I find any natural gas, should I sell it this year or store it until next year (or until 1985)?" And the answers are clear: He wants to hold off selling the natural gas until 1985. Remember, unlike normal manufacturing output, this is a non-renewable resource; one cannot sell the same cubic foot of natural gas twice. So, selling that cubic foot in 1985, when the price has risen faster than the general inflation level, will always be more lucrative than selling it in any earlier year.

Our producer's first choice would be to explore and drill today, at today's drilling costs, then cap the well and wait until 1985 to sell the gas. If drilling and capping is considered politically unacceptable, then he may wait until 1983 or 1984 before he starts his exploration and drilling. Or, if delays in exploration and drilling are somehow not possible, he will surely find many excuses for delaying as long as possible (until 1985) in his efforts to bring the natural gas to market.

In short, by promising deregulation by 1985, Congress has eliminated any incentives to bring new natural gas to market between now and then. I greatly fear that in 1983 or 1984, when there has been no supply response (or perhaps even the perverse supply response suggested above) to Congress's "generous" gradual price increases, Congress may well conclude, "Aha! See, price increases do not work. There has been no supply response." And Congress will reinstitute regulation.

Introducing changes gradually rather than abruptly may normally appear to be sensible public policy. But here, as we have demonstrated, it will lead to perverse results.

The only sensible policy for natural gas is to deregulate immediately. Today. Or tomorrow, for sure. If the effects on consumers need to be cushioned or spread out, short-term (and strictly short-term!) Federal tax credits or subsidies to consumers are the proper policy response.

Associate Professor.●

FATHER JUDGE SCHOOL ROWS TO VICTORY

HON. RAYMOND F. LEDERER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues a momentous event in student rowing competition. Father Judge High School, from my home city of Philadelphia has a courageous crew of young men. They have struggled and trained and competed but were not able to take the championships.

In the true tradition of American competitiveness and fortitude the teams have made their first mark in city competition.

The resolution of the Judge Crew Boosters Club details the triumph of this fine school. I ask that this resolution be included in the RECORD here in tribute to the dedication and fine achievement of these young men:

Let these facts be known, that the Father Judge High School, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, has a rowing team;

That after many years of hard, strenuous training and many frustrations and near wins;

That finally the break-thru came in this year of 1978;

That the Varsity; Junior Varsity; Third Eight; Fourth Eight; Novice Eight and supporting squads; won individual and collective events, resulting in

That the Father Judge Crew won the Manny Flick's; the Philadelphia City Championship and the Catholic League Championship;

And that the Father Judge Crew has been offered and accepted invitations to row in the Stotesbury Cup Regatta, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania and the Schoolboy Nationals Regatta, Princeton, New Jersey;

Therefore, we the Judge Crew Boosters Club offer our heartiest congratulations and our continued co-operation in the future years.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
Judge Crew Boosters Club.●

APPROPRIATIONS BILL FOR 1979 FOR STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE AND RELATED AGENCIES

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a subject related to my remarks of last Thursday in which I advocated a one-third reduction in the Federal Trade Commission's budget request for fiscal year 1979. As I predicted, my suggestions have met with varied reactions from complaints that I would cripple the Government's consumer protection mission to suggestions that I was allowing the Commission too much money. For my part, I welcome any controversy my remarks may have created because I believe that, through such controversy, Congress can begin the long overdue process of examing closely the costs and benefits of the FTC's activities, as well as those of other regulatory agencies.

What I have to say today may also be considered controversial by some, because it involves the Chairman of the FTC, Michael Pertschuk, who is certainly no stranger to controversy, and a controversial amendment to the FTC's appropriations bill. I am speaking of the provision which would prevent the FTC from banning advertising for any product the ingredients of which are regarded by the Food and Drug Administration as being "generally recognized as safe" (GRAS) for their intended use. The provision concerns the FTC's rulemaking proceeding against children's advertising and is intended to prevent the FTC from banning nondeceptive advertising for products containing sugar, unless and until sugar is deemed unsafe by the FDA.

Shortly after this amendment was introduced in the FTC's Appropriations Subcommittee, Mr. Pertschuk was lobbying members of that subcommittee in an attempt to have the amendment defeated. I do not question Mr. Pertschuk's integrity or the inherent propriety of his conduct in this matter. On the contrary, I believe that it is in the highest national interest that Congress, as well as other decisionmakers, hear from as many sources as possible concerning the matters before them.

However, the FTC, like many other governmental agencies, has a rule which proscribes discussions of matters pending before that agency between commissioners and persons not employed by the Commission. See 42 Fed. Reg. 60563 (1977), amending 16 CFR § 1.18(c). Where FTC trade regulation rules are concerned, this proscription takes effect when the notice of the rulemaking is published in the Federal Register. As you are no doubt aware, the notice of the children's advertising rule was published in the April 27, 1978 issue of the Register, 43 Fed. Reg. 17967, and the amendment was not introduced until mid-May.

Now, as I indicated above, I personally favor communications between Congress and the agencies. I believe that we have gone too far in our efforts to protect the integrity of the administrative process when I, as an elected representative of the people, cannot discuss with an agency official a matter which is likely to have a substantial effect on those people.

At this time, I will argue only that as long as we are going to have these so-called ex parte rules, they should be applied in an evenhanded manner. That is, if I and my colleagues are unable to discuss a pending rulemaking proceeding with Mr. Pertschuk, then he should not be able to do so with us.

Yes, as I understand it, that is precisely what Mr. Pertschuk has been doing in connection with the amendment concerning children's advertising. He has lobbied members of the subcommittee about the amendment arguing in essence that the FTC should be allowed to continue to consider banning advertising for sugared products in its rulemaking proceeding.

Would such conduct be justified in light of the clear proscription of the Commission's ex parte rule? At the very least, Mr. Pertschuk, as required by the ex parte rule, would be required to place in the rulemaking record memorandums summarizing his discussions.

I point out in Mr. Pertschuk's defense that the FTC's ex parte rule proscribes only communications about the merits of a pending rule. Since I have not been privy to his discussions with members of Congress, Mr. Pertschuk's defenders might suggest that I should not make assumptions with respect to their contents and assume that they involved improper subjects. Before I respond to this hypothetical argument, let me reemphasize that I not wish to ascribe any improper motives to Mr. Pertschuk or, least of all, to my distinguished colleagues with whom he has met in recent weeks.

Nevertheless, it appears to me that virtually any communication about the amendment—and certainly any attempt to influence the decisional process—would necessarily impinge upon the merits of the FTC's proposed rule. This is because one of the central issues concerning both the proposed rule and the amendment is the safety of food products containing sugar. In fact, the FTC has identified five sets of questions relating in varying degrees to this issue. See 43 Fed. Reg. 17969–70. One such question deals specifically with a study authorized by the FDA concerning the subject. Similarly, the primary reason in favor of the amendment is that the FDA's determination with respect to the safety of sugar should be binding upon the FTC. In short the two matters are so closely intertwined that it would be virtually impossible to discuss the advisability of either without involving the merits of the other.

Moreover, Mr. Pertschuk has indicated in his public statements that he favors banning certain types of children's advertising—including that for highly sugared foods. It seems unlikely that Mr. Pertschuk, as a human being fighting for a project in which he believes very strongly (at one point he stated that Congress would have to "cut off his arm" to get him to stop this project), would be able to withhold his opinions as to what he considers to be a pressing need for a ban on advertising.

Finally, I note that, in issuing its ex parte rule, the FTC stressed the appearance of impropriety which it would eliminate, 42 Fed. Reg. 60561 (1977). In a similar vein, Mr. Pertschuk, stated during his confirmation hearings that ex parte communications are to be avoided because, ". . . cynicism and public skepticism of the integrity of Government is at a fever pitch, and I believe that it is essential for Government servants to scrupulously avoid even the appearance of collusive relationships." Bureau of National Affairs, 1977 Antitrust & Trade Regulation Reports, No. 808, at E–1.

In my view, few things are so likely to intensify this climate of cynicism and skepticism as a "double standard" by which persons outside the FTC are forbidden to communicate with the chairman about a pending matter—regardless of how strong or pure their interest in that matter—whereas, the chairman is free to communicate with such outsiders when it suits him. I call upon Mr. Pertschuk now to return to the principles he announced in his confirmation hearings by refraining from any further discussions of the appropriations amendment with the Congress and placing on the public record summaries of all conversations he has had thus far on the subject. In the alternative, I would suggest rescinding and modifying the ex parte rule, but, as I said, that is the subject of another speech.●

THOROUGHLY PROFESSIONAL SOLDIER CALLS IT QUITS

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, USA (Retired) spoke today at the Army-Navy Club under the auspices of the American Security Council. Therefore it is entirely appropriate to include a somewhat condensed version of his career in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As the title of the news story from the Atlanta Journal of June 1, 1978, indicates, he is a professional's professional with some very unique qualifications. The story follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal, June 1, 1978]

"THOROUGHLY PROFESSIONAL SOLDIER" CALLS IT QUITS

IN THREE WARS AND 29 ASSIGNMENTS, GEN. SINGLAUB BUILT A CAREER FEW CAN MATCH

His khaki uniform is crisp and plain. Just a combat infantryman's badge, aviator wings and a master parachutist badge. On his shoulder is a ranger stripe, and on his collars the twin stars of a major general.

It is the last time he will wear those stars and that uniform. He is retiring after 35 years, four months and 17 days in the Army.

John K. Singlaub didn't go to the "trade school," as West Point is known in the service, but in three wars and 29 assignments the University of California graduate built a career few can match.

Commissioned at the height of World War II in January 1943, he immediately volunteered for paratroop duty, and eight months later joined the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), the forerunner of the CIA.

In early 1944, Singlaub led a three-man team into Nazi-occupied southern France, where he helped organize and train French resistance units. The following year, he was in charge of an OSS team training Chinese guerrillas along the border of Japanese-held Indochina.

Just before the Japanese surrendered, Singlaub led a parachute team onto the island of Hainan in the Gulf of Tonkin, where they rescued 400 Allied prisoners.

At war's end, he was dispatched to Manchuria as an Army liaison officer, his cover for intelligence duties.

Manchuria was in turmoil in those early months of 1946. The Russians, who had swarmed into the eastern provinces in the final days of war, were finally pulling out and systematically looting as they went.

"They went around marking every piece of Japanese equipment either 'da' or 'nyet', depending on whether they wanted it or not," he recalls. "By the time I got there, everything was marked 'nyet.'"

As the communist forces spread through Manchuria, Singlaub was forced to shift his intelligence operations south to Peking. He was barely able to sustain a network in Korea because Gen. Douglas McArthur's intelligence officer, Maj. Gen. Charles A. Willoughby had no use for the OSS/CIA.

"For a time, even when I would send an officer to Seoul on leave to establish a safe house (for agents), they were detected by Willoughby's people and thrown in the clink, and I would have to get them out," he recalls.

When the Korean War broke out in 1950, Singlaub spent a year as second in command of the CIA mission in Seoul.

Following assignments in the U.S. and Germany, he returned to Asia in 1966, this time as a colonel commanding a special operations unit in Vietnam which undertook espionage, long-range patrols, infiltration and sabotage.

After another tour of duty in Germany and stateside assignments in Texas, Washington and Denver, Singlaub was assigned to Korea as chief of staff to the U.S. commander and senior U.N. military member of the negotiating team at Panmunjom.

Following his recall by President Carter in 1977, Singlaub was named chief of staff for Forces Command (FORSCOM) at Fort McPherson in Atlanta.

He is retiring at 57 and looks forward to settling his family into the home he is building in the high mountains of Colorado. But he will not rest.

His figure is trim from tennis and skiing and his eyes are restless under a close crewcut.

As a fellow officer once said, "Jack Singlaub is a thoroughly professional soldier." ●

REDLINING: INSURANCE CRISIS IN URBAN AMERICA

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, the insurance industry in the United States controls hundreds of billions of hard-earned dollars. This industry affects each and every American citizen either directly or indirectly, and usually both. We need liability insurance, life insurance, fire and homeowners insurance, title insurance on our homes; businesses need general liability insurance, product liability insurance, professional malpractice insurance, property insurance, and a host of others too long to list.

Congress has paid little if any attention to this industry, however, despite clear and convincing evidence that the American public is not receiving the kind of services it should from a business this important. I have sought, in a number of ways, to point out how important it is that we look into the questions involving this industry in great detail.

Recently the Washington Post reported on a study just released by the Department of Housing and Urban Development concerning allegations of "redlining" by insurance companies with regard to homeowners and other forms of property insurance. The study found that this practice is extremely widespread; that insurance companies grant or deny insurance based solely on geographic location, something that we have forbidden banks and other financial institutions to do with respect to mortgages. I might point out that failure to prevent redlining by insurance companies effectively permits continuation of the same practices by those institutions that do give mortgages, in that they will rarely do so unless the buyer is able to obtain property insurance coverage.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this issue warrants our careful attention, and I commend the Post article and the HUD study to my colleagues. The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 31, 1978]

HUD: INSURANCE REDLINING WIDESPREAD

(By Susanna McBee)

Insurance industry redlining is widespread in inner-city areas and often extends "far beyond blighted urban areas into many otherwise healthy neighborhoods," the Department of Housing and Urban Development has charged in a new report.

The report also concludes that redlining "has an undeniable racial component," and that redlined areas "often coincide with nonwhite neighborhoods."

Insurance redlining is the practice of refusing to provide insurance for property because of its location.

The report called insurance redlining "a kind of arbitrary, guilt-by-association indictment of entire neighborhoods or even cities that excludes many decent risks from access to a free insurance market. It is by indirection choking credit and the means to maintain healthy core urban areas today in the nation." It said such redlining is sometimes done on the basis of zip codes.

Ronald W. Vinson, vice president for Washington relations at the Insurance Information Institute here, challenged the report's conclusions and said HUD "wants to blame the insurance industry for all the ills of urban areas."

He charged that the study on which the conclusions of the report were based is "not very extensive and was put together in a hurry."

Vinson denied that insurance companies discriminate by race, but said they do take into account age of buildings, condition of neighborhoods and income level.

He said that redlining "may or may not" exist in the 23 states that have no programs for assuring property owners in high-risk areas access to insurance. But he said that, by definition, redlining does not exist in the other 27 states and the District of Columbia that do have such programs, known as FAIR plans.

FAIR plans insure about 900,000 structures in those 28 jurisdictions, but in only three states—Wisconsin, Massachusetts and Rhode Island—do they provide homeowner coverage at affordable rates, the HUD report said.

HUD noted that insurance coverage under New York's FAIR plan costs three to five times more than conventional insurance. Companies in Virginia also can charge up to 25 percent more for FAIR plan insurance, but in Maryland and the District of Columbia, rates are comparable with regular insurance, Vinson said.

Vinson noted that the HUD report does not contain legislative recommendations and said the Office of Management and Budget "refused to allow the recommendations to go to Congress."

However, Gloria Jimenez, HUD's federal insurance administrator, whose staff prepared the report, said, "OMB felt the report is strong enough and doesn't need recommendations."

It was understood that HUD proposed that FAIR plan rates be set no higher than private market rates and that the Justice Department raised antitrust objection to the proposal. The Housing Banking Committee has approved a measure incorporating the proposal, but the Senate Banking Committee has not.

The report, entitled "Insurance Crisis in Urban America," was released last week.●

FLAWED NATURAL GAS INCENTIVE

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I enter into the RECORD today a letter which appeared in the New York Times of Thursday, June 1, 1978, from Joel R. Jacobson, commissioner, New Jersey Department of Energy. Mr. Jacobson makes two good points about the deregulation of natural gas. The first is that gradual deregulation will not produce additional gas because producers will simply sit on the wells until the lid is off altogether.

Second, he makes the point that the major oil companies are doing very well now and, in fact, have excess cash which they are not using to promote exploration or development but are expanding into other areas such as department stores, copper mining, newspapers, insurance companies, trucking, and retail grocery chains.

The industry has every right to diversify and, indeed, has an obligation to its stockholders to do so. But let us not be misled by claims that they need additional profits which to provide more incentives for drilling. The facts indicate that the contrary is true.

[From the New York Times, June 1, 1978]

FLAWED NATURAL GAS INCENTIVE

To the Editor: Prof. Lawrence J. White has argued (letter May 21) that gradual deregulation will not produce new natural gas resources because producers will still find it more profitable to keep the natural gas in the ground until total deregulation becomes effective in 1985.

I agree with Professor White's analysis, but disagree that the solution is deregulation today, or at the very latest, tomorrow.

When the Federal Power Commission raised the wellhead price of natural gas from 52 cents per thousand cubic feet to $1.42 per thousand cubic feet in 1976, it authorized a 16.98 percent return on equity—a most handsome reward, indeed—for natural gas producers.

Today, Congressional conferees are talking about an increase as high as $4.50 per thousand cubic feet. One can calculate easily the imputed return on common stock investment if this escalating price were to be reached.

Nonetheless, the American Petroleum Institute and all of its members continue to assert that deregulation and higher costs are necessary in order to provide the "incentive" to drill for new resources.

The truth is that major producers are engulfed by a massive cash flow and are casting about for interesting diversions for their money. In 1977, the industry's cash flow amounted to more than $30 billion. Its return on invested capital jumped 30 percent. The 15 largest oil companies earned $10.7 billion, after taxes, for a 14 percent average return on invested capital.

But, are the oil companies drilling with these ample capital resources? It appears not. Mobil has bought Montgomery-Ward, Exxon has bought a copper mine, Atlantic Richfield has bought a newspaper and electrical conduit manufacturer, Tenneco has bought an insurance company, an almond orchard and Sunoco has bought a trucking firm and retail grocery chain.

I agree that in a free enterprise system, the major oil producers have a perfect right to diversify.

I would suggest, however, that they demonstrate the common decency and good grace to finance these new investments by drawing upon the capital resources of their stockholders, not by adding still higher costs upon the already overburdened ratepayers.

RETIREMENT OF NATHANIEL PLAFKER AFTER 42 YEARS OF SERVICE TO EDUCATION

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the story of an educator in my congressional district whose dedication and creativity has improved the lives of many of my constituents. Mr. Nathaniel Plafker is retiring after 42 years of service in public education. His retirement dinner will be tomorrow, June 3, and hundreds of his friends and colleagues will share their love and respect for Mr. Plafker at the Ramada Inn in Essington, Pa.

Mr. Plafker has spent his life as a teacher and administrator in public school systems of Delaware County. He is known as a person of great integrity and intellect, and equally as an educator who puts the needs of children first in priorities. His educational service has been spent as a practitioner, working closely with students and teachers. He has served as teacher, principal, acting superintendent—in a small district, and now as the No. 1 assistant—with duties from curriculum to special education to personnel—in a medium-size district.

In his file there is a letter from one of the most talented music teachers in the profession. This letter was written at the time the teacher moved from the small district where Mr. Plafker was acting superintendent on to a very large district. The letter was written 6 years ago, and I am sure that this person would be happy for me to share some of the comments:

. . . I've always thought that the positions of principal and superintendent must be lonely jobs—growing more remote as you advance professionally. And yet, YOUR door was always open! I wonder if you realize how unusual that is—how many administrators hide behind their doors with buffering assistants and red tape. People know that they really matter to you; that you really care about your staff and the students and the community. I've never heard you double-talk or talked with you when you didn't listen and try to understand. We did not always agree, but I respected your judgment, not just because you were "the Boss," but because you respected me and my opinions also. . . . It's strange how many people I have met in education who know you, and always the reaction is the same—"Nat Plafker is an exceptional man, and one of the few men I have ever met who possessed complete integrity."

Mr. Plafker began his teaching career in Chester in 1936, after graduating from Temple University. In Chester he served as first principal of Pulaski Junior High School when it was new. He was a teacher and an administrator in the Chester school system until 1963 when he became assistant principal of Penncrest High School in the Rose Tree Media School District. In 1965 he came to the Yeadon School District as principal of the high school. He served as supervisory principal and acting superintendent from 1969–72, the year Yeadon schools were merged with Lansdowne-Aldan and Darby-Colwyn to form the William Penn School District.

Dr. Mark C. Nagy, superintendent of William Penn District, commented at the school board meeting when the retirement was announced that—

Without Mr. Plafker's dedication to excellence, our district would not have attained its high level of educational quality. It has been a constant source of satisfaction and comfort for me to know that this outstanding person has riveted his attention on all aspects of our instructional program.

Mr. Plafker grew up in Chester where the Plafker family was renowned for their service to the city. During World War II, he served on the War Rationing Board and in 1944 was named chairman of Ceiling Price Panel. He received the Rotary Club's "Distinguished Service Award" for outstanding service to the Chester School District in 1945. He also received "Man of the Year Award" at Ohev Shalom Synagogue, where he is a member.

As the No. 2 administrator in William Penn, Mr. Plafker has many responsibilities including interviewing prospective teachers. He introduced a new requirement for candidates 2 years ago—a writing sample on the application form in order that he might see how well the persons could communicate in writing.

He is known for his strong feelings about accountability on the part of educators—and students and parents.

Last year in a presentation on the goals of education, he referred to the lowered SAT scores in the Nation, especially the inability of college freshmen to write a coherent, well-structured sentence. He said that—

. . . it behooves us as educators, if we are going to be accountable, to stop seeking and making excuses, sweeping concern and criticism under the proverbial rug and begin at once to address these weaknesses and these trends.

Not being one given to words without follow-up action, Mr. Plafker has been closely involved with making reading, writing, and the language arts skills the priority in William Penn School District. He has been insistent that in-service be provided so that teachers are sure of their materials and understand the requirements.

Equally emphasized are his strong beliefs about education being concerned with human values as well as basic skills. Recently, he stated:

The schools are accountable for teaching children reading and mathematics. That is a priority. But let me add, so that there is no misunderstanding of our opinion regarding educational goals, that priorities for public education must also include self-esteem of students, understanding of democracy by actual participation in the classroom, appreciation of people with different viewpoints, development of fine arts talents as basic skills, and respect for honesty and integrity.

Such goals are appropriate for public education. However, let it be clearly stated that these goals cannot be attained by teachers and administrators alone. Community support through tangible involvement and participation is VITAL.●

NINTH ANNUAL MEMORIAL DAY

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, Triton High School in Runnemede, N.J., recently conducted its ninth annual Memorial Day program on May 26, 1978.

This southern New Jersey school is unique in that it has constructed a beautiful monument in its courtyard to honor eight former students who died in the Vietnam conflict.

The memorial project was initiated during the height of the Vietnam war demonstrations that unfairly castigated the young men who fought and died in that bitter episode.

The intent of the faculty committee that conceived the idea was to instill into the student the fact that the sacrifices of the young men who fought in Vietnam deserve our gratitude and respect, regardless of the controversy about the validity of America's role there.

The student body, the school staff, and members of the community joined in a variety of fundraising activities that led to the construction of the memorial with most of the student body in attendance. The school band, a choral group, and a military detachment also participated in the ceremony in addition to guest speakers.

The former students who made the "supreme sacrifice" honored on this occasion are:

James X. Glich, class of 1964.
John H. Haley, Jr., class of 1966.
Robert J. Lazaro, class of 1965.
Douglas M. Soroka, class of 1966.
Francis J. Hayes, Jr., class of 1966.
Eugene J. Hill, Jr., class of 1967.
Walter Demsey, class of 1967.●

EXTENDING GUN CONTROL ACT

HON. BILLY LEE EVANS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. EVANS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as we anticipate consideration of the appropriation bill for the Treasury Department, I feel compelled to call the attention of my colleagues to an attempt by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to expand the provisions of the Gun Control Act of 1968 into unauthorized areas without Congressional authorization or approval.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when Congress needs to reassert its legislative authority and stem the flow of legislation by regulation it seems especially important that we consider the following information prior to approval of the budgetary requests of the Treasury Department.

SECTIONS 926 AND 923 OF TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE DO NOT AUTHORIZE THE REGULATIONS PROPOSED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY ON MARCH 21, 1978

Section 923 (g), a part of the Gun Control Act of 1968, establishes a regulatory inspection system which has been upheld by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Biswell 406 US 311 (1972), as being carefully limited in time, place, and scope. It provides that:

1. Licensed importers, manufacturers, dealers, and collectors shall maintain records of importation, production, shipment, receipt, sale or other disposition of firearms and ammunition.

2. The licensees "shall make such records available for inspection at all reasonable times, and shall submit to the Secretary such reports and information with respect to such records and the contents thereof as he shall by regulations prescribe;" and

3. "The Secretary may enter during business hours the premises (including places of storage)" of the licensees for the purpose of inspecting or examining the records required to be kept and any firearms or ammunition stored on the premises (emphasis supplied)

It is obvious that this regulatory inspection scheme contemplates that the Secretary obtain information from licensees concerning importation, production, shipment, receipt, sale and other disposition by personal visits of his agents to the premises of the licensees. To carry out the statutory plan, the Secretary is given the extraordinary power to enter the premises of these private businesses without a warrant or other judicial order.

It would be unwise to conclude that the authority given the Secretary to prescribe that reports be submitted with respect to the records maintained by the licensees, empowers him to require that a record of every firearm henceforth manufactured and every subsequent disposition of it be transmitted to the Government for centralized computerization. The word submit, importantly, is defined in Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary for 1977, as meaning "to yield to governance or authority" and "to make available".

It is more consistent with the statutory scheme, and with inspection schemes in other statutes,[1] to view the section as requiring the maintenance of reports, as required by regulation, for submission to the Secretary's agent when inspections are conducted.[2]

The statute also does not confer power on the Secretary to take away records, although he can probably do so in those cases where he is able to establish that they constitute evidence of a crime.

This interpretation is consistent with Section 922(m) which enumerates the ways in which Section 923 can be violated. Section 922(m), in declaring what is unlawful, refers only to records which licensees are "required to keep pursuant to Section 923 . . . or regulations promulgated thereunder". (emphasis supplied) Nothing is said suggesting that Section 923 can be violated by a failure to send in a report for centralization. Similarly, Section 924, which prescribes penalties for violation of the Act, mentions only violations with regard to information "required . . . to be kept in the records of a person licensed" under the Act. That penalty section moreover, makes it a felony to violate "any provision" of the Act, but unlike Section 922, does not include the words "or regulations promulgated thereunder" thereby preventing Section 924 from being even arguably applicable to any failure to send in reports for centralization. Congress must plainly and unmistakably define what conduct constitutes a crime before it is punishable. United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348 (1971). It is inconceivable that Congress, which made felonies of even the most minor failures to maintain records, could have intended to authorize a centralization regulation without providing a criminal punishment for its violation.[3] If Congress had intended to authorize such a regulation, it would have done so distinctly and just as distinctly made violation of it an offense, such as in the case of the [1] See for example 26 U.S.C. 5207, which requires distillers to "render" such reports to the Secretary of the Treasury as he shall by regulation prescribe. That statute, which served as a model for Section 923 (g) and is also enforced by ATF, directs that the reports be kept on the distiller's premises. The Secretary is given the same right to enter the distiller's premises during business hours as he is in the case of the firearms dealer. The word "render" is defined in Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary for 1977 as meaning "to transmit to another" and "to furnish for consideration". In this context it has the same meaning as "submit".

[2] A reading of the remainder of Section 923 (g), by which the Secretary is given permission to make acquired information available to local authorities, suggests the type of report, envisioned by the statute, which could be of benefit to them. The Secretary could, for example, issue a regulation requiring dealers to furnish to inspectors reports on whether certain named felons had purchased firearms. In those instances, it would then be unnecessary for agents to review the records and such information could thereafter be furnished locally to interested police authorities, in accordance with the statutory intent.

[3] The fact that 18 USC 923(e) authorizes the Secretary to revoke a license if its holder has violated any provision of the statute or any rule or regulation of the Secretary does not disturb this argument. This is an additional or alternative penalty applicable, as are the criminal sanctions, to all infractions. There is nothing in the statute or its legislative history to indicate that 18 USC 923(e) and the criminal provisions are other than coextentive in application.

failure to maintain records proscribed in Section 922.

Had Congress intended to provide for gun registration in Title I of the Gun Control Act, it would no doubt have enacted provisions similar to those contained in Title II of the Act, which deals with such firearms as machine guns and sawed-off shotguns, wherein it is stated:

§ 5841. Registration of Firearms

(a) Central Registry

The Secretary or his delegate shall maintain a central registry of all firearms in the United States which are not in the possession or under the control of the United States. This registry shall be known as the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record. The registry shall include: (1) identification of the firearms; (2) date of registration; and (3) identification and address of person entitled to possession of the firearm.

A comparison of the proposed regulations and Section 5841 reveals that Treasury would by regulation virtually accomplish for Title I firearms what Congress by statute accomplished for Title II firearms insofar as establishing a central firearms registry is concerned.[4]

While it is true that the proposed regulations would not federally centralize the names and addresses of all retail purchasers, they will nonetheless, federally centralize, by proposed 27 CFR 178.113 and 178.114, the names and addresses of members of the United States Armed Forces who import firearms and of those persons who purchase firearms from a dealer who has imported their purchases for them.

Thousands of names and addresses will be federally centralized by virtue of this proposal and as a result of regulations already in effect. Previously unchallenged are present Sections 178.126(a) and 178.127 of Title 27 of the Code of Federal Regulations. The former requires the reporting to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms of the names and addresses of those who purchase two or more pistols or revolvers at one time or during five consecutive business days. The latter requires that the records of discontinued dealerships be delivered to ATF.[5] How many thousands of firearms and names and addresses of purchasers this involves is unknown. In his statement of May 4, 1978, prepared for the House Judiciary Committee, ATF Director Rex Davis said: "We have had a massive project underway for more than a year which has as its goal the centralization in Washington of out-of-business dealer records." (emphasis supplied) It is, moreover, impossible to project how many thousands of names and addresses will be harvested by proposed 27 CFR 178.126, which directs that when an ATF officer indicates a need for information concerning receipt and disposition of firearms, licensees shall report by telephone the information as requested by the ATF officer.

No intent of Congress to establish a broad system of central reporting so as to accomplish this central registry of Title I firearms can be inferred from the overall structure of the Gun Control Act or its wording. A single ambiguous use of the word "reports," or any variant thereof, in the entire statute is insufficient to convert a plan for record maintenance by private businessmen into a scheme for central reporting to the federal government. Such statutes as the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, 29 U.S.C. 431 et seq., and the Federal Election Campaign Act, 2 U.S.C. 431, et seq., illustrate the clarity with which Congress establishes central reporting requirements when it intends to do so. A reading of these laws also leaves no doubt that there is an obligation to "file" reports centrally. The word "file" is defined in Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary for 1977, as meaning "to place among official records as prescribed by law."

The legislative history of the 1968 Act also affirms that Congress never intended to authorize centralized registration. Both Houses of Congress repeatedly rejected legislative attempts to allow the federal government to accomplish centralized registration or licensing of firearms. Prior to the passage of the Act, the House voted down such schemes on three occasions and the Senate took similar action on four different votes. Further in 1972, the Senate voted three times to reject firearms registration and in 1976 the House Judiciary Committee voted four times to reject registration.

In addition, the then Under Secretary of the Treasury testified on July 10, 1967, before the Senate Judiciary Committee that the legislation then under consideration, which subsequently became the 1968 Act, would not authorize federal registration of firearms. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of whose Service ATF was then a part, also appeared that day and testified that the legislation was not intended to register firearms at the federal level.

It is clear, therefore, that Treasury is attempting to exceed its statutory authority and accomplish by regulation what Congress has expressly declined to legislate.●

[5] Section 178.126(a) orders that multiple purchases be reported on Form 3310.4. The form then calls for the names and addresses. This two-step approach may indicate Treasury's lack of confidence in its own authority to order these reports. Section 178.127 strongly suggests a disbelief in a right to accept records for centralization. It permits ATF, when state or local ordinance requires the delivery of discontinued dealership records to other responsible authority, to arrange for such delivery.

MAIL EARLY

HON. WILLIAM M. KETCHUM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that the newly enacted increase in first-class postage was not what one could call enthusiastically received by our citizens. Like most of us, I have been barraged with mail inquiring as to why an all-too-independent agency continually requires more money in order to provide less service. Among the correspondence I have read was one suggestion which I would like to share with my colleagues: Tony Cantrell, of Bakersfield, submitted a letter to the Bakersfield Californian proposing that citizens mail this year's Christmas greetings prior to the May 29 burial of the 13-cent stamp. This economical suggestion, as pointed out by my constituent, will not only enable us all to save 2 cents per card—if that going rate prevails come December—it will also provide the Postal Service folks with the opportunity to deliver our Christmas cards at their leisure. Following is the text of Tony Cantrell's offering:

MAIL EARLY

I suggest we all mail our Christmas cards before May 29—not only to save two cents but will give our postal department a better chance for delivery before the holidays—could be an added attraction if they decide to raise postage again before Christmas.

OAS TRADE FAIR

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of requesting the inclusion in the RECORD of a recent speech delivered to the Organization of American States Trade Fair of the Americas by the very distinguished mayor of Miami, Fla., Hon. Maurice A. Ferre. Mayor Ferre's unswerving dedication to the development of trade and friendship, and the strengthening of cultural ties, with our Latin-American neighbors has been and continues to be one of the greatest sources of good will between the nations of this hemisphere. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the stupendous success of the OAS Trade Fair reflects our distinguished mayor's exemplary personal efforts at fomenting the kind of relations, both diplomatic and commercial, that increase understanding between nations. Thus, I take great pride in offering this address as an example of the interdependence of all of the communities of the Americas and very specially as an exemplification of the dedication of such a fine individual as my friend and great American, Maurice Ferre.

TRADE FAIR OF THE AMERICAS INAUGURATION

Ladies and gentlemen: For decades we have envisioned Miami as the Gateway to the Americas. More people leave to and arrive from the southern part of the hemisphere through Miami than any other port. We have long been a Gateway. Today, what we are about, hopefully, is establishing Miami as a bridge. Gateways are thresholds to be passed. Bridges are permanent links that bring together separate shores. The vision of Miami as a bridge is hopefully more enduring. It is unity that excites and motivates.

We are not the first who have talked of unity; Bolivar and De Hostos spent a lifetime dreaming of Pan-Americanism. The OAS is a living symbol of the dream of unity. Political unity, however, is harder to define and even more difficult to achieve. Not so of cultural and especially of commercial unity.

What we inaugurate today is a Trade Fair. I am grateful as the mayor of the City of Miami for the splendid cooperation we have received from the State, the County, the Federal Government and the OAS. The Fair would not be possible without the contributions of these entities and the hard work of Charlie Crumpton, Assistant City Manager, the unbelievable dedication of Evelio

Ley and Associates, the sponsorship of Governor Reuben Askew, Senator George Firestone, the Legislature, the Board of County Commissioners and my own City Commission. Our deepest thanks for your support and faith.

The dream of the Fair has lingered almost from the infancy of Miami. It was the substance behind Interama. It was the main subject of conversation when Governor Askew and I led a group of distinguished Floridians to South America on our first Bicentennial Friendship Trip in December of 1975. It took shape through many discussions with Javier Roca at CIPE, the encouragement of the Inter-American Development Bank and the OAS. Two years, millions of dollars, and thousands of working hours later . . . here we are.

Free trade amongst people is perhaps one of the simplest and yet most difficult concepts to understand. Much more has been achieved in the history of the world through trade than through any other human endeavor.

For the first time in the 201 years of our Nation's history, a local government—with the assistance of the State and Federal governments—is putting up a major trade fair for our Latin and Caribbean neighbors to come to our shores to sell their products to our buyers.

If you go back to the beginning of the century until now, the balance of trade between the United States and our Southern neighbors has been overwhelmingly in our favor. This has recently begun to change due to the increased price of oil. Absent oil, even today, our sales of goods and services, greatly exceed purchases from our Southern neighbors. What this Fair says to our Latin brothers and sisters, in effect, is: "come, show us your goods; we are willing to buy as well as to sell."

The symbol of the Fair, as you will see in your programs, is a Phoenician boat. Historically, we in the Western World recognize the Phoenicians as being the master traders who took their products and by selling them all over the Mediterranean, greatly expanded their civilization. We are the inheritors of that world. You cannot go far in the Mediterranean without running into a former Phoenician colony.

Miami does not have natural resources nor great factories. We aspire to be a banking and commercial center. The basis of our strength is our geographic location; but that is God-given. What is man-given is what we do with these natural attributes and what we wish to do besides being a bridge between the North and South, with our multi-ethnic, multi-cultural community, is to become a market place. Like the Dutch to Renaissance Europe, we wish to become the modern Phoenicians to the Americas; a market place for the goods and services of the hemisphere.

The Trade Fair of the Americas fits precisely into the goals our President has set for our nation. Jimmy Carter comes out of the rural South. It is difficult to understand the direction of President Carter's enlightened approach towards foreign policy unless one understands the march from Selma to Birmingham. Human rights means human dignity. Human rights foreign policy is an extension of the civil rights movement of the South. The great mark of the Carter Administration in the years to come will be the recognition that, for the most part, we in the modern world are not libertarian but rather egalitarian in nature. Our march is egalitarian. It is this simple but encompassing concept that is the beacon of the United States as we begin our third century as a nation. The sixteen nations that are gathered here with their respective exhibitors participate as equals. It is precisely this approach to each other that is so meaningful for the future well-being of our hemisphere.

We are indeed privileged to have as our honored guest to inaugurate this Fair, the First Lady of our nation. Rosalynn Carter, in her own right has fought for and stands for equality. Early in this Administration, Mrs. Carter took on an immense responsibility, as an equal partner with her husband, the President, by representing our country on a trip through Latin America and the Caribbean. The results of her efforts and success will be enjoyed for many years to come. She is a symbol of equality and hemispheric good will. She is also an important participant in the process. We are honored with her presence today. It is my pleasure to present to you the First Lady of the United States, Rosalynn Carter.●

TOXIC SUBSTANCES CONTROL ACT

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, as we move closer to George Orwell's not-so-fictional "1984," our beloved bureaucrats are busy preparing for the millennium. One of the latest examples of their handiwork is the implementation of the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA), which became effective January 1, 1977. Generally, TSCA provides the Environmental Protection Agency with broad jurisdiction over those who manufacture, process, or distribute chemical substances or mixtures.

Section 8(e) of TSCA proves that any person who manufactures, processes, or distributes in commerce a chemical substance or mixture and who obtains information which reasonably supports the conclusion such substances or mixtures present a substantial risk of injury to health or the environment shall immediately report the transgression. The phrase "any person" includes any employee of an employer covered by the Act. Furthermore, any person who violates section 8(e) is subject to a fine of $25,000 for each day of the violation or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

At this point, industry and its employees are not too clear as to how section 8(e) will be policed. To protect itself and its employees, one large oil company is advising all company personnel the best policy is to report too much, even if it is in error, rather than report too little.

In other words, if you are going to fink, fink big. It is a classical Orwellian touch. Of course there always is the possibility a violator could claim his fine as a tax deduction.

I hereby attach the memo issued by this particular company to all employees. I blocked the company's name out so that 24 hours go by before the bureaucrats discover the memo came into my hands and the entire company is closed down.

To All Employees:

The Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA) became effective on January 1, 1977. Generally, this Act provides the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) with broad powers over those manufacturers and importers who manufacture, process, or distribute chemical substances or mixtures.

For the most part, the company's compliance with the statute will be under the direction of those personnel already working in the areas of health and environmental regulations, and employee involvement with TSCA compliance activities will be minimal.

There is one provision, however, that may involve you personally, and it is one that you should regard as imposing upon yourself a serious legal obligation.

Section 8(e) of TSCA states that: "any person who manufactures, processes, or distributes in commerce a chemical substance or mixture and who obtains information which reasonably supports the conclusion that such substances or mixture presents a substantial risk of injury to health or the environment shall immediately inform the Administrator of such information unless such person has actual knowledge that the Administrator has been adequately informed of such information."

With respect to Section 8(e), there are two very critical points.

First, the phrase "any person" includes any employee of an employer who "obtains information" within the meaning of Section 8(e).

Second, "any person" who violates Section 8(e) can be "liable to the United States for a civil penalty in an amount not to exceed $25,000 for such violation. . . ." In addition to the civil liability, TSCA also provides for criminal liability of "a fine of not more than $25,000 for each day of violation, or . . . imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."

Because EPA has only recently published guidelines as to how it will interpret and implement Section 8(e), the Agency has not sought to enforce this reporting provision up to the present time. Those guidelines have now been issued, however, and we should assume that compliance will be strictly enforced.

The EPA guidelines provide that a company may relieve its employees of responsibilities for reporting information directly to the EPA, if it establishes an internal reporting system which designates a specific company employee, or employees, who will have the authority for deciding whether a report should be submitted to the Agency.

The procedure must specify:

(a) the information that must be reported;

(b) how the information is to be prepared, and the designated company official to whom it is to be sent;

(c) the Federal penalties for failing to report;

(d) a method for promptly advising the employee of the disposition of his report.

In light of the above, the company and its subsidiaries have established an internal reporting system, and the method by which that system will function is fully outlined in the enclosure that accompanies this letter. You are urged to read it carefully so as to insure that both you and the company do everything we can to fulfill our legal obligations under Section 8(e) of TSCA.

One final note. Many of you will find the attached instructions unclear and confusing.

For that, we apologize. The instructions, however, are essentially a repetition of guidelines issued by EPA; and we decided that it was necessary to tell you what those guidelines contained. As both industry and government gain experience under Section 8(e), it is hoped that our reporting obligations will be clarified. In the meantime, do not hesitate to error on the side of reporting too much rather than too little. Such an error poses no legal problems either for you or for the company. Failing to report, however, could result in serious legal problems both for yourself and for the company.●

CAROL FOREMAN: THE "TITANIC" OF AMERICAN AGRICULTURE AND BUSINESS

HON. GENE TAYLOR

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, Government regulation of business and agricultural activity has gotten out of control. The consumer activists, environmentalists, conservationists, and hunger lobbyists have taken over and the American farmer is getting it from all sides. So is the businessman.

Something must be done to get the Government off the backs and out of the pockets of farmers and businessmen.

Our colleague, BILL WAMPLER, of Virginia ranking Republican member of the House Agriculture Committee, has made a start in this direction, as he explained earlier this week in a speech to the American Meat Institute here in Washington. I commend it to your reading.

THE AMERICAN MEAT INSTITUTE BOARD

When Dewey Bond invited me to meet with you this morning, I was pleased. But when I asked him what I should talk about, he said, "Oh just let your hair down." So right away you know you're in trouble.

I am sorry Bob Bergland wasn't able to be here. But I am glad farmers were well represented by the half-a-dozen other Secretaries of Agriculture on your program.

I was particularly pleased to see Carol Foreman listed on your program. Although I usually disagree with her, one thing you can say about Carol is that she's not shy about putting her beliefs into practice. For instance, she was one of the first to warn the public about the possible dangers of eating bacon . . . and she even ordered a reduction in the amount of nitrates you can use in processing it. Then, she proposed noncured meat products be sold under the generic names of traditionally cured products, inviting possible outbreaks of botulism and food poisoning from consumers who don't read labels too closely. Then, to help develop worldwide meat standards, she appointed a vegetarian as U.S. consultant to the U.N. meat board meeting in Rome.

Now, speaking frankly, if I were in your shoes, I'd be concerned. I won't say how concerned . . . but let me put it this way: Carol Foreman is doing for meat consumption what the Titanic did for ocean travel!

But there's more to the problem facing your industry than just Carol Foreman. She has now been joined by Barry Commoner and other psuedo-scientists who have suddenly discovered fried hamburgers may be the real cause of cancer. What's next? Apple pie? Sex?

All this reminds me of the fable of the shepherd boy who cried wolf too often. Soon nobody believed him. Soon no one will believe the Foremans and Commoners of this world.

One this is certain: someone down at USDA has to take the bull by the horns and return some common sense to the Department.

When a peanut farmer was elected President in 1976 and a grain farmer was named Secretary of Agriculture, I felt the policy of having a real spokesman for agriculture in the highest councils of government would continue. But that wasn't the case.

Today, the consumer activists, the environmentalists, the conservationists and the hunger lobbyists have taken over. We now have assistant Cabinet secretaries for consumers . . . for the environment . . . for women. What's needed someplace in this Administration is an Assistant Secretary for Farmers!

This new atmosphere is, also reflected in President Carter's fiscal 1979 budget which markedly shifts U.S.D.A. away from its traditional emphasis on production, research and marketing . . . and toward food and welfare assistance and income transfer programs.

At the same time, we see the State Department for the first time in a decade dominating U.S. farm export policies and contributing to the erosion of agricultural sales abroad. The Administration's sugar policy is in a shambles. There's an overzealousness which I mentioned a moment ago in banning protective food additives without adequate testing or without proper consideration of the impact on farm income and on the availability of meat and poultry products.

In addition, there's a real failure on the Administration's part to meet the agricultural communitys' needs for adequate pest management representation in the councils of government. Support for soil and water conservation and forestry programs has been reduced. At the same time, U.S.D.A. has failed to develop worthwhile energy programs, such as a gasahol and solar development, and has placed curbs on agricultural science and research and education in the face of Congressional mandates to expand these fields of endeavor.

The influence of consumer activists is epitomized by Carol Foreman whom I mentioned a few minutes ago.

As you are well aware, Ms. Foreman proposed in the Federal Register amending Federal Meat Inspection regulations to permit the marketing of new and untested noncured meat products under the generic names of traditionally cured meat products.

What concerns me—and a number of my colleagues in the Congress—are the health safety aspects of the Foreman proposal . . . so much so that dozen of us on the Agriculture Committee sent a letter of protest to Secretary Bergland this morning.

In our letter, we stated—and I quote—"The proposed safety controls for these new and potentially high volume meat products are completely inadequate and invite an outbreak of botulism and other bacterially-induced incidents across the country . . . the safety precautions prescribed by your Assistant Secretary require strict refrigeration controls at each step from processing to consumer use and place the burden of safety on each party handling the new product. Children who take sack lunches to school would be particularly vulnerable. Moreover, confusion among the two types of products would most likely occur, causing accidental misuse if identical generic names and shapes of products are permitted."

The letter goes on to say that people know hot dogs are safe, even if taken on a picnic where they are not well chilled. They know bologna is safe in a child's lunch and can be kept in an unrefrigerated school locker for hours without problems. They know that if they mistakenly leave bacon on the kitchen counter for hours, it can be refrigerated and used again without risk.

They know these things because they grew up with them.

But the Foreman plan changes all this. In our letter to the Secretary, we made clear that we are not opposed to a new family of meat products—but simply to permitting these new products to be marketed under traditional generic names—such as hot dogs and bologna and salami and bacon and ham and so forth.

Specifically, we called on Secretary Bergland to withdraw the proposed Foreman reglation and incorporate provisions along these lines: First, include on the label of each of these new products this warning—and I quote: "The Secretary of Agriculture has determined that failure to keep this product refrigerated at temperatures below 40 degrees Farenheit at all times is dangerous to your health."

Second, we recommend the adoption of new generic terms and different shapes for these products. For instance, the non-cured meat product which would compete with hot dogs, which are a cured product, could be called "cold dogs," and their shape could be square instead of round—so there would be no mistake in the mind of the consumer just what he or she was buying.

This proposal of Ms. Foreman is just one small tip of the iceberg of government regulations which business faces each day.

Do you have any idea how many different Federal forms Washington asks business to fill out? Would you believe over 5,000? Five thousand forms to keep the bureaucrats at work and businessmen from their work!

Do you have any idea how much all this costs?

According to a just-released study prepared by Washington University in St. Louis for a Senate committee, Federal red tape costs every man, woman and child in this country $470 a year. Altogether, this report says the care and feeding of some 40 Federal agencies involved in regulatory activity has gone up 115 percent in the past five years, presently costing taxpayers $4.8 billion annually. Safety and anti-pollution features mandated by the government added $666 to the price of the average car last year—and President Carter wonders why he can't control inflation!

The problem is—we all pay for government regulation: farmers, ranchers, cattlemen, meat processors, businessmen, taxpayers and consumers—whether it be in the form of unnecessary paperwork or overzealous enforcement by government bureaucrats.

Time magazine summed up the problem in an article earlier this year entitled, "Rage Over Rising Regulation." The magazine said the American people have about had it with autocratic bureaucrats to whom—quoting Time—"nothing succeeds like excess." Said the magazine—and I quote again—"There is a deepening revulsion among Americans against the excesses of bureaucracy (which) suggests that a showdown is imminent."

Perhaps to head off just such a showdown, President Carter proposed a partnership between government and business. On the surface, this has a nice ring to it—since by definition a partnership suggests the idea of equals pitching in to help each other achieve a mutually beneficial goal or objective.

But the fact of the matter is that government and business are not equals at all. Nor are they seekers of mutually beneficial goals. The traditional role of Government is that of a servant of society and of the people. Now the President wants to make it a partner with business.

Speaking as a former businessman, I prefer to keep government in the role of servant. I just don't think there's a good basis for an alliance in which one partner's heavy hand is on your shoulder and his other is in your pocket.

Don"t misunderstand me: There are valid areas for government regulation. I'm sure we all agree on that. No one condones either shoddy business practices, slipshod workmanship, unsafe working conditions or unsanitary food. We are all concerned about the safety and value and quality of what we buy—for, in the final analysis, we are all consumers.

That's not the problem. The problem is that government regulation of business and agricultural activity has gotten out of control. Congressional authorization to regulate for a worthy purpose has become the bureaucrat's unlimited license to hunt and his unchecked mandate to control. Something must be done about it.

As a small start in this direction, I plan to introduce legislation this week to bring the occupational safety and health administration under the provisions of the legislation which it administers. Believe it or not, O.S.H.A. isn't covered by its own legislation. The bill I plan to introduce will extend the definition of "employer" to specifically include O.S.H.A. I think it's only fitting that this most controversial of Federal regulatory agencies be required to live under the same restrictions it imposes on agriculture and business.

I have another bill in the drafting stage to help put the businessman on an equal footing with the Federal government and the vast resources which it can marshall against him in a given case. Specifically, this measure will require the government to reimburse business firms for reasonable litigation costs and attorney fees in government-initiated cases won by the firms. One special feature of this bill—it would mandate that funds used for such reimbursement come from the budget of the agency or commission which brought the action in the first place.

If we can get some legislation of this kind through the Congress, perhaps the bureaucrats will begin to get the message—that the American people and American business are fed up with un-civil servants who are more concerned about justifyir.g their jobs than serving justice.

As each of you know, the meat industry is one of the most highly regulated in the country. I don't have to remind you of the seemingly endless government paperwork you face and the unbelievable amount of time involved in dealing with U.S.D.A., O.S.H.A., E.P.A., I.R.S., I.C.C., and N.L.R.B., just to mention a few of the alphabet agencies arrayed against you. I just don't believe the processing and marketing of meat at prices we all can afford justifies this much government in the slaughterhouse!

This country of ours—and this industry of yours—can continue to prosper and grow—if we provide the climate for such prosperity and growth. And this calls for less—not more—government regulation, in my opinion.

In the final analysis, what has produced more of this world's goods and services for more people than any other nation or civilization known to man is the free and unfettered system we call private enterprise—and it's still the best regulator around. Let's make sure we keep it.

Thank you.●

TUITION TAX CREDIT

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, there are few issues, I feel certain, that will be more difficult for me, more keenly felt by my constituents, more hotly debated both within and outside this body than the issue of tuition tax credits. The controversy—and passion—surrounding this bill has certainly given me a good lesson in the careful thought and consideration every issue before this body must be given. And it is after that kind of thought, and after listening to well-considered arguments on each and all sides of this issue that I today rise in support of Mr. VANIK's amendment to this bill to provide tuition tax credits for the families of children attending private schools.

Mr. Chairman, I am doing this to help the parents of children in my district. Yes, even in the south Bronx, I am convinced that the proportion of minorities in the public and private schools is comparable. And I deeply believe that even—no, particularly—in areas such as mine, people must have access to alternatives in education at the most basic level. No, in my district there is no segregation in the private schools, for they are filled with the children of parents who see a private education as a way to create a brighter future for their kids.

Tuition tax credits are not just for the middle and upper class, and I reject those arguments that imply they will not help those who need it. They seek to help lower-income families—people who must adjust their own financial difficulties to their children's educational needs. If aid is not provided during the years when children are in elementary and secondary school, many of the most capable and deserving will not have the option of competing for postsecondary tax credits—or any other form of college assistance, for that matter—and I think that is clearly exclusionary and discriminatory against the more needy children in our society. Let Secretary Califano and the U.S. Catholic Conference debate how much money private schools receive. Our primary concern should be the educational opportunities available to the children.

Support of private education does not mean no support for public education. And I have supported the concept of aid to private education since my days in the New York State Legislature. Support of tuition tax credits will not mean the end of public education, but it does mean that we are prepared to guarantee a child's educational opportunities. You may be certain that I will continue to be as diligent in my support of public education, and of improving the quality of education our children receive in all institutions.●

WHO SPEAKS FOR US ON AFRICA?

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, in Tuesday's Washington Post there appeared an article by the distinguished writer, Marquis Childs, pointing out that our former colleague, Andy Young, is indeed, performing a great service for the United States in his role as U.S. Ambassador to the U.N.

Mr. Childs states that the consensus among Western diplomats with whom he has talked at the U.N. is that Amabassador Young's performance is on the plus side. One diplomat summed it up as follows:

> You owe Ambassador Young a considerable debt. More than most Americans understand, he has developed a link with the Third World countries. Young has assured them of America's intentions as perhaps no one out of the conventional white establishment could have done. This is a distinct gain and one that, all things considered, is likely to stand you in good stead in the future.

It seems to me that the kind of principles that Ambassador Young has stood for and the kind of links he has developed with Third World countries, particularly those in Africa, will do far more for our relations with those countries than the kind of saber rattling that we have been hearing recently from Dr. Brzezinski. The irony is that Ambassador Young is following the very kind of approach that Dr. Brzezinski was recommending that the previous administration follow with respect to Africa and Third World countries when he spoke to Members of Congress in May 1976. The views Dr. Brzezinski expressed at that time are summarized in the statement I placed in the RECORD last Wednesday at page 15781.

In fact, the summary of Dr. Brzezinski's views. which he himself edited, is a considerably toned down version of his actual remarks in May 1976. At that time he castigated Dr. Kissinger for tending to view all of our relations with the Third World in terms of their interaction with the East-West conflict. Has Dr. Brzezinski now fallen into this same error?

It is also ironic that Dr. Brzezinski should now be characterizing Russian actions in Africa as a violation of the "spirit of détente," as expressed in some apparently unwritten and never published understanding between Dr. Kissinger and the Russian Government. In the summary of his remarks of May 1976, Dr. Brzezinski stated:

The Russians never deceived us about détente. They always said there would be mixed cooperation and conflict. We [i.e., the Nixon-Ford Administration] were the ones who were talking about a "generation of peace." The United States and the Soviet Union are separated by differing historical forces, and the conflict will be with us for a long time. That is why it is not a good idea to base our whole foreign policy on détente.

Mr. Speaker, I thought Dr. Brzezinski's remarks of 2 years ago made a great deal of sense and constituted a realistic critique of the Kissinger foreign policy and the way we should approach our relationships with the other countries of the world. Surely, he owes it to the Congress and the country to explain whether, in fact, his perceptions have changed as to our relations with the Third World countries and the meaning of détente.

Without such explanation, one can only conclude that certain elements in this administration are slipping into the same unproductive pattern of thought as the previous administration in shaping an African policy. This pattern includes the dangerous assumption that the executive branch cannot deal openly with the American people and Congress, but instead must have the authority to engage in clandestine operations without consulting with the Congress or informing the American people in advance. As more and more is revealed about the ineptitude of our Government's activities in Angola under the previous administration, the wisdom of the restraints imposed by Congress is becoming increasingly apparent. The recent book by former CIA agent Stockwell about the stupidity of the CIA's clandestine role in the Angolan civil war is only the latest example.

I share the general concern over the Soviet-Cuban-East German activities in Africa. It would be folly not to take them seriously. But it is just possible that Ambassador Young's efforts to identify ourselves with the aspirations and interests of the African peoples is a far better foundation for American policy than the recent bluster of Dr. Brzezinski.

Mr. Speaker, the full text of Marquis Childs' article follows these remarks:

ARE WE UNDERRATING ANDREW YOUNG?

(By Marquis Childs)

UNITED NATIONS.—When he is told that by many Americans, white, middle to upper class, he is considered a mischief-maker firing random shots at anything that pokes above the horizon, Ambassador Andrew Young says he is unaware of such a feeling. That was in the wake of the uproar over his remarks downgrading the presence of Cuban troops in Africa. Those remarks seemed to go contrary to what President Carter himself had said on the subject.

If I should be an embarrassment to him, Young says in his serious, soft-spoken way, then I would leave this job. I would find another way to work for him.

He believes the role of the Cubans has been greatly overplayed in the press. Both Soviet and Cuban forces could be mired down in Africa as the United States was sunk in Vietnam.

Scare themes get far too much prominence. Six months or a year ago no one had heard of the Horn of Africa; today it is treated as an immediate menace to American security.

Young adds up the pluses for the United States in Africa. Somalia, which was at war with Ethiopia over the Ogaden—a thousand miles of sand, in Young's words—has a close relationship with the United States and is the recipient of aid in various forms. A new American ambassador is soon to go to Ethiopia to renew relations there.

In Angola, Gulf Oil does something close to a $100 million business in oil. That is the chief source of money for operating the government and obtaining essential imports from abroad. If the Cubans are there in any number, it may be as order keepers. Young notes that 300,000 to 400,000 white Portuguese left their former colony with scarcely a casualty, and that some whites remain. From Guinea, once considered a Soviet fiefdom, Sékou Touré has several times sent an invitation to Young to pay a visit.

On the massacre at Kolwezi in Zaire, he has some interesting ideas. He believes the rebel invaders came in not to slaughter whites but to disrupt copper production and throw such a scare into European technicians that they would not come back. Since copper is the heart of Zaire's economy, the country, once the Belgian Congo, would be brought down.

He notes, not without bitterness, that while the slaughter of the whites has received prominence, little or nothing has been said about the killing of black civilians. Several hundred blacks may have been shot at the same time that their dwellings were destroyed during the raid.

But Young's conviction—his optimism—comes out strongest on the issue that looms largest. That is the future of Rhodesia and subsequently of South Africa. He believes that if the guerrillas can be persuaded to take part in a black majority Rhodesian government there can be a transition without civil war and bloodshed. That peaceful transition can be furthered by stationing a U.N. peacekeeping force in Rhodesia for a transition period and also in Namibia (South-West Africa).

If that can occur in Rhodesia, then ultimately a similar transformation can take place in South Africa. While this may sound wildly optimistic, it represents Young's deep and continuing involvement with the racial crisis in southern Africa. He has never hesitated to speak out, although he has kept the confidence of all parties to the conflict.

As American ambassador to the United Nations, Young has, in my memory, been far more active than anyone in that role. He has been continuously concerned with the brambles of the African thicket. He has called practically everybody racist, including the Swedes, to their considerable surprise, and the residents of Queens.

But how to grade this dedicated activist? Plus or minus? I have asked this question of several Western diplomats here at the United Nations, and they come down on the plus side. As one who did not wish to be identified by name put it:

"You owe Ambassador Young a considerable debt. More than most Americans understand, he has developed a link with the Third World countries. Young has assured them of America's intentions as perhaps no one out of the conventional white establishment could have done. That is a distinct gain and one that, all things considered, is likely to stand you in good stead in the future."

That is what I heard from others. At times he is irritating. But his intensive efforts to avert bloody civil war and bring about a peaceful solution were given a B-plus if not an A on his report card.

I think of the frustration his predecessors—notably Adlai Stevenson—suffered in a role that has more often than not been show rather than substance. I feel that frustration will never trouble Young. And I feel, too, that out of his dedication to Carter he would not hesitate to resign if he considered himself an embarrassment to the president.●

LEGISLATION REQUIRING DETECTION TAGGANTS

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I am today resubmitting my legislation phasing in requirements that identification and detection taggants be added to explosive materials.

As a collective body, this Chamber has, from time to time, passed resolutions condemning various acts of terrorism at home and abroad. These resolutions are important. They indicate that it is the intention of the House not to tolerate such acts.

My legislation, H.R. 12516, will translate these intentions into positive action. It provides us with a vehicle to enact legislation which will help assure a reduction in criminal bombings, and savings in lives and property which they too often destroy.

By tagging explosive materials, it will be possible to detect the presence of a bomb before it is detonated. Should there be an explosion, law enforcement officials will be able, with the addition of detection taggants, to track down and convict the guilty parties with greater frequency and speed, and at less expense. When the present 8-percent arrest rate for criminal bombers is increased, I feel certain that less people will feel so secure in committing their disgusting crimes.

There are now a total of 57 sponsors of H.R. 12516. With their support, and with indications that the bi'l will receive subcommittee hearings, I am hopeful that we will pass this legislation this year. To help insure that this happens, and to show the Nation that we are determined to reverse the trend toward increased bombings in this country, I ask my colleagues to join those of us who have already cosponsored H.R. 12516.

The list of present cosponsors follows:

Mr. Akaka, Mr. Anderson of California, Mr. Annunzio, Mr. Brown of California, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Carney, Mr. Carr, Mr. Carter, Mr. Corman, Mr. Corrada, Mr. Coughlin.

Mr. de Lugo, Mr. Derrick, Mr. Downey, Mr. Duncan of Tennessee, Mr. Edgar, Mr. English, Mr. Evans of Georgia, Mr. Fary, Mr. Fascell, Mr. Flood.

Mr. Gibbons, Mr. Goodling, Mr. Green, Mr. Hagedorn, Mr. Hannaford, Mr. Harkin, Mr. Heftel, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Jacobs, Mr. Krueger.

Mr. Le Fante, Mr. Lagomarsino, Mr. Lehman, Mr. Lent, Mr. Lott, Mr. McCormack, Mr. McDonald, Mr. Mazzoli, Mr. Mineta, Mr. Moakley, Mr. Mottl, Mr. Murphy of New York, Mr. Murphy of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Patterson of California, Mr. Price, Mr. Richmond, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Roe, Mr. Stump, Mr. Traxler, Mr. Vento, Mr. Whitehurst, Mr. Wilson of Texas, Mr. Won Pat, Mr. Yatron, Mr. Young of Missouri.●

STEEL LABOR AND MANAGEMENT DEMAND TOUGHER ANTIDUMPING PENALTIES

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, on March 15, 1978, Congressman MICKEY EDWARDS and I introduced a job stability package including three bills calling for the enactment of provisions to expedite the investigation of injury due to foreign dumping; job retention incentives in high unemployment areas; and a congressional mandate in order to trigger regulatory action in affected area. I, therefore, feel it is important to call attention to an article in the May 24 issue of the Washington Post "U.S. Steel Industry Calls For Tougher Anti-Dumping Penalties" which I will include at the end of my remarks.

It was also significant to note in the aforementioned article that "Major steel companies have been waging a campaign against foreign steel for years, but only recently have they been joined by their labor unions, becoming a potent force in Congress." Mr. Speaker, Congressman EDWARDS and I now have 42 cosponsors on this package and we invite our colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join us on these bills by just calling either office to let us know their intention.

Also, I am sure many of the Members read the notes from the Joint Economic Committee of May 16, 1978. The lead article points out that "Federal regulation has become America's number one growth industry." The story went on to emphasize "We write one page of law and we get 50 pages of regulations."

One bill in our package is designed to eliminate this absurdity, particularly when it causes additional economic problems for an area already reeling from the blows of high unemployment. This bill differs from the traditional regulatory reform legislation in that there is no question as to its constitutionality.

The massive regulatory reform bill still has not been brought to the floor for debate and I am sure one of the holdups is that many Members feel a congressional veto is unconstitutional. H.R. 11561 our bill is known as the "Truth-in-Regulation Act of 1978."

In this bill, no regulation proposed by an agency can take effect unless the employment picture in an affected industry is held harmless and/or unless a joint resolution passes both Houses of Congress and is signed by the President. This is clearly constitutional and no regulation will become effective if the Congress does not act.

To determine if an industry is held harmless with respect to employment, a local task force, including labor, reports their findings to the agency administrator who includes this data in the report to Congress. This is a standing task force which also prepares an overall, community economic impact statement on the proposed regulation. The agency must take these statistics into consideration when preparing its own economic and environmental impact statements on the regulation for the appropriate congressional committee.

Mr. Speaker, most of our laws and regulations are well intentioned but the American people are entitled to expect the Congress and the administration to look carefully at the cost-benefit ratios before promulgating new regulations. The Washington University study reports that Federal rules and regulations in 1979 will cost $102.7 billion—$4.8 billion in administrative costs of the agencies and $97.9 billion in compliance costs by the private sector. This is staggering.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to join us promptly as cosponsors.

The Post article follows:

U.S. STEEL INDUSTRY CALLS FOR TOUGHER ANTI-DUMPING PENALTIES ON IMPORTS

(By James L. Rowe, Jr.)

NEW YORK.—The steel industry said yesterday it is becoming increasingly skeptical that the government's program to hold down steel imports will work and promised to push for new legislation that would impose quicker and heavier penalties on countries found to sell their products below fair value in the United States.

George Stinson, chairman of National Steel Corp., told reporters that a new study showed that the American steel industry lost $4.1 billion in 1976 and 1977 because of "massive dumping" of steel by foreign producers.

He said that dumping in those two years cost about 30,000 American jobs.

Stinson said in a later interview that he has not yet given up on the so-called trigger price mechanism developed by the Carter administration to reduce illegally priced steel imports, but that if they do not begin to have a substantial impact by Aug. 1 he would have to conclude that they are not working.

The Carter plan sets minimum prices for steel imports based on the cost of production and transportation of the world's lowest-cost producer, Japan.

Stinson conceded that nearly all steel producers are experiencing a big upsurge in orders during the second quarter, some of it due to increased demand for steel and some of it because the trigger prices keep out undervalued steel.

But he said the trigger prices are too low and that they should be increased by between $25 and $40 a ton.

Mark Anthony, president of the California-based Kaiser Steel Corp., said the trigger prices are doing little to keep Japanese steel out of the West Coast markets because the trigger prices are the lowest on the West Coast.

Because the trigger prices include transportation charges, West Coast prices are cheaper than those in the Midwest or East Coast because Japan is closer to Los Angeles than to Chicago or Pittsburgh.

The Carter administration designed its minimum price system under heavy pressure from steel companies, steel workers and Congress—all of whom were convinced that unfair European and Japanese steel marketing was costing American workers jobs.

Major steel companies have been waging a campaign against foreign steel for years, but only recently have they been joined by their labor unions, becoming a potent force in Congress. Protectionist sentiment has been growing in Congress not just for steel but among industries as widely dispersed as color television, shoes, and fasteners such as nuts and bolts.

President Carter's chief trade negotiator, Robert Strauss, has reached a number of voluntary restraint agreements with countries supplying shoes and televisions, but by far the most comprehensive program to restrict imports was the trigger price mechanism devised by a task force headed by Treasury Undersecretary Anthony Solomon.

The mechanism relies on the same anti-dumping laws that steel industry officials said yesterday they want to toughen. If steel is imported into this country at a price below the trigger price, an immediate investigation is launched to determine whether the item is being sold below the cost of production, which is illegal under U.S. law.

If the item is found to be in violation of trade laws, the Treasury then slaps on a special tariff.

The trigger price system is designed to speed up an anti-dumping investigation, reaching a tentative decision in three to six months, rather than the year or more it takes under normal anti-dumping procedures.

But the existence of trigger prices, which were just revised upwards, is supposed to eliminate unfair trade before it occurs, on the theory that foreign suppliers will not test the system by selling below the trigger price.●

HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Tsongas amendment. Last November, the House overwhelmingly passed a resolution denouncing repressive actions by the South African Government. This resolution urged the President to "take effective measures against the Republic of South Africa in order to register the deep concern of the American people about the continued violation of human rights in that country."

The language that was added to H.R. 12157 by my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) is a most effective measure, I believe. It will not force an overnight change in South Africa, but it will send a clear signal to South Africa and the rest of the world that American concern over the institutionalized racism that exists in South Africa will be a barrier to a continuation of Ex-Im Bank activities in South Africa. It is time for the House to back up its rhetoric of last October with action and defeat the effort to kill this amendment.●

MAJ. GEN. JOHN K. SINGLAUB ADDRESSES AMERICAN SECURITY COUNCIL—PART I

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, today the distinguished American soldier, Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub addressed the news media luncheon of the American Security Council. He told those present of the events that had led up to his early retirement from the military, and outlined events that must distress and dismay every patriotic American.

For the information of my colleagues I am providing a copy of the text of General Singlaub's remarks, and will at a later date provide a copy of the question and answer session that followed the formal presentation.

General Singlaub's remarks follow:

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GENERAL JOHN K. SINGLAUB, U.S.A. (RET.), AT AMERICAN SECURITY COUNCIL NEWS MEDIA LUNCHEON, ARMY & NAVY CLUB, WASHINGTON, D.C.

At the outset I think I should make it clear that I believe in civilian control of the military. My early retirement was not brought about because I deliberately defied that civilian authority, but because my opposition to some of the policies of the current administration was inadvertently made public. When that occurred, I concluded that the only honorable thing I could do would be to submit a request for voluntary retirement as soon as practical. This was accepted by the Army and I did retire on the 31st of May.

The events that led up to my early retirement have been somewhat misreported and I would like to set the record straight. At the end of April, I was asked to present a leadership course as part of a perspective building series at Georgia Tech University for ROTC cadets. I had been asked to be one of their first guest speakers. A question and answer period was to follow which I felt should be off-the-record to permit a free exchange between the guest speaker and the ROTC cadets. I had proposed this to university officials and my office reported to me that the university had agreed to those ground rules.

As it turned out, there was a breakdown in communications and the officer who reported to me that the question and answer period would be off the record was apparently describing a second question and answer period which was to take place for the faculty only at a subsequent luncheon. I entered the auditorium still believing that it was to be an off-the-record question and answer period even though there was a television camera present. I was assured before I took the platform that this was an in-house camera belonging to Georgia Tech for the purpose of recording guest speakers. I had no objections to any members of the press reporting on the contents of my speech.

In that question and answer period, some controversial questions were asked on military subjects, by a military audience and they asked for my personal military opinion. I gave that opinion honestly, explaining that it was my personal opinion; however we all know that that was made public and created a situation which resulted in my early retirement.

I have no regrets about having retired. I have had a good career in the Army I am proud of my service to my country and have no bitterness whatsoever toward the Department of the Army or any of its officials. I suspect that the Georgia Tech incident might have gone unnoticed if it had not been a second occurrence for me. The first time I brought displeasure to the administration was last year in Korea when, in the course of presenting some background information to a Washington Post reporter, I stated my belief that the withdrawal of all the ground forces from Korea on the schedule proposed by the administration would lead to war. I initially expressed that as the view of the Korean military but assured the reporter that I believed this myself and I still do.

The basis of that belief is that the policy of withdrawing troops from Korea at this time was undoubtedly out-dated based on information concerning the military capabilities of the North Koreans. The policy of the campaigning candidate was announced before intelligence resources had been brought to bear on the North Korean situation. It must be assumed that current intelligence information was not available to those who had advised the presidential candidate.

At the present time, the North Koreans have a military force superior to that of the Armed Forces of the Republic of Korea and the United Nations command combined.

It is not simply a matter of the strength of the North Korean forces, but also the acts of aggression which have been committed by the North with offensive operations in mind. I refer specifically to their continued infiltration of agents through the demilitarized zone and by the sea into the islands on the coast of South Korea. They have conducted tunneling operations which are obviously only for offensive activity. The North Koreans have moved their artillery forward so that they are now just north of the demilitarized zone. They have moved their airfields forward to extend the range of their aircraft into South Korea. None of these action can be considered purely defensive. So much for the Korean situation.

Another subject on which I had some disagreement with the current policies of the Department of Defense concerns the use of women in combat units. While I have to admit to being enthusiastic about women in the Armed Forces—my wife was a Navy Ensign when I met her—I feel that the concept of placing women in combat units is wrong. I arrived at that conclusion not because I feel women cannot perform most tasks as well as men; but because I feel that as a Nation, we should not have women in combat units.

In my exerience, women in a combat situation have an adverse impact on the male soldiers or servicemen in the area. Men tend to be protective and while we might educate a generation of men who do not have that attitude, it is my contention that as long as men have mothers, they tend to be protective of women.

During the tree-trimming crisis in the joint security area of the Korean DMZ in 1976, I observed many good soldiers who were so concerned about their wives, girlfriends, or their subordinate women soldiers that they left their duty stations to see to their welfare. That attitude toward women cannot be eliminated by training.

The second major objection I have is that the presence of women in our combat units is perceived by our friends as well as by our potential enemies as a sign of weakness. The projected goal for our army to be 12 percent women will be considered a weakening of that army with a consequent reduction in the deterrent effect of that force.

I think it is significant that the Soviet Union has no more than 10,000 women in a force of over 4 million and that Israelis have never used women in combat in their current Israeli defense forces. The great myth about their participation in combat goes back to the day of the Haganah and the Palestine liberation activities where they were used, with great publicity, primarily for deception reasons. The Israeli forces today are not prepared to lower the combat effectiveness of their units by placing women in those combat units.

Another point on which I have expressed some concern relates to the cancellation of the production of the neutron warhead. Most observers of the European scene recognize that NATO's greatest concern is the large number of tanks in the Warsaw Pact countries.

Their conventional forces, primarily armored heavy forces, are the greatest threat today. The neutron bomb is considered as an anti-tank or anti-mechanized weapon which would enable the forces to attack the large formations of armored vehicles in effect by incapacitating their crews. The cancellation of that great hope of NATO appeared to me to be unsound on the basis of military considerations. I consider, and have expressed, the view that to cancel it without receiving any compensating concessions from the Soviets is throwing away a trump card.

I have expressed the view, and feel rather strongly, that the cancellation of the B–1 bomber is in somewhat the same category.

I have expressed the view concerning the SALT discusions that I find no basis in history to support the concept of unilateral disarmament. The Soviets are not born-again Christians; they are in fact born-again Bolsheviks and they have no Judeo-Christian ethic to prompt them to grant us the same concessions we are making in hopes that they will reciprocate. They have not done that in the past and history is quite clear that the reverse is true.

I have suggested that our chief SALT negotiator places the United States at a disadvantage from the beginning. Mr. Warnke is known by the Soviets and the rest of the world as advocating unilateral disarmament and I believe that if I were negotiating against him, knowing his proclivities and announced views, it would be relatively easy to take advantage of him.

Finally, I have expressed the view that the renegotiation of the Panama Canal Treaty was an appropriate subject for consideration; but the give-away provisions in the current treaties, in my mind, were unnecessary. I think the important point is to be able to use the canal. Turning the canal over to the weakest military force and the least stable government in the hemisphere does not really enhance the security of the canal, in my view. Also, the high probability of an alliance between Castro and Torrijos sugests that in the future restrictions may be placed on the use of the canal in the same way that the Egyptians used the Suez Canal to place certain pressures on the Israelis in 1956.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize the fact that in all the expressions of disagreement with policies of the administration I have never challenged the civilian leadership and in all cases I was expressing a clearly labeled personal view on a military subject of which I had some knowledge and expertise.

It seems to me that one of the key issues here is that a professional officer has to be able to distinguish between proper and improper support. Blind, unquestioning obedience to decisions on military matters which were made without reference to the Nation's military advisors may not be in the best long term interests of the United States. For the military to remain silent under these circumstances is interpreted as consent. I believe that the citizens of this country have a right to expect that important decisions affecting our national security have been made with due consideration of the best military advice available.

With regard to my own personal plans, I intend to retire and make my base in Colorado. I do, however, plan to work very closely with the American Security Council in their efforts to inform American citizens about key national security issues. I intend in the very near future to work with the defense task force of the American Conservative Union to produce a film that will illustrate some of these key national defense issues. I have enjoyed this opportunity to express these views to you and I look forward now to receiving your questions.●

HON. RONALD A. SARASIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. SARASIN. Mr. Speaker, on June 2, 1978, I was absent for part of the legislative session of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 395: H.R. 12050: Tuition Tax Credits. The House rejected an amendment in the nature of a substitute that sought to provide deferral of income taxes for college tuition, which the taxpayer would repay over a period of 10 years, rather than a tax credit. "No";

Rollcall No. 396: H.R. 12050: Tuition Tax Credits. The House passed the measure to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a Federal income tax port-Import Bank. "Yea";

Rollcall No. 397: H. Res. 1168: Rule. The House agreed to the resolution providing for consideration of H.R. 12157, a bill to extend the authority for the Export-Import Bank. "Yea";

Rollcall No. 398: H. Res. 1208: Rule. The House agreed to the resolution providing for consideration of the bill H.R. 15, a bill to extend the authorization for the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. "Yea":

Rollcall No. 399: H.R. 12157. The House agreed to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, "Yea"; and Rollcall No. 401: H.R. 12157: Export-Import Bank. The House rejected an amendment that sought to permit the Bank to guarantee, insure, or extend credit to South Africa as long as it also extends credit to or is authorized to extend credit to communist countries. "No".●

HUBERT HUMPHREY'S LAST BATTLE

HON. BRUCE F. CAPUTO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. CAPUTO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues excerpts from an article by Alexander Cockburn that appeared in the December issue of the New Statesman which poignantly describes Hubert Humphrey's last and perhaps hardest battle: The fight against cancer. This article discusses an area of medical research which touches everyone either directly or indirectly. We all, at the least, have heard stories of someone with cancer. That alone should be an impetus for recognizing the importance of cancer research. I am sure that my colleagues will find this article as interesting as I.

HUBERT HUMPHREY'S LAST BATTLE

(By Alexander Cockburn)

In 1930, when Hubert Humphrey was 19 and about to attend college, the death rate from cancer in the United States was 112 per 100,000. In 1940, the year he married, the rate was 120. By the time he entered the U.S. Senate in 1948 it had risen to 125. Today the rate stands at 132 per 100,000: an 11 per cent rise per decade over the last 40 years. This year 385,000 Americans will die of cancer, a victim every one and a half minutes. One out of every six deaths is due to cancer. Over a quarter of the population will develop cancer in their lifetimes and one out of every five will die of it.

Only three major causes of death (of which cancer is second only to heart disease in the United States) have significantly increased in recent years in the U.S.: cancer, homicide and cirrhosis of the liver. Much of the increase is due to smoking. For males the rate of death from lung cancer rose from 18 per cent per 100,000 in 1950 to 52 per cent per 100,000 today. For women it tripled from 4 to 12.3. And the cancer plague is not indifferently distributed by providence. It is not—contrary to established ideology—a simple case of "bad luck".

Since 1950, when Hubert Humphrey was first campaigning for civil rights in the U.S. Senate, the cancer rate among black males has increased 50 percent; among white males, 20 percent. More blacks get cancer and more die from it. As the American Cancer Society puts it: "Because blacks predominate in the lower socio-economic groups, many are exposed to industrial carcinogens." Paralleling such emphasis on the industrial environment, it is now widely accepted that from 70 to 90 percent of all cancers are environmentally induced or related.

Americans die of cancers caused by the air they breathe, the water they drink, the food they eat and even (given the recent ban on certain children's nightwear for being carcinogenic) the clothes they wear. . . . Yet, the emphasis has rather been on technology—can the cancer be successfully cut out, and on chemotherapeutic techniques—rather than on the circumstances which probably provoked the cancer in the first place.

To take the environmental aspect a stage further, and thus see the sort of political action required: it is now estimated that there are 50,000 manufactured chemicals to which Americans are exposed in one way or another. Of these 12–15,000 are believed to cause cancer. . . . But no more than 50 percent of the suspect chemicals are regulated by the Federal Government. . . . Any determined confrontation with cancer by the Government needs to involve testing all chemicals before they are released into the environment. . . . The testing programme, until now, has received less than 6 percent of the National Cancer Institute's resources, and less than 7 percent of the Institute's staff. It has been charged in Congress that the Government is only managing to test 27 new chemicals (out of 800) each year.

One might have thought that Humphrey's public demonstration of the effects of the second largest killer in the U.S. might have stimulated some interest, even some action in this quarter. Not so. The passing of the "Happy Warrior", so securely part of the system for his active life, is not even now being allowed seriously to discommode arrangements which are killing more than the combined victims of the wars in Korea and Vietnam each year.●

HON. GILLIS W. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. LONG of Louisana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to indicate a correction of my vote on the House floor for a recorded vote on May 31 on the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for fiscal year 1979. I intended to vote "yea" on rollcall No. 389, an amendment which would preclude expenditure of funds under the act for use directly or indirectly to implement the Panama Canal treaties without a specific act of Congress authorizing such action.

I hurriedly left a meeting of the Rules Committee to be present for this important vote, and in my hurry mistakenly pushed the wrong button. I regret that these things do happen in the press of congressional business, but I would like the record to show that this was an error on my part. I support the restriction against departmental activities relative to implementation of the Panama Canal treaties without express consent of Congress. I have consistently supported this position on other occasions here in the House and ask at this point that the permanent RECORD show this correction.●

FINANCIAL STATEMENT

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, this statement marks the 5th consecutive year I have made a voluntary financial disclosure statement covering my personal transactions and use of taxpayer funds in the operation of Pennsylvania's 12th District Congressional Office.

On April 30, 1978, in compliance with the rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I filed the required financial disclosure statement.

I make this additional statement for two reasons. First, to make clear that in the exercise of my duties I am subject to no conflicts of interest that would prevent me from representing the 12th Congressional District. Second, to indicate how tax moneys have been spent in operation of the office.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to insert into the RECORD my financial statement covering January 1, 1977 through December 31, 1977:

FINANCIAL STATEMENT

PART I: PERSONAL FINANCES

A. Taxes

Total taxes paid for the year 1977 amounted to $19,560; this included Federal income tax and Pennsylvania state and local taxes.

B. Sources of all income

My total income for 1977 amounted to $58,560. $54,275 was accounted for by my Congressional salary and the balance was comprised of interest on a savings account I hold jointly with my wife, wages from the Johnstown Car Wash of which I am Secretary, honoraria from the General Public Utilities Service Corporation of Parsippany, New Jersey and the Ohio Mining and Reclamation Association, dividends on stock owned in the First Tyler Bank and Trust Company of Sistersville, West Virginia, and AT&T.

C. Holdings and interests

(1) Living accommodations.—My wife and I jointly own a home in Johnstown where we have lived since 1961. In Washington I rented an apartment during 1977.

(2) Stocks.—I own stock in the Johnstown Minute Car Wash located on Roosevelt Boulevard. I have served as Secretary of the Car Wash organization since 1966. I have a few shares of AT&T and First Tyler Bank of West Virginia.

(3) Bonds.—The only bonds I owned in 1977 were U.S. Savings Bonds.

(4) Loans.—As of December of 1977 I owed the Dale National Bank for loans made for routine home and family expenses.

(5) Transportation.—I own a 1977 Ford and a 1974 Ford. My wife owns a 1977 Ford.

(6) Other assets.—The only other assets I have are life insurance policies with a cash value.

PART II: OFFICE REPORT

A. Office Supply Account

In 1977, I received $6,500.00 in the stationery account. This is a general fund used for the purchase of regular office supplies such as paper, envelopes, stationery, pens, pencils, and other daily office needs. An additional $1,692.00 was provided by the Committee on House Administration at my request to compensate for additional supplies required in the Johnstown District Office ruined by the Flood of 1977. Many of our supplies were stored in an area of the building that was flooded.

An additional item purchased from this fund is American flags flown over the U.S. Capitol. In general, I ask persons requesting flags to pay for the flag themselves. There are cases, however, where a constituent or organization (particularly nonprofit groups) deserves to be honored for outstanding service to our area or nation. In such instances, I purchase the flags from this account. Examples during 1977 included several Volunteer Fire Companies, a County Agriculture Service Center, several Veterans Posts, and Scout Troops. All of the 1977 allowance was used plus some funds transferred to the account.

B. Postage

This fund allows the purchase of stamps for official business use not covered by the Congressional frank. This includes foreign postage, special delivery, and cases of routine office procedure not covered by the frank. The occasion where the office uses the fund most is in purchasing special delivery stamps where it is important that a report or inquiry be returned to a constituent or community official as quickly as possible. In 1977 the postage allowance was $211. I expended $783.00 for postage, the excess over the allowance being provided through the transfer of funds from other accounts authorized by regulations of the U. S. House of Representatives for this purpose.

C. Communication

The Communication fund was established two years ago to facilitate the correspondence between members and constituents. The uses I made of this fund were in typesetting and negative preparation of newsletters and meeting notices, plus the preparation of polls and questionnaires.

The allowance for this fund in 1977 was $5,000. An additional $1,102.09 was transferred into the fund during the year. The total costs from the fund were $2,895.29 for communication. In addition, under the House rules, $3,176 was transferred from this fund to cover costs in other accounts. Thus, at the end of the year the Communication allowance showed a balance of $30.80.

D. Computer

During 1977 I had a computer terminal in my Washington office which was used as a link with the data in the Library of Congress. The total cost in 1977 was $855. No direct allowance is provided for this purpose, but funds can be transferred from other accounts into a computer fund. The final balance in the account at year's end was $555.70.

E. Equipment Lease

To operate the Congressional office, it is essential to lease a number of pieces of equipment both in Washington and the district offices. These include copying machines, typewriters, and similar items. The allowance by the House in 1977 for this purpose was $9,000. I spent $7,625.70 and transferred $894.85 out of the account, leaving a balance at the end of the year of $479.45.

F. District Office Rent

In previous years, the rent for office space in federal buildings was automatically reimbursed by the House. Beginning in 1977 this was subtracted from an account provided to the member.

In 1977 I retained district offices in Johnstown, Kittanning, Somerset, Punxsutawney and Indiana. All, with the exception of the Indiana office, are located in federal buildings. The total rental in 1977 for all offices amounted to $12,707, paid by the Office of Finance.

G. Official Expenses

Under this category items were covered for official office actions not provided under oath accounts. As examples, I received $555.69 in reimbursements for official travel within the Congressional District. The costs of subscriptions to newspapers, and research items were paid from this account. Another item included was costs of taping my weekly radio report. The allowance for this category was $2,000. An additional $4,221.02 was transferred into the account, and a balance of $1,327.82 remained at the close of 1977.

H. Travel

This fund covers official trips between the Congressional District and Washington. Official business trips by staff between those locations can also be reimbursed from this fund. The allowance for 1977 was $2,746 and an additional $1,000 was transferred into the account. Of this total $661.23 remained when the year ended. Virtually every week I drive between Washington and the Congressional District.

I. Telecommunications

The basic costs of official telephone service and long distance calls are covered by this account. The total allowance was $15,952.23. Of this total $13,194.57 was spent and $2,500 was transferred into other accounts, leaving a balance of $257.66. Additional phone costs were encountered during the flood activity. Following the flood a reevaluation of our phone system resulted in changes designed to economize for the remainder of the year.

J. Staff

During 1977 I was allowed a maximum of 18 staff positions and a total allowance of $260,871. Of this amount, all positions were filled. At year's end a balance of $352 remained in the fund. This resulted from paying salaries plus the transfer of $10,018 into other accounts. I have seven people on my staff in Washington including an administrative assistant; legislative assistant; legal adviser; case worker (veterans, black lung, social security, etc.), two secretaries and a receptionist.

The other staff members serve throughout the 12th Congressional District. All but two of the staff members presently or formerly resided in the 12th Congressional District.

K. Government Travel

In 1977 I took four trips as part of my official oversight work as a member of the House Appropriations Committee. Those trips where:

February 14.—One day inspection of Naval installation at Norfolk, Virginia, for Military Construction Subcommittee. Trip: Johnstown to Norfolk and return. Transportation provided by government owned aircraft. I claimed the $50 per diem allotment and $5.14 for costs.

March 16.—One day inspection trip to the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard for Military Construction Subcommittee. Trip: Washington to Philadelphia and return. No per diem allotment was claimed. The transportation cost was $64.

April 11 to April 13.—Inspection of projects and activities on Indian reservation in New Mexico as part of oversight for the Interior Subcommittee. The air transportation reimbursement was $601.00. A per diem allowance of $125 was also claimed.

December 2 to December 4.—Inspection of the Tooele Army Depot in Utah where the Military Construction Subcommittee was concerned about the storage of chemical weapons. Trip: Johnstown to Tooele to Salt Lake City and return to Johnstown. Transportation cost of $390 (part of the transportation was provided by government-owned aircraft), and $100 per diem was claimed (from an allowed $50 per day).

In summary, the total allotment for the office for 1977 was $316,268.48. A balance of $3,782.47 remained as of May 17, 1978.

Since taking office in 1974 I have returned to the Treasury a total of $90,756.24. These savings were realized while maintaining full service to the people of the 12th Congressional District.●

FAA AVIATION NOISE SYMPOSIUM

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, as one of the principal authors of the Airport and Aircraft Noise Reduction Act, H.R. 8729, which has been reported out of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and now awaits floor action, I long have had an interest in finding solutions to the airport/aircraft noise problems which now constitute one of the major environmental problems confronting us. H.R. 8729 is a constructive approach to solving those problems for the air carrier airports and the air carrier fleet.

Similar problems are confronting many of the general aviation airports, especially those located in urban areas. Recently the Federal Aviation administration held a noise symposium in Los Angeles in a constructive effort to bring together the various interests involved. One of the papers presented at the symposium was prepared and delivered by William J. Critchfield, A.A.E., Airport Manager of the Torrance Municipal Airport in Torrance, Calif., located in the district I am privileged to represent.

Torrance Municipal Airport is one of the Nation's busiest with more flight operations per year than nearby Los Angeles International Airport.

Mr. Critchfield's remarks, even though addressing a controversial issue, will be of interest to many others who are facing similar problems. The congressional mail, called to the attention of the Aviation Subcommittee which I chair, indicates that the problem exists across the United States and will require the good will and the concerted attention of all the diverse interests involved if it is to be solved.

PRESENTATION TO THE FAA AVIATION NOISE SYMPOSIUM

(By W. J. Critchfield, A.A.E., Airport Manager)

Good afternoon, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The question, "Can general aviation airports survive in today's environment?" can be answered in one word: Yes!

During the next few minutes, I will attempt to explain how Torrance Airport, which is one of the busiest general aviation airports in the United States, is going about surviving in today's environment.

The City of Torrance, as proprietor of Torrance Municipal Airport, began last October what has been termed a "pioneering effort" in the area of aircraft noise abatement. Torrance found itself in a situation similar to W. C. Fields, when he said, "I grabbed the bull by the tail and came face to face with the problem."

The City of Torrance has indeed come "face to face" with the problem, with the adoption of a noise ordinance which does three things: First, it sets a noise limit on individual departing and arriving aircraft; second, it establishes a departure curfew, while allowing for business and emergency exemptions if reasonable criteria are met; and third, it restricts the hours during which touch-and-go operations may be performed.

This ordinance, which is a law and certainly appears to be totally concerned with enforcement, is our basic education tool. Since its adoption over six months ago, there has not been a single situation arise in which we have had to resort to enforcement to work to a solution.

For the past year, our noise abatement team has been monitoring aircraft noise with a state-of-the-art, portable noise monitor. Our noise abatement specialist positions himself alongside the runway and records such informational items as climb profile, general wind conditions, estimated percentage of gross weight, and the aircraft's registration number. An environmental quality officer, who is the other half of the team, monitors the noise in a residential area, notes the flight path of the aircraft, and insures that non-aircraft noises are not a factor. All of this information goes into an aircraft noise signature data bank and is also recorded on the individual aircraft's data card. Should an aircraft exceed the noise limits, a notice is sent to the operator. When the operator voluntarily responds, his specific problem is discussed and an acceptable solution is agreed upon. Let me offer a few statistics to show the effectiveness of this educational approach.

Of those operators receiving notices, 76% responded back in a most positive way. Only 9% of these have received a second notice. We have had no third time offenders. Before the ordinance became effective, the number of events which exceeded our selected noise limits was 1.3 aircraft per hour. This rate is now down to .6 of an aircraft per hour. We now have aircraft departure noise data on over 400 individual aircraft, and our data bank now contains noise measurements on over 160 different makes and models of general aviation aircraft.

I would like to briefly mention the departure curfew in effect at Torrance. After carefully considering the impact on interstate and intrastate commerce, the City of Torrance included provisions for business exemptions during the curfew hours. The City also lowered the permissible noise levels during these hours. As a result, business aircraft which flew out of Torrance Airport before the restriction are continuing to do so. There has not been a detectable increase or decrease in the number of departures. Not one single aircraft used for business has been denied the right to depart; and not one noise complaint has been received concerning these departures.

The restrictions on touch-and-go operations have naturally impacted the flight school operators at Torrance Airport. After considerable and I might add, unique, analysis of the entire student training operation, which is about 40 percent of our total operations, a cooperative effort was begun with the flight schools. Without going into detail, let me say that we feel that we can safely correct the problem of an excessively large traffic pattern and eventually adjust this restriction.

All of these accomplishments—the noise limits, the curfew and the touch-and-go restrictions—have come about not by enforcement of the noise ordinance, but by education.

At this point you are probably wondering how Torrance Airport became involved in all of this. Those of you who live in the area know about our city and how we compare with the other municipalities in this area. For those of you who are not familiar with the City of Torrance, and whose last recollection of us was our float in the Rose Parade, let me say simply this: Within and around the City of Torrance live some of the most sophisticated and intelligent citizens to be found anywhere. Many of these same citizens fly in and out of Torrance Airport. We are not "homeowners" or "pilots": we are people—people with different goals and pursuits and ideas, but with the same rights. The City of Torrance cares about its people, and because general aviation is a pursuit of some of these people, the City cares about its airport—as well it should.

Torrance Airport handles more flight operations a year than most big city air carrier airports, including our neighbor, LAX. It not only pays its own way and returns dollars to the City coffers, but it also provides millions of dollars in increased revenue for the businesses both within the city and in our neighboring cities.

As the city and the airport grew side by side, they unfortunately grew closer together. While our solution to this problem may be unique, the problem itself certainly is not. Throughout this country, almost every one of the 11,000-plus airports faces this problem to some degree. At Torrance Airport, the problem became critical—not by federal standards; not by state standards; not by county standards; but by our own city standards. The City of Torrance has always endeavored to maintain the highest standards possible for all of its people; and it decided that Torrance Airport would not become an exception. Our goal was to eliminate the unnecessary noise involved in the daily operations of the airport.

And so the work began—committees, meetings, studies, public forums, deliberations, testing, analyzing, and finally action.

We have been strongly criticized not only by our own people, but by just about everyone else involved in airport noise abatement (including many of you in this room), but in looking over the few options we had available, we chose this course of action because, in the words of the former Washington Redskin coach George Allen, "The future is now." He could not take his team to the Superbowl in two years by utilizing future draft picks; and we cannot save general aviation by relying on the "draft picks" of Part 36 certification. Not only were many of the business and pleasure aircraft being flown today manufactured years ago, but certification of a general aviation aircraft does not prevent a pilot from laying down 103 decibels of noise on people's homes at seven o'clock on Sunday morning.

The future is now, not only for Torrance Airport, but for general aviation as well. In 1976, of the 11,713 airports in this country, 11,083 were exclusive general aviation airports. Between January 1971 and December 1975, 987 airports closed. In 1976, 220 more airports were abandoned, and approximately the same number in 1977. General aviation now has a fleet of over 153,000 aircraft, compared to 2,600 air carrier aircraft. Each time a general aviation airport closes, the aircraft using that airport must find another airport to accept them. Torrance Airport cannot handle many more of these refugees. This slow death of general aviation airports must be stopped, and the City of Torrance is dedicated to this. While some of our recent actions may seem to be in direct conflict with what I have just said, let me explain exactly what Torrance Airport, and most general aviation airports, face when confronted with a noise problem.

The FAA Aviation Noise Abatement Policy of November 18, 1976, the State of California's Department of Aeronautics Title 21 Noise Standards, the EPA's recommendations, and most other sources of direction deal primarily with jet air carrier operations. It is estimated by the U.S. Department of Transportation that over 6 million people are impacted by aircaft noise from the 23 major air carrier airports in the U.S. The Air Transport Association identifies an additional 9 airports as being "noise sensitive." If, then, over 6 million people are impacted by these 24 airports, how many millions more are impacted by the remaining 11,000-plus airports? Only the most uninformed person would say that general aviation aircraft do not make noise.

Consider the following single event noise readings obtained in the residential areas adjacent to Torrance Airport:

A twin-engine Aero-Commander 560 at 91 decibels;

A single-engine Beech Bonanza at 93 decibels;

A single-engine Cessna 206 at 95 decibels;

A single-engine Piper Cherokee at 95 decibels; and

A twin-engine Beech Queen Air at 105 decibels.

These are just a few examples of the many readings we have in our data bank. In addition to the sound level itself, the duration of these fly-overs sometimes exceeds 40 seconds. It is this duration factor that prompted the State of California to acknowledge single event measurements which take into consideration both the magnitude of the noise and the duration of the noise as heard above the community ambient noise level. We in Southern California who spend much of our leisure time outside can appreciate this type of measurement.

For the vast majority of general aviation airports, the preferential runway concept cannot be used since there is only one runway, or, as in the case at Torrance, two parallel runways. Proper land use planning and zoning unfortunately came too late to be a viable alternative for most general aviation airports. Building codes that require adequate soundproofing for future construction are fine, but what about the existing buildings and homes? And how do you soundproof backyards and parks and beaches? The "buying-up" of existing residential areas is neither financially feasible or politically viable. Displaced thresholds do not solve the problem, since general aviation aircraft are not particularly noisy on approach, and, in the case of proficiency or training, a displaced threshold of 800 feet can easily result in an increase in noise of over 40% on departure for a 100-horsepower aircraft such as Cessna 150.

Higher glide slope angles again offer little relief, as the specific problem area is in the departures, not the arrivals, of general aviation aircraft.

The FAA's integrated noise model lists information on only four models of general aviation non-jet aircraft.

And the list goes on and on. Everywhere we turned, we found that the solutions presented pertained to either future airports or jet air carrier airports, or simply were not practical. We found that the wheels of noise abatement presently on the market wouldn't fit the much smaller cart of general aviation. So the City of Torrance set out to invent a smaller wheel that would fit not only our own cart but the carts of almost every other general aviation airport.

It is human nature to scoff at inventors, so we don't mind when people scoff at us. We simply look at the results achieved so far. While it doesn't do much good to toot our own horn in the midst of all the din that is going on now, I would like to briefly summarize what we have achieved in six months.

Besides the statistics I mentioned earlier relative to aircraft meeting our noise limits and qualifying for departure curfew exemptions:

We have convinced our flight schools that the future of student training at the airport depends upon them. To this end, we are now working together to incude noise abatement techniques in their training programs.

We have been in and out of court with the local pilots' association, and they are now actively involved in a public relations effort to improve the image of the airport.

We have worked with over 40 different pilots in an aircraft evaluation program in which various noise abatement techniques are monitored. These test runs are voluntary, with the expenses borne by the pilots themselves, and they are conducted within the parameters of the aircraft operator's manual in a manner accepted as safe by the pilots. The results of this on-going program have shown noise reductions ranging from 9 to 22 decibels. These numbers are quite encouraging when you consider that a decrease of 10 decibels reduces the noise by 50%.

We have examined our training traffic pattern and found that our eventual goal of pulling the pattern off of the residential areas will reduce the noise of these aircraft by 22 to 67 percent.

We have applied for and received at the State level a grant for our permanent noise monitor. We are currently in the bid process for a noise monitoring system equal in size to many major airports, but with a more advanced technology incorporated into it. Very few sounds in the world can duplicate that of a jet aircraft, but you would be amazed how many sounds are similar to that of a general aviation aircraft. In order to distinguish between aircraft and community noise, the City of Torrance has designed a sophisticated system. While the State did extend itself in providing extra dollars, we find ourselves in the position of having to come up with an additional 40 to 50 percent in order to accomplish our goals. Interestingly enough, none of this money, either State or City, is for enforcement. It is all for the education concept we have working for us. It was only natural that the expenditure of this sum of money was objected to by the aviation community, who felt that the money should be spent more in the interest of the users. But let me remind you of this simple fact. Torrance Airport covers some 520 acres of property. Today's cost of installing a chain link security fence around the airport is in excess of $130,000. This is a lot of money to spend just because there is a handful of people who would do the airport harm if there were no fence.

Harm can come to the airport from restrictions and closures, and the noise monitor as an educational tool will act as a fence and protect our airport. Our system will not only identify those areas in which there is a noise problem, but it will also identify those areas of the community in which there is no problem. Subjective and emotional rhetoric will be replaced by scientific data. The City of Torrance not only is picking up the tab for the additional system costs, but it has also committed itself to an educational program that will cost in excess of $100,000 a year. The City cares about its airport and about general aviation. We are convinced that, despite the obstacles I have mentioned, we are well down the road towards inventing a wheel that can be shared by all of general aviation. We have programs that any general aviation airport can use. We have concepts that can work almost anywhere. But, you know, it's lonely out here in the woods. We are finding our way out—but we could use some help!

We would like for the FAA to encourage the field level of Air Traffic Control to work with us on our traffic patterns problem. Not by correspondence, but by actual person-to-person contact at our airport. We would like for you to stand with us in the residential areas, and look with us from the Control Tower, and site with us and hear our plans.

We would like for the FAA to encourage the Flight Standards Branch to have their examiners talk with us, and to our flight school instructors and owners, and discuss the real time noise problems at our airport.

From these two concepts, we would like the FAA to give our joint findings to the Academy in Oklahoma City, and let them design safe noise abatement techniques into every flight school syllabus as a requirement. We strongly believe that noise abatement is not the nemesis of safety in the world of general aviation. You have only to watch a departing aircraft finally achieve 1800 feet of altitude at 3 miles from the airport boundary, and then realize that a simple best rate of climb would have put this aircraft at 600 feet at the airport boundary to determine which flight profile is in the interest of safety. Some of our suggested noise abatement techniques come directly from the FAA Academy. Safety should not be compromised; nor should it be used as a crutch by those pilots who are willing to accept a standard at less than the professional level.

We would like for the State and Federal legislatures—and in particular Congressman Anderson and his committee—to continue to address the problem of noise abatement, especially in the area of general aviation.

We would like the media to begin to show the gains and results of not only our efforts but of the efforts of everyone involved in this issue.The impact of the media upon the population of this country has long been established. While we realize that quiet general aviation airplanes do not make headlines, as do noisy air carrier airplanes, we firmly believe that there is an audience of millions out there who want to hear how we are dealing positively with their noise impact problems.

To the airlines, we ask for your public support. We realize that you have problems facing you of a magnitude we in general aviation cannot comprehend, but we ask you to remember that your future pilots are today's general aviation pilots, and many of your passengers make their connections by general aviation aircraft from and to airports you cannot service.

We would like for the Environmental Protection Agency to work with us in the area of analysis of social problems and public reaction and response in the communities surrounding general aviation airports. The bottom line in noise abatement is not a decibel reading: it is the impact of unnecessary noise on the daily lives of residents of these areas.

We ask the Federal, State, and County agencies to join forces for the good of many, and to act promptly in the acquisition of satellite training areas. In our own particular case, I am referring to the reactivation of Reeves Field on Terminal Island as a general aviation airport and training facility from its present status of imported car parking lot.

We ask that you Councilpersons involved in City and County governments ask us what you can do to help us help you.

We ask the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association to not only continue their trend towards acceptance of noise abatement, but that you reallocate resources from fighting the program to helping solve the problems.

Gone forever in metropolitan areas are the days of goggles and the silk scarf.

Of all the help we are asking for, we need the help of the individual pilot more than anyone else, for ultimately, it is the individual contribution of each and every general aviation pilot that will allow general aviation to grow and prosper.

We ask the General Aviation Manufacturers Association to work closely with us in the sharing of noise data, so that your engineers may more quickly achieve those technological improvements which you are already pursuing. We ask you to recognize that quieter aircraft can be marketed to your advantage; and we specifically ask those manufacturers who already endorse the concept of quite general aviation aircraft to publish noise emission figures, just as you now publish other performance information.

We would like for the National Business Aircraft Association, who in 1967 published noise abatement cockpit procedures for business jet aircraft, to do the same for non-jet general aviation aircraft.

We would like for private enterprise to investigate the after-market retrofit possibilities in power plant noise suppression, especially in the area of propeller RPM reduction, since over 80 percent of the noise is generated from the propelier.

We have asked for a lot, and we have asked for it quickly, but as I said before, for general aviation, the future is now. We must trade our future draft choices for what is available today if we are to win in this league.

The City of Torrance is well along in the design of this wheel, and it seems more logical for you to help us to perfect a common wheel for everyone, rather than re-invent your own wheel.

Pride in accomplishment has carried us from Kitty Hawk, North Carolina, to the planet Moon. I am proud to be a part of aviation; a part of general aviation; and to be an airport manager, working for a city that takes pride in itself.

I am proud to have been honored here today as a speaker.

Thank you.●

THE LATE SENATOR JAMES B. ALLEN

HON. J. WILLIAM STANTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1978

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I know the entire House is saddened by the message that the gentleman from Alabama has given us. I cannot help but think that Senator ALLEN was truly a giant among our times, this man who has contributed so much to our country and to the gentleman's State.

I join the gentleman from Alabama in expressing truly our condolences to his family in the great loss personally to them and to this country.

NORTH KOREA BUILDUP WORRIES GENERAL

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the President's plan to withdraw our troops from Korea has already cost the United States the services of a very able and professional military leader, Gen. John K. Singlaub. Many persons attempted to point out to President Carter that we can ill afford to ignore the stated intentions of Kim Il Sung and North Korea to liberate the Republic of Korea by force. Whatever glossy coating and pink ribbons are put on the package, no one will be fooled. A retreat is a retreat and no amount of press statements from the White House will change that fact. In the meantime, the huge North Korean arms buildup continues. This was discussed by our United Nation's Commander in Korea, Gen. John Vessey, Jr., in a wire story that appeared in the Atlanta Journal and Constitution of May 28, 1978. General Vessey, it should be noted expresses some of the same concerns as did General Singlaub. The problem will not go away, Mr. President, the challenge has to be met or America will have to continue its slide toward becoming a second-class power. The item follows:

NORTH KOREA BUILDUP WORRIES GENERAL

SEOUL, KOREA.—Former Army sergeant, now general, John Vessey, Jr., says the time has come for America to back up its words in Korea with actions.

Vessey, who during his 39 years in the Army has accumulated a Purple Heart, the Distinguished Service Cross, two Bronze Stars for bravery and four stars as a general, bosses the United Nations command in Korea. He gets paid $46,500 a year as the hired American gun to keep the peace in South Korea and prevent the Kim Il Sung gang from riding south and invading South Korea again.

"Certainly the American government has said in hard, clear terms that its plan to withdraw U.S. ground troops from Korea does not mean our total withdrawal from this part of the world," Vessey told a group of Tennessee editors in Seoul. "But in security matters and military matters, actions speak louder than words."

The 55-year-old Minneapolis mustang with the thinning light hair and the restless eyes confided his worries about maintaining peace and tranquility south of the Demilitarized Zone which splits Korea into two countries at the midriff of the 650-mile peninsula.

"Every indication we have is that North Korea is building armed forces oriented offensively toward attacking South Korea," he said. "That is its one reason for existence. It's far beyond what is needed for defense; it's what keeps them buying and adding to their inventory in great numbers, and the arms the North Koreans are buying are not defensive weapons.

"I don't believe even Kim Il Sung wants to start a war just for the sake of starting a war," Vessey said, shifting his chair so he could get a better view of the wall map with the red crayoned wound showing the division of the two countries at about the 37th parallel.

"But he's dedicated to unifying the peninsula on his terms, and he'd like to do it politically, but he's going to do it under the threat of an attack. Every evidence that we've seen is that he is preparing for an attack. When the time is right—if that's the only way to do it—I would guess that he would invade."

Using the editors as a jury, Vessey presented his evidence against Kim Il Sung's North Koreans, hoping to prove they are more capable today of an attack on Seoul than when they captured the South Korean capital nearly 28 years ago.

The commander of the American and South Korean forces explained that while the United States was thrashing around in Vietnam, the North Koreans had secretly built up a mighty military machine, including nearly 2,000 tanks, 25 combat divisions, more than 900 fighters, bombers and transport planes along with a dozen submarines and a 2.5 million paramilitary militia.

That was the debit side of his ledger. In black ink, Vessey listed the 40,000 Americans and 600,000 South Koreans under arms, the 11,000 anti-tank weapons, the 300 jet fighters and a long inventory of various sized mortars, artillery pieces, frigates and coastal patrol boats.

The scene could have been the board room of any Western world corporation. There was the long, highly polished table around which were seated the attentively listening shareholders. Vessey, as the board chairman, gave his profit and loss statement in the soft, somber voice board chairmen use when forecasting losses. But his comparable inventories were all explosives ranging in size from bullets to bombs; all designed to kill, to maim, to blind, and to devastate.

The wiry artilleryman who served in World War II and Vietnam said that if the Americans were not in Korea, and if there was no outside help, he believed South Korea would win any war Kim Il Sung started.

Vessey's face muscles hardened and his voice tensed as he added up the production costs of such a victory, costs he had paid and seen others pay in North Africa and Vietnam.

"War is not a game," Vessey explained with pauses between each word. "It is a disaster, and the people of this country have had one disaster in the last 30 years; they don't want another. We are not interested in another disaster here.

"The strategy of the South Korean government is to prevent a war," he continued. "The strategy of the U.S. government is to prevent a war, and the way we prevent a war here is to make it clear to the other guy that starting a war doesn't provide a means to an end for him."

Vessey then ticked off a long list of terrorist attacks launched against South Korea by Kim Il Sung, including one which killed President Park Chung Hee's wife. He told of two recent infiltration attempts by North Korean patrol boats, and the discovery of at least two North Korean-dug tunnels. One tunnel in the "Iron Triangle" area of the Korean War was about three miles long and drilled through solid granite in an attempt to infiltrate troops behind the Demilitarized Zone during an invasion.

"These tunnels, and perhaps others which they may be digging right now, were not for infiltration," Vessey said. "They were for invasion. They are part of the threat of military attack."

Vessey, in addition to being the U.N. commander, is also boss of the U.S. forces in Korea and the Eighth U.S. Army. Thirteen months ago he told another group of newsmen he was opposed to President Carter's plans to remove all ground combat troops from Korea, and last February he told a Senate subcommittee that had he been making the decision, he would not have withdrawn the ground forces "at this time."

"The president has said he's going to withdraw the American ground troops in a fashion that doesn't upset peace and tranquility on the Korean peninsula," Vessey said "Really, that's the only reason we have those forces here. As long as he can do it in a fashion that doesn't upset peace and stability on the Korean peninsula, one can't argue with the decision."

Vessey concluded with his own view on the possibility of another Korean war:

"As long as the United States and the Republic of Korea make it clear to Kim Il Sung that we're going to stand together, you will not start a war. It just doesn't make sense for him to start one."●

TEMPLE UNIVERSITY'S GRADUATION PLANS FOR HANDICAPPED STUDENTS

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, one of Philadelphia's leading educational institutions, Temple University, has set an example of which we can all be proud.

This year, in surveying their prospective graduates, Temple officials identified six persons who meet the Federal definitions as being handicapped.

Already a national leader in educating the handicapped, Temple decided to highlight its efforts in this area by making a special effort to accommodate these six individuals at graduation exercises.

The following news release summaries those exercises, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

The news release follows:

TEMPLE UNIVERSITY NEWS RELEASE

There are 36 million handicapped people in the United States today, according to estimates by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Temple University will salute six of them at its 92nd annual commencement exercises at Civic Center Convention Hall.

The six happen to be graduating from Temple.

One is deaf. One is blind. One is confined to a wheelchair. One lost both legs in World War II. One is a recovered drug addict. One has a genetic birth defect.

To ensure that the deaf graduate can "hear" the commencement exercises, her interpreter, who is also graduating, will "sign" the ceremonies from the stage, the first time this has ever been done at Temple.

It is appropriate that Temple's motto is Perseverantia Vincit—perserverance conquers.

Handicapped people are now being mainstreamed into society, instead of being shutout, because of new rules and regulations providing them equal opportunity under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. HEW defines a handicapped person as anyone with physical or mental impairment that substantially limits or restricts one or more major life activities. Handicapping conditions include alcoholism, cancer, deafness, diabetes, drug addiction, emotional illness, heart disease, orthopedic, speech or visual impairment, among others.

By HEW's definition, these Temple graduates are handicapped. But if you talk to them you find out they haven't let their handicaps stand in the way of their achievements. The graduates are:

Gloria J. Sposato, West Gowen Ave., Philadelphia, Bachelor of Science in Education degree. She was the first deaf person to enter Temple with the aid of an interpreter's services (which schools and colleges are now required to provide if they receive federal money). She teaches at the Pennsylvania School for the Deaf and also at Temple, as a sign language instructor.

Deborah F. Mason, Gypsy Lane, Philadelphia, Master of Education degree with certification in teaching the visually handicapped, mentally retarded, emotionally disturbed and those with learning disabilities. She has been legally blind since birth. She did her master's thesis on the Optacon, a small reading device for the blind that converts print images into tactile images. The thesis is being copyrighted and is believed to be only the second master's thesis at Temple to be copyrighted. She teaches at the Overbrook School for the Blind.

Alice L. Ackroyd, of Nazareth, Pa., Bachelor of Arts degree in psychology. She is a quadriplegic as the result of an automobile accident and spent her two years at Temple in a wheelchair. She is a transfer student from Northampton County Area Community College in Bethlehem.

Harry A. Garton, Richboro, Pa., Doctor of Education degree. He said, "I had not completed high school when I was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1943. Lost both legs April 16, 1945. I decided to go back to school and enrolled in Temple High School in June 1951. From there on I continued to further my education to reach the goal I have now achieved." He is 54 and a curriculum coordinator for arts in Council Rock School District as well as a classroom teacher. This will be his fourth degree from Temple. He gets around with the use of two canes.

Mark L. Nissenbaum, North Marvine St., Philadelphia, Bachelor of Arts in political science. "I am a recovered heroin addict who went through Gaudenbia House drug rehabilitation before coming to Temple," he said. He's an Olney High School graduate and will be 30 on July 18. He plans to go to law school.

Andrea P. Cavallo, South 13th St., Philadelphia, Bachelor of Arts degree in journalism. She was born with a genetic birth defect of the upper limbs. "At times it was a constant proving to myself and my colleagues and my teachers that I am capable to attaining my goals as they are," she said. "I, personally, do not consider it a handicap although it is labeled as such because I, with much determination, can do anything anyone else can do. I drive a car and I never attended private schools. I had 12 years of Catholic schooling and was always an honor student. I also graduated from Community College of Philadelphia with honors in 1975."

Patrick J. Gore, Disston st., Philadelphia, who was Mrs. Sposato's interpreter at Temple, Bachelor of Science degree in business education. He has also interpreted for one of the two deaf graduate students currently enrolled at Temple. As the result of his interpreting for the deaf he has been sitting in on a wide variety of classes he'd never taken otherwise and getting an even broader education than most students. He teaches at Community College of Philadelphia and expects to make a career of teaching the hearing impaired. Through special arrangements with Temple, he studied at Gallaudet College, the only college for the deaf in the U.S., to improve his "signing" ability and get better understanding of communicating with the hearing impaired. No one in his family is deaf.

More than 170 handicapped students are currently registered with Temple's Center for the Disabled. The University is considered a national leader in providing educational opportunities for the handicapped and in research and training related to the education of handicapped persons.●

GENERAL SINGLAUB SPEAKS OUT

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, not since the recall of General MacArthur has any event connected with our armed services caused such a stir as the affair of General Singlaub. Again, as is the case of MacArthur, the question is whether professional military judgement can be ignored to our Nation's peril. In the case of Korea, wherein we fought our first "no win" war, the stage was set for the glorious failure of another "no win" war in Vietnam. In the present instance General Singlaub became persona non grata with the White House because his views in opposition to President Carter's military policies became known to the public. His views, however, are not that unique among the military. As with any professional soldier of good conscience, General Singlaub could not bear to see us cancel weapons that could save American lives, nor give up ground that we might have to take back later at a bloody cost. In this first story to the press since retirement, General Singlaub very ably sketches in what really occurred when he was called back to Washington from Korea. His account does no credit to our President. The article from the Atlanta Journal of June 1, 1978, follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal, June 1, 1978]

GENERAL SINGLAUB SPEAKS OUT

(By Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, U.S.A., Ret.)

Early in the afternoon of May 21, 1977, I had my first meeting with President Carter.

Defense Secretary Harold Brown and I had driven over to the White House less than 12 hours after I had been recalled from my post as chief of staff for United Nations forces in Korea.

The secretary went in first to see the president for a few minutes, and then we both entered the Oval Office. The president came in and was all smiles. He sat down and asked me to tell him what had taken place.

I reviewed the details of my interview with Washington Post reporter John Saar. During what I thought was a background discussion, I had expressed concern over any plans to withdraw U.S. ground forces from Korea.

My comments had been printed, and I was later told the president had already decided in favor of the withdrawal.

On that Saturday afternoon in the Oval Office, I apologized to the president for having caused him some embarrassment. I said I was not trying to defy any civilian authority.

The president told me how he had run for office for over two years, and he had consulted with his military advisers, who had recommended that U.S. ground forces be withdrawn. That position, he said, had been agreed to by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and by the secretary of defense.

At that point I looked at Secretary Brown, because I knew that was just nonsense.

The Joint Chiefs had never been asked whether they thought it was a good idea to withdraw the ground troops. They had only been told to analyze three methods of withdrawing the troops: immediately, some now and some two years hence, or some in 1978 and all of them within five years. They said that the third was the best of three bad options.

In their analysis, the Joint Chiefs made a very strong statement that the withdrawal would involve some grave risks to our national security. The secretary of defense either deleted that phrase from the paper he gave to the president, or at least watered it down.

So when I looked at Secretary Brown, the president said, "I've considered their concerns, but I have had a vast experience in making decisions. You know I was in the Navy, and I had to make difficult decisions. And I was governor of the state of Georgia, and I had to make difficult decisions there.

"I consulted with your boss," the president told me. "Gen. Vessey (Gen. John Vessey, the U.N. commander in Korea) sat right where you're sitting now, Gen. Singlaub, and told me of his deep concerns about this. But I'm accustomed to making difficult decisions, and I've concluded that this is the best thing."

What the president didn't say was that he had told Gen. Vessey he would not make a decision on the withdrawal until he had consulted with Gen. Vessey again. Obviously, however, he had already made his decision.

The president said he had decided not to punish me and that he wasn't going to take any serious action that would jeopardize my career. But he felt that my usefulness in Korea had decreased significantly as a result of the Washington Post incident.

He had asked Secretary Brown to have the Army transfer me to another assignment.

I told the president I was very sorry that he had decided I could not return to Korea.

I felt I was fully capable of carrying out whatever decision he made, and I told the president I would like to stay in Korea.

He said, "No, I've decided that you shouldn't go back."

I was disappointed and shocked.

I had not thought anything I had said to John Saar during his interview could have caused such an uproar. In fact, when the midnight call had come through to my quarters in Seoul summoning me to Washington, I had honestly thought it was some sort of joke.

My talk with Saar had, in fact, been almost accidental. I had not, at first, been scheduled to meet him the day he flew into Seoul for a briefing on the Korean situation.

Saar was not based in Korea. He reported on Korea from Japan, and had a bad reputation for writing nonsense about what was going on in Korea.

Much of Saar's information apparently came from the communist-leaning Korean residents in Japan, most of whom have been dominated by an organization out of Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea.

So, Saar was always writing articles that told of the terrible violations of human rights within South Korea. He wrote such nonsense, in fact, that the U.S. ambassador wouldn't allow him to talk to people in the embassy in Tokyo.

At the suggestion of our public affairs officer, Saar was invited to Seoul for a briefing by Lt. Gen. John Burns, the deputy commanding general of the U.N. Command, and by Jim Hausman, who had been in Korea since 1946, when he was an adviser to then-President Sygman Rhee.

As a part of the backgrounder, Hausman gave Saar an idea of what the Koreans thought of any plans to withdraw U.S. troops from their country.

Part way through this discussion, Hausman called me and said Saar had been asking military questions about the 2nd Division, which is stationed in South Korea. Hausman said he didn't feel competent to answer the questions, and wanted to know if I could help.

I had 20 minutes until my next appointment, so Hausman sent Saar to my office. It was assumed by me and by Jim Hausman that this was a continuation of the off-the-record backgrounder.

During the course of my interview with Saar, I made the point that the Koreans felt very strongly that the withdrawal of U.S. ground forces would lead to war. I said that all indications were that the North Koreans were prepared to do this and that they appeared to have the capability.

I also said that the withdrawal of U.S. ground forces would not only remove a very important deterrent, but also the actual military capabilities that are important to the defense of South Korea, because the 2nd Division is much stronger than the Korean divisions.

I had said that the Koreans felt strongly about any withdrawal, and that I agreed with them.

And that was the key phrase that appeared in the Washington Post: Gen. Singlaub states that the withdrawal of U.S. ground forces on the current plan will lead to war.

After Saar left my office, my public affairs man asked if I had cautioned the reporter that my remarks were off the record. I had not.

Late that afternoon Saar called my office and said, "I want to confirm that our interview was on the record."

I said, "John, that's not the way I understand it. It's my clear understanding that it was part of the backgrounder that you were receiving from Jim Hausman."

Saar said, "You know what the rules are. If you don't tell me at the beginning, why, I have to consider that I'm authorized to print this."

So I said, "Yeah, I know what the rules are now, but I was not aware of that at the beginning of the day."

He said, "Unless you want to retract what you've said, or change what you've said, I am entitled to print it."

"I guess you've got me," I said, "because I'm not going to change it. I didn't say anything that I don't believe, and I just don't believe in changing what I believe to be the truth."

In the middle of the night, Gen. Vessey started getting calls from Gen. George Brown, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Gen. Vessey eventually called me and said that I was to report immediately, on the first available transportation, to Gen. Brown and he would arrange for me to see the president.

Gen. Brown, in talking to Gen. Vessey, was somewhat amused by all of this, and didn't think it was very serious at all. Gen. Brown himself had some problems with the press quoting him and causing some flak.

At first, I honestly thought it was a joke. I even called the public affairs office and asked them to send me a copy of the story. I told him to send it early the next morning, because I wanted to get some sleep.

Friday was a long day, as I flew to Washington by way of Tokyo and New York. I was ambushed by the press in each air terminal.

When I arrived in Washington on Friday night, the officers who met me said that on the following morning I would go to the protocol office in the Army section of the Pentagon and wait for Secretary Brown to arrange an escort to the White House.

I felt I should have a chance to tell my side of the story to the military chain of command first, and I said so.

The next morning, I did have a chance to talk with Gen. Bernard Rogers, Army chief of staff. He had apparently talked with Secretary Brown, and Brown had talked with the president, because it was all clear in their minds what was going to happen.

When I tried to ask Gen. Rogers what he thought the president would say and what my options were, he did not want to talk about it.

I then spent about an hour and a half with Secretary Brown and his special assistant, John G. Kester.

The president, they told me, considered that I had gone public and spoken in opposition to a decision that he had already made, the decision to withdraw U.S. ground forces from Korea.

As subsequent congressional investigation shows, the president did make his decision around May 5.

But those of us in Korea had not been told of that decision. In fact, we were told just the opposite.

All of us—on the embassy side as well as the military side—and the Koreans were informed that the decision on withdrawal would not be made until after there had been a consultation with the governments of South Korea and Japan.

Those consultations were to take place the week after my interview with John Saar.

I reminded Secretary Brown that there had been no decision, or at least we had been informed there was no decision.

Then Kester said, "Tell me, general, if you had been told that a decision was made, and that you were to tell the Koreans this anyway, would that have made any difference?"

I said, "I'm not sure I understand what you mean, John. Are you saying would I be willing to lie to the Koreans?"

Kester replied, "That's not exactly what I said."

"Well," I said, "I guess I just don't understand what you're asking me, then."

This concerned me since I was accused of violating the code which says that once the commander makes a decision, everybody supports that decision.

In fact, we had been specifically told that no decision had been made, and we felt obliged to continue to point out the disadvantages of what we thought was still just a proposal.

We had even received a message from the Joint Chiefs that no decision had been made and it would not be made until after the administration had consulted with the Koreans and the Japanese.

The U.S. did not have a good track record on consulting with the Korean government. In the case of the withdrawal of the 7th Division, the Koreans were simply informed it would take place.

We were told to make the point with the Koreans that this time there would be honest consultations.

I should have been forewarned, however. A month before the incident with Saar, I had lunch with Gen. Rogers in Seoul and asked him why there was talk of a withdrawal when it was obviously militarily and strategically unsound. It was even cheaper to maintain the 2nd Division in Korea than in the States.

"Well, Jack," he had said, "you just have to understand that the president has probaby made up his mind to do it."

In the same way, on the Saturday afternoon in May, the president had decided that my career in Korea was over.

Afterwards, Secretary Brown even tried to prevent me from returning to Seoul to pick up my wife and family. He just wanted the people out there to pack them up and send them to the States.

Gen. Vessey interceded by guaranteeing he could control my reception. Since the Koreans were delighted the subject of the withdrawal had come up, the White House was afraid there might be a great deal of hoopla on my return, adding fuel to a fire the president did not want.

Sitting across from him that day, I had considered retirement.

But I felt that retirement probably wouldn't serve any useful purpose at that time. I felt I could still make a contribution.

This is aways in a senior officer's mind. You have to weigh whether you can do more good in or out of the system.

I know there are many officers who have been so disgusted and so frustrated over some policy decisions that have been made based on inadequate information or on the wrong information, that they have to weigh whether they can do more by getting out and speaking out, or staying in and trying to influence the situation from within.●

THE RHODESIAN MORASS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, what is the object of our policy toward Rhodesia? I ponder the question. I examine it from every angle. And yet it escapes me. There must be some magnificent wisdom behind these great measures of state that I cannot fathom.

Let us consider the first principles of the question. Square one. I was under the impression that the administration was in favor of majority rule in Africa. Mr. Young and the President lecture us somberly on the virtues of the democratic process and the historical necessity of applying this rather delicate process of government to the African Continent. Now there are a fairly impressive crop of political scientists who would argue that the success of a democratic political order depends upon the presence of a number of other social and economic conditions. They would say that democratic success depends upon a long tradition of the right to dissent, an informed and literate population, a high degree of industrialization and communication. They would say that democracy is not easily transplanted. Most of the roots of the African political tradition are tribal, colonial, and authoritarian; that there is very little in the African experience that would lend optimism for the establishment of a viable democracy.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we would have to recognize that no matter how desirable a Democratic solution is to these far away political problems, we must take into account such complicated factors. I think we must heed the advice if those who argue that a state's political constitution must be in conformity with its social institutions. But, for the sake of argument, let us concede the President's wishes are noble, and that democracy is the best answer to Africa's political problems.

But then, we must ask a further question. Where is the absence of democracy most acute? Mozambique? Zanzibar? From the tone and the emphasis of the administration's pronouncements, one would think that the case for black majority rule is most important in those states where caucasians are in a minority: Rhodesia and South Africa. Black Africa is governed mostly by dictatorships, tribal oligarchies, and authoritarian single party regimes. These seem to get passing notice in the struggle for black majority rule.

Mr. Speaker, imagine a situation where the United States could effect a revolutionary transition to Democratic rule. Imagine, for a moment, that we had a racial minority, imbued with a sense of mission, which had ruled a racial majority from time immemorial. Imagine that this ruling racial minority, bowing to the winds of change, was willing to cede to the racial majority the right to rule the state: majority rule, and all that majority rule implied. Imagine further that the leaders of this racial majority were highly respected men of good will, tolerant men, political moderate with the best interest of their nation at heart. Imagine that these men were true patriots, full of broad and lofty sentiments, willing to forgive and forget the past.

Mr. Speaker, if such a condition were to come to fruition, it would be a reformer's dream. It would be the best of all possible political worlds. In your mind's eye you could not think of no better opportunity for constructive change, for a peaceful transition to majority rule. It would be foolish to forsake such an opportunity. There are some among us who might, of course. There are some so blinded by a twisted sense of racial guilt or possessed by a desire to punish that they would actually jeopardize the chances for a peaceful transition to majority rule. And indeed there are some who would willingly torpedo a peaceful reform, backed by an overwhelming, biracial majority of a nation, only to placate the representatives of a vicious, vengeful minority, whose minds and souls are poisoned by political and racial extremism.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, I do not pretend to understand the current Rhodesian policy. But I would ask the Members of the House to read the insightful editorial by William Randolph Hearst, Jr., published in the May 7, 1978, issue of the Hearst newspaper chain. I ask that it be inserted into the RECORD.

Editorial follows:

WHOSE SIDE ARE WE ON?

(By William Randolph Hearst, Jr.)

NEW YORK.—The true intent of the two black guerrilla leaders who, with the help of Russia, maintain tribal bands of marauders outside Rhodesia's borders—and have the gall to call themselves the Patriotic Front—was revealed to the world this past week. They want to take over Rhodesia and establish a Marxist dictatorship.

These two men, Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe, are so highly regarded by the Carter administration—the President, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young—that our government appears reluctant to accept or recognize the interim transitional government. Yet it is the declared purpose and plan of that interim government to conduct free and open elections and set up a black-led one-man-one-vote government, just exactly the form that Britain and the United States have demanded all along.

More than a decade ago, the political parties of both Nkomo and Mugabe were banned by the Rhodesian government, and both men fled across the borders where they proceeded to enlist dissident guerrillas from inside Rhodesia. They pledged to fight the all-white government until there could be a one-man-one-vote system. Their "war" began in 1972 with an attack on a white homestead and the murder of its occupants. Since then more than 9,000 lives have been lost.

Last week, Ian D. Smith, who will remain as prime minister until the elections are held, terminated the bans against the Nkomo and Mugabe political parties.

He invited the leaders and all of their followers to return to Rhodesia and take part in the elections. He promised total amnesty, with no reprisals, offered the government's services in helping reunite guerrillas with their families, and to release all political detainees within the country.

This offer was made in behalf of the entire Executive Council of the interim government, consisting of equal numbers of blacks and whites and including leaders of the three most powerful black political factions of parties in Rhodesia—Bishop Abel Muzorewa, Jeremiah Chirau and Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole. These three, together, control 85 percent of the black votes of the country.

Despite this offer of friendship—which can only be considered an indication of how thoroughly the interim government intends to bring about black rule in the country that had so recently had solely a white-run government—both Nkomo and Mugabe turned it down flat.

They prefer to stay where they are, Nkomo in Zambia where he heads a ZAPU terrorist faction, and Mugabe in Mozambique, where he heads a ZANU terrorist faction.

All the things they SAY they have wanted and have been fighting for, have come about, yet they want no part of it, even though they, personally, have been invited to participate in forming the new government.

One would think that now, with their goals in sight, the guerrillas would be happy to return from the bush and participate in bringing full democracy to Rhodesia, the major goal they said they were seeking. The schedule for it is open and forthright—free elections, with all parties participating, to be held as soon as possible. As soon as a black prime minister is elected, the economic sanctions imposed by most of the world will be lifted. Then, on Dec. 31, the new one-man-one-vote government will take over.

That Mugabe and Nkomo refuse to accept the peace offer reveals dramatically that a free democracy was not what they had in mind. What they want, obviously, is a Marxist dictatorship. Mugabe, an avowed Marxist (his and Nkomo's guerrillas are supplied by the Russians), has stated he does not believe in free multi-party elections. He wants only a one-party system—his. He and Nkomo together have a following of about 15 percent of the black population.

Nevertheless, under a policy presumably developed by our U.N. ambassador, Andrew Young, the Carter administration says it will not "accept" the interim government until it includes Mugabe and Nkomo. The interim government has agreed that whites will be in charge of defense and internal security. The Patriotic Front leaders want blacks in charge of everything. Thus, the United States is saying there will be no whites in charge of anything in Rhodesia, if it wants our backing and approval.

The entire transitional program with its racially balanced interim Executive Council, its early free elections, and its transfer to black leadership on Dec. 31 was exactly what was called for when Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and British Foreign Secretary Anthony Crosland first met with Ian Smith two years ago.

It is strange to find our own government now holding back on its approval for the sake of a couple of communist terrorists and guerrillas.

Mr. Kissinger told The Hearst Newspapers just this past week that the United States became involved because of two basic reasons:

(1) With the collapse of the Portguguese Empire, the entire strategic situation in southern Africa changed. Rhodesia was vulnerable, and a guerrilla war had already started on its borders, fueled by guerrillas in neighboring Mozambique, formerly a Portuguese colony.

(2) U.S. impotence in Angola had been demonstrated by refusal of Congress to provide arms to the pro-Western, pro-democratic faction. This opened the field to the Soviets, who brought in the Cuban battalions that finally took over Angola, the Portuguese "star" in Africa.

That is when the U.S. entered the picture in Rhodesia. We could not lose all of southern Africa to the Soviets. Kissinger, in a speech in Zambia, following British initiative, pledged that Rhodesia would have full U.S. support if Ian Smith would form a government of majority rule within two years.

Mr. Kissinger's speech was given in April, 1976. Ian Smith did just what Henry Kissinger requested. All within the allotted two years.

But the government of the United States has changed hands. Now, suddenly, with Andrew Young calling the signals, we are insisting that two communist terrorist leaders, who have been offered the chance to run for election, be included in the INTERIM government—or else the U.S. won't accept the transitional program. How come?

We entered the Rhodesian affair to arrest the spreading communist influence in southern Africa. Now we are thwarting the creation of a moderate all-black government until and unless it brings in a couple of communist ragtags representing a tiny proportion of the black voters.

We made a commitment to keep the Russians out of southern Africa and decided that among other things we must help Rhodesia set up a representative government.

So let's get on with it. Let's keep our promise.

President Carter should accept the moderate interim government, as established, and approve the plans for a free election and the formal transfer of power on Dec. 31 from all white to mostly black.

While he's at it, Jimmy Carter might reappraise his friend Andy Young's talents. In my opinion he might serve his country better in some other ambassadorial post, in South Africa preferably.●

CONFUSION OVER INVESTMENT INCENTIVE ACT

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, May 31, I introduced H.R. 12907, the Investment Incentive Act. Much to my chagrin, there was some confusion over which Congressman EVANS was a cosponsor. I meant to include TOM EVANS of Delaware, but DAVID EVANS of Indiana appeared on the bill instead. I apologize to both Members for the inconvenience. Mr. EVANS of Delaware will be on the bill when it is resubmitted.●

REPRESENTATIVE DRINAN INTRODUCES A BILL TO SECURE AND PROTECT THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

HON. ROBERT F. DRINAN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, this past Wednesday, the Supreme Court decided a case which has enormous importance for the freedom of the press and for our Republic. In a case involving the student newspaper at Stanford University, the Court held that law enforcement authorities may enter and search the premises of a newspaper armed only with a warrant issued upon probable cause that the newspaper may have in its possession evidence of a crime.

For the police to obtain such a warrant, it is not necessary that they show any involvement by officers or employees of the newspaper in the alleged unlawful activity. It is also unnecessary for the police to give notice to the newspaper that such a warrant will be sought or that a warrant has been issued to search the premises. Furthermore since most newspapers keep their front doors open to the public, the police need not knock before entering the premises and may proceed to conduct their search without further ado.

It should be noted also that some States allow search warrants to be executed against nonresidential premises at all hours of the day and night. Thus it is possible that such searches could take place at a time when the newspaper offices are empty, thus allowing the police to conceal entirely their visit to the place and their seizure of papers, documents, and other material which is the lifeblood of the news gathering and publishing process. It is little wonder that the Boston Globe, in its June 1, 1978, editorial characterized the Supreme Court decision as "a first step toward a police state."

To insure that the dire assessment by the Globe does not become a reality, I am today introducing a bill which will, if enacted, secure and protect the freedom of the press from unwarranted intrusions by law enforcement authorities. This bill would prevent any person, acting under color of law, from conducting any search or seizure of the premises of persons engaged in news gathering or dissemination without an adversary court proceeding. Such a proceeding would give the news operation the opportunity to contest the search and possible seizure of its documents, files, and other materials.

The only exception to the requirement of an adversary court proceeding prior to the search would be if the police could demonstrate to the court that there is probable cause to believe that an officer or employee of the news media has committed or is committing a criminal offense. In such instances, the police would have to meet the strict standards of the fourth amendment which require that the warrant application describe with particularity "the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." Only in these special circumstances could the police obtain an ex parte warrant authorizing them to search limited and restricted areas of the premises of a news media operation and to seize only those items particularly identified.

Furthermore, my bill would prohibit the sweeping searches authorized by the Court whether engaged in by Federal, State, or local officials. It would apply to any person acting under color of law, thus covering any person cloaked with the mantle of authority whether or not such person is a police officer. Investigators, prosecutors, mayors, or any other person acting in an official capacity would be reached by the prohibitions contained in the bill.

Under section 5 of the 14th amendment, the Congress has ample constitutional authority to reach the activities of State and local officials, as well as Federal officers. Indeed the Court, in this week's decision, noted:

> Of course, the Fourth Amendment does not prevent or advise against legislative or executive efforts to establish nonconstitutional protections against possible abuses of the search warrant procedure. . . .

This bill accepts the Court's invitation to provide precisely the kind of legislative protection which the press now desperately needs to continue its vital role in our constitutional scheme.

I should note also that several years ago the Court, in Katzenbach against Morgan, interpreted section 5 to give Congress broad legislative powers to protect the rights secured by the 14th amendment. In that decision the Court made a critical distinction between the power of Congress to contract, on the one hand, the guarantees of the bill of rights and the 14th amendment, and to expand, on the other, those same rights. It is clear that Congress may expand the rights protected by the 14th amendment, but it cannot contract those rights. The bill I am introducing today would adhere strictly to that constitutional requirement.

The exercise of congressional authority under the 14th amendment to protect fourth amendment rights is not unprecedented. In 1968 Congress enacted title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act. That title placed limits on the authority of State and local officials (as well as on Federal officials) to engage in electronic surveillance, an activity, like search and seziures, which is covered by the fourth amendment. I am one who believes that the 1968 act did not fully protect the rights guaranteed by the fourth amendment. But title III nonetheless did seek to define the parameters of police powers to conduct electronic surveillance. And those limitations were made applicable equally to State and Federal authorities alike.

The bill also provides civil and criminal remedies for violating its proscriptions. Any person aggrieved by any search or seizure which offends the prohibitions of the act could sue in State or Federal court to obtain damages or injunctive relief. The phrase "person aggrieved" is intended to give very broad standing to persons who have been affected by an unlawful search or seizure. Indeed if this bill, or a similar measure were to become law, I would expect the courts to interpret this language to provide standing to injured persons which would be as broad as article III of the Constitution allows. See Trafficante v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205 (1973). If the police were to violate this act, I would envision a wide range of persons being aggrieved by such unlawful conduct, such as reporters, news editors, publishers, confidential sources, and others who may be affected by an illegal search of the premises of a news gathering organization or reporter.

The remedial provisions in the bill would also authorize the courts to award appropriate relief. General damages would be allowed as it might be difficult for the aggrieved person to establish actual damages. In the area of constitutional torts, a broad damage remedy is particularly efficacious since the injury inflicted is not amenable to easy calculation in dollar and cents terms. The bill also allows punitive damages up to $10,000 for each violation upon a showing that the illegality was willful.

Finally the bill permits the court to award reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party other than the United States. This provision is modeled on similar provisions in titles II and VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act of 1976. Under these statutes, the prevailing plaintiff ordinarily would recover its attorney fees unless special circumstances rendered the award unjust. See Newman v. Piggie Park Enterprises, Inc., 390 U.S. 400 (1968). In contrast a prevailing defendant would only recover its counsel fees if it could establish that the plaintiff brought the suit in bad faith, vexatiously, without foundation, or for harassment purposes. This is the standard recently announced by the Supreme Court in Christiansburg Garment Co. against EEOC. Of course, the United States would be liable for fees if it or one of its agencies, officers, or employees engaged in unlawful conduct prohibited by the bill. Furthermore, since a newspaper, for example, might well have to seek preliminary relief to prevent a violation of the act, attorney fees would be available at such interim stages of the litigation when substantial rights of the parties are determined.

It is to be noted that, in addition to civil remedies, the bill also provides a criminal sanction. Any person acting under color of law who engages in an illegal search or seizure could be prosecuted and fined up to $10,000. No jail sentence is provided.

In concluding, let me reemphasize the importance of enacting legislation to protect the gathering and dissemination of the news. Throughout our history, the press has played a vital role in maintaining the integrity of our democratic institutions. During those times of its greatest worth, the press has exposed corruption, disclosed improprieties by high ranking officials, and revealed the undue influence of special interests on the processes of government. In pursuing this noble role, the press needs a great deal of breathing space to investigate and ferret out unlawful or improper conduct.

The Supreme Court decision may very well jeopardize the precarious position of the press in achieving those ends. The sweep of the Court's opinion would allow the police to search the premises of a newspaper and seize whatever documents they thought within the scope of the warrant. In such cases, the warrant would provide little protection against such intrusions and seizures even though the newspaper could ultimately force the return of unlawfully seized materials. Because confidential sources and deadlines play such a critical role in a news operation, the seizure by the police of such documents could strike a fatal blow to the reporting and disclosure of a particularly devastating story.

The Court disregarded the practical differences between the use of a warrant and the use of other legal process after an adversary hearing to obtain privately held documents, papers, and other materials in the possession of news people. This bill recognizes those critical distinctions and seeks to enact them into law. I ask my colleagues to join with me in supporting this measure. A copy of the bill is inserted in the RECORD at this point:

A bill to secure and protect the freedom of the press from unwarranted intrusions by persons acting under color of law

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The Press Protection Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person acting under color of law, without prior adversary court proceeding, to search any place or seize any things in the possession, custody, or control of any person engaged in the gathering or dissemination of news for the print or broadcast media unless such search or seizure is conducted pursuant to a warrant issued by a court upon probable cause that such person has committed or is committing a criminal offense.

SEC. 3. (a) Any person aggrieved by a violation of this Act may commence a civil action in an appropriate United States district court or State court at any time not later than three years afer the alleged violation occurred or terminated, or one year after the discovery of such alleged violation, whichever is later.

(b) In any civil action under this section, the court, if it finds a violation of this Act, shall award such relief as may be appropriate, including general damages, equitable or declaratory relief, and punitive damages not to exceed $10,000 for each willful violation.

(c) In any civil action under this section, the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party (other than the United States, or an agency, officer, or employee thereof) reasonable attorney fees as part of the costs, and the United States (and any agency, officer, or employee thereof) shall be liable for such costs.

SEC. 4. Any person acting under color of law who willfully violates this Act shall be fined not more than $10,000.●

ENERGY POTENTIAL

HON. BOB GAMMAGE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. GAMMAGE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention an editorial recently published in the highly acclaimed magazine, Texas Monthly. While I do not entirely agree with some of the author's perceptions regarding this Nation's energy potential, particularly with regard to our nuclear resources, I do think my colleagues would benefit from reading this article, especially in light of the lengthy debate on the energy bill.

[From the Texas Monthly, June 1978]

BEHIND THE LINES

(By William Broyles)

(Practical men, who believe themselves to be quite exempt from any intellectual influence, are usually the slaves of some defunct economist.)

John Maynard Keynes

Keynes was a great economist who believed that ideas were powerful, and that none was more powerful than an idea whose time had passed. The energy program that Congress may yet approve in our lifetimes has its good points, but it is also a confused muddle of ideas whose times have passed. The program assumes that the interests of producers and consumers are fundamentally opposed, that coal and nuclear power can replace oil and gas, and that there is no more oil and gas, so a higher price won't increase their supply. All those assumptions are wrong.

The battle between producers and consumers is a phony issue. The dispute in Congress between so-called champions of producers and consumers of energy is like two ants fighting over a crumb of bread and ignoring the elephant's foot about to crush them both. Even taking an ambitious conversation effort into account, the national energy plan calls for massive increases in production by 1985: coal, up 84 per cent; nuclear power, quadrupled; oil and gas, new discoveries 60 per cent greater than recent rates. Simply to hold our import levels constant we will have to increase energy production in the next nine years more than in any other nine-year period in our history. The General Accounting Office, the Congressional Research Service, the Office of Technology Assessment, and the Congressional Budget Office all agree that given the provisions of the proposed energy plan we will in fact have to double our imports of foreign oil by 1985, when Arab oil production is expected to decline. "We've been telling everyone the result will be a global depression," said one economist, "but no one seems to listen." They don't listen because they are obsessed with energy producers "ripping off," in President Carter's words, the American people. But you don't sacrifice the fundamental need all Americans have for sufficient energy to discourage a few producers who might rip off consumers. An excess profits tax on energy revenues not plowed back into more production, combined with a fuel stamp program to help the poor meet rising energy costs, would be much more sensible than burning down the barn to kill a few rats.

Coal is the only immediate answer. No matter how quickly public happenings like Sun Day spur our technology to solve the hard problems of solar power and other energy alternatives, between now and 1985 only coal can close our energy gap, a fact that should hearten no one. Coal, our most abundant fossil fuel, cannot be produced without great danger to miners in deep mines or to the environment in strip mines; it cannot be transported without massive diversion of resources; and it cannot be burned without major health and environmental hazards. It is also beset by Stone Age operators and a belligerent work force, as the recent coal strike so abundantly proved. Until our technology allows us economically to convert coal into cleaner, transportable, efficient fuels like gas and gasoline (as the Germans did—at great cost—in World War II), coal will be at best an unpleasant necessity, its production constantly limited by its bulk and its manifest dangers to the environment.

Nuclear power is not the answer. On the other hand, the proposal that we quadruple our output of nuclear power by 1985 is not only wildly unrealistic, it is profoundly irresponsible. In the last 24 months, only one new nuclear plant was licensed and put into operation; thirteen were canceled; almost fifty were deferred, perhaps indefinitely. No matter how serious the energy crisis, this turn away from nuclear power could only be good news. After twenty years we have yet to come up with a way to dispose of the wastes from nuclear plants, wastes that remain dangerous to human life for 250,000 years. I doubt that any of the Texas cities now participating in nuclear power plants would continue if they were made responsible for disposing of the radioactive wastes. Today Texas is being considered as a dumping ground for hundreds of tons of such wastes. No new nuclear power plants should be built until we devise a satisfactory way to isolate and manage our current legacy of nuclear wastes.

We have plenty of energy resources. All energy experts agree that our oil and gas resources are plentiful; combined with coal and lignite, they provide enough fossil fuels to last a thousand years. The problem is not how much we have, but how long it takes to recover and how much it costs. In Texas, the easy oil and gas production discoveries were made before 1950. Since 1950 we have drilled two and a half times as many wells and found only a fourth as much oil. The oil and gas that we must produce between now and 1985, when alternative sources like coal gasification, methane, and solar can come into play, will come from deeper wells, from offshore, and from harder-to-find fields. So far the Carter Administration seems determined not to encourage the capital investment needed for this exploration. First the Administration dragged out the argument that a backlog in drilling rigs meant that higher prices wouldn't encourage production (although three hundred new drilling rigs were being produced every year); then they reprogrammed their computers (as the Governor's Energy Advisory Council discovered through the Freedom of Information Act) to distort the standard data that had originally shown more investment would be needed to find additional natural gas; then they fired the head of the respected U.S. Geological Survey, who was continuing to crank out reports showing that huge resources of gas and oil were still to be found. Since new fields take three to seven years to begin producing, this continued discouragement of new exploration could be disastrous.

The current energy "crisis" doesn't have to be a crisis. If we can rise above the petty politics of region versus region and producer versus consumer, then we can see the energy crisis for what it could be—a tremendous national opportunity, an economic frontier like the opening of the West and the building of the railroads. The $700 billion investment the University of Texas Council on Energy Resources calculates will be needed by 1985 to meet our goals of production, conservation, and environmental protection could soak up the persistent unemployment of the past five years, end regional stagnation, strengthen the dollar, and put our whole economy on a new and fundamentally sound footing. Outside of Washington, public officials are grasping the implications of this challenge. The Northeast governors, once implacable energy foes, are now pushing for the creation of the Energy Corporation of the Northeast, a public corporation funded to invest in energy projects. The Midwest governors are following suit. We need the same sort of leadership here, since it seems clear that Washington will not be providing it.

Texas is at the crossroads. For the immediate future our new energy base must be coal. Two years ago the Texas Railroad Commission ordered utilities and large industrial users to begin switching to coal. This switch has been accelerated by our high free market prices for natural gas, an incentive other states who get our gas at a cheaper, regulated price, unfortunately for the country, have not shared. This short-term regional inequity helped give Texas the jump on conversion to coal. The long-run contracts for the forty million tons of coal we will be importing by 1985 have been signed and the generating plants are coming on line. But already we are getting a taste of what it is like to be an energy importer. Montana has announced a 30 percent severance tax on its coal, and the Burlington & Northern Railroad is on the verge of doubling its transportation rates to San Antonio. The combined result will cost Texas consumers hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

This imported coal must be a short-run solution, particularly if the national plan allows cities like Los Angeles to use the natural gas we save. If we think Houston has air pollution now, just wait until all its industries are burning coal instead of natural gas. All the specters of coal use, from acid rain to radioactive discharge to sludge disposal, will soon be our lot. Our only recourse is to push hard for new sources. This month a test well in Brazoria County is scheduled to begin drilling into the massive deposits of methane gas trapped in geopressured reservoirs like so many bubbles in champagne. Tests are underway to convert Texas' huge lignite fields into gas. If methane wells and lignite gasification become practical, then Texas will have a whole new base of clean and plentiful fossil fuel resources. We need to pursue solar alternatives as well, particularly the so-called "soft" approches that provide home heating and cooling.

But Texas isn't alone at the cross-roads. Energy is a fundamental world issue, and the world is looking to the United States for leadership. We still have a chance to set aside regional rivalries and political infighting so that we can face the challenges of conversion and production. We won't have that chance much longer.●

TAX CREDITS ARE NO SOLUTION TO TAX DISCONTENT

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House approved tuition tax credits for parents of students attending private elementary and secondary schools as well as public and private institutions of higher learning. These new credits, which it is estimated will amount to nearly $2 billion annually, will be added to the already swollen ranks of other credits, subsidies, and exemptions that comprise the nearly $140 billion in tax expenditures this year. Tax expenditures are the exceptions or reductions in the normal tax rate that are offered to individuals and corporations to promote a particular type of economic activity or else to lighten the tax liability of groups experiencing adverse circumstances. In the popular mind, with considerable justification, they are known as the loopholes, shelters, and privileges accorded upper-income individuals and powerful organizations.

The tuition tax credit was a rather hastily contrived response to the burgeoning tax revolt sentiment that appears to be seizing the country. It has been defended on the grounds that moderate and middle-income taxpayers urgently need relief. Yet 50 to 60 percent of the benefits will go to families earning more than $20,000 a year, while as much as 30 percent will go to households with incomes of more than $30,000 annually, groups that are hardly to be characterized as moderate-income. In fact, the students and their families who truly need financial assistance are the least likely to benefit from the tuition tax credit.

Furthermore, these tax credits constitute very poor public policy toward education. They will further weaken the system of public education in this country that is already in critical condition. In some regions they will reward private schools that were originally established for one simple reason, to foil court-order school desegregation. There are very serious constitutional issues that have been studiously avoided.

The tax revolt sentiment will not easily go away and certainly is not seriously confronted by this tuition credit measure. That sentiment has as much to do with the inequities of tax policy and the failure of public policy as it does with the high cost of Government. As a matter of fact, it can reasonably be argued that these tuition tax credits will only deepen the public antagonism to Government because they represent greater inequitableness as well as ill-conceived and inconsistent public policy.

The larger question that the tuition tax credit raises is: Will the Federal budget become an instrument for setting priorities and establishing sound, consistent, effective, and equitable public policy, or remain a device for parceling out favors and privileges, regardless of substantive merit and long-term fiscal consequence? I think the public is being deceived in believing that it will obtain relief through measures such as the tuition tax credit. Over the long run, there really is no gain for middle-America in obtaining a piece of the privileged tax pie, however small, that other groups have enjoyed for so many years. They can be assured that the tax credits and exemptions they receive will always be miniscule compared to those the really privileged groups obtain. Tax justice and sound tax policy, in the long run, can only come through basic tax reform and effective Government programs. ●

LOUISVILLE CELEBRATES ITS BICENTENNIAL

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, on May 27, 1978, Louisville, Ky.—the city of my birth and the city I am honored to represent in the House of Representatives—celebrated its 200th birthday.

On May 27, 1778, George Rogers Clark landed his party of militia and settlers on Corn Island in the Ohio River. The island is gone now, but the adventurous spirit of Clark and his cohorts has endured over the years and is exhibited today by the good people of Louisville.

Louisville's birthday party included music, exhibits, dances, and fireworks. No doubt the most colorful of the celebrations was a reenactment of Clark's landing on Corn Island by a group of modern-day Louisvillians suited up in Revolutionary garb.

My hometown, like our Nation, has come a long way over the last two centuries. I am pleased to report, Mr. Speaker, that Louisville continues to display the vitality, enthusiasm, optimism, and resourcefulness possessed by George Rogers Clark and his stalwart, intrepid band over 200 years ago.

I would like to share with everyone the following newspaper accounts of the bicentennial celebrations which appeared in the Louisville Courier Journal.

[From the Louisville Courier Journal]

WHY CELEBRATE? BECAUSE THE TOWN SURVIVED, AND IT HAS ITS VIRTUES

Given enough time, every community has an opportunity to celebrate a bicentennial. Louisville's chance comes tomorrow.

May 27, 1778, of course, was the day that Colonel (later General) George Rogers Clark and a band of militia and pioneer families established the first permanent settlement in this area. That date has as good a claim as any to be Louisville's birthday, though the tiny frontier community didn't officially receive the name Louisville until two years later.

These settlers and their descendants fared better than the legendary tribe of "white Indians" that preceded them at the Falls of the Ohio. The tribe, according to several accounts (including one related to Colonel Clark himself by an Indian chief named Tobacco), once inhabited much of Kentucky. But its population was depleted in wars with other Indian tribes, and the last of the mysterious race were wiped out in a great battle near what is now Clarksville, Indiana.

The same disaster easily could have befallen the handful of settlers who came to Corn Island 200 years ago, especially after Colonel Clark and most of his soldiers left to bedevil the British who occupied Kaskaskia and Vincennes. There was a revolution on, and Clark's job was to help it succeed, not to found a city that one day would become a cultural melting pot with a Belvedere upon which various ethnic groups could once a year unmelt.

But revolution or no, the settlers had found an ideal spot ("a very Eden," said one), and they set about making it their own. The exceptionally severe winter of 1779–80 tested their endurance and courage but didn't slow their progress. The following spring, dozens of new families came down the river, and the frontier settlement, now moved to the mainland from Corn Island, began turning into a town.

It's tempting, in 1978, to say that these hardy pioneers succeeded too well. Louisville, with its large parks and tree-lined parkways, is a city of considerable natural beauty. But a wilderness Eden it is not.

We breathe polluted air, drive congested roads and worry whether our drinking water is full of subtle poisons. We have become, in short, a fairly typical large American city.

Does that merit a celebration? The answer is a qualified "yes." The folk who arrived here two centuries ago might not approve entirely of what Louisville has become. (They'd surely be shocked, for instance, to discover that Corn Island has disappeared under the dammed waters of the mighty Ohio.) But the blessings enjoyed by most inhabitants of the city today are many—and are all too easily ignored.

We may not be healthier than our forefathers, but we are at least likely to live longer. We have public schools that, for all their faults, offer almost everyone an opportunity to become literate. We have libraries and theaters and, thanks to a symphony orchestra and ubiquitous portable radios, music for every taste. Unlike the citizens of some metropolises, we have quick access to a countryside filled with forests and lakes.

Perhaps we cannot help envying the hard, simple, adventurous life of those first settlers. But how many of us, given the chance, would trade places if the decision were irrevocable?

EUREKA! LOUISVILLE IS FOUND AGAIN

(By Jay Lawrence)

Led by a reincarnated Col. George Rogers Clark, a wise-cracking, irreverent band of early Americans landed in flatboats at the riverfront in Louisville yesterday, bent on founding a town but finding one that had been established exactly 200 years earlier.

As one of the buckskin-garbed, would-be settlers put it, "We observed that, with all these roads and buildings here, it would be a nice place to put a town."

It was the commemoration of Clark's landing on Corn Island in the Ohio on May 27, 1778. And in the eyes of some who attended the 1978 landing, it was a good thing Clark had been in charge of the founding rather than the Heritage Corporation, which was in charge of its re-enactment.

"It was quite a fiasco," said a primitively attired Bill Berkman, chairman of the re-enactment committee, after the schedule of events had to be changed in midstream. His "mountain men" were melting in their buckskins in the hot sun as they stood around on the Third Street Wharf while waiting for a party of dignitaries on the Belle of Louisville.

The buckskinners never did parade downtown, as planned, and they never met up with the group of politicians, Heritage Corporation officials and the actual settlers' descendants who were on the Belle.

The 90 or so pioneers, representing the roughly 200 who accompanied Clark, boarded the four wooden flatboats about 3:30 p.m. About 4:30, they floated past the riverfront to where Corn Island used to be before it was covered beneath the Ohio.

Then they were towed upstream to the Third Street Wharf by powerboats.

When George Rogers Clark (actually WAVE radio personality Claude Wayne) stepped ashore to delayed yet strong applause from several hundred onlookers, the Belle was nowhere to be seen.

It was somewhere out in the river, and its dignitaries would not come ashore for another hour.

In their part of the ceremony, Mayor William Stansbury and John Blalock, board chairman of the Heritage Corporation, dropped two armloads of flowers into the waters of the Ohio where Corn Island once was.

The flowers were carnations—gold and blue for Louisville's official colors.

The sweaty-faced pioneers waited ashore awhile before moving to the Belvedere for an awards presentation.

Before they left the riverfront, however, Clark made the most of it in a greeting interview with Robin Logsdon, master of ceremonies.

Speaking in a staged pioneer twang, Col. Clark several times worked the adjectives "quite amazing" and "magnificent" into descriptions of what his successor had wrought.

'I had no idea when I landed the first time that it would wind up like this," he told Logsdon and the crowd, gazing in mock awe at downtown Louisville. "I'm quite amazed; I'm quite pleased. I'm glad to see people took up where we left off and built such a magnificent city."

It was hardly a solemn occasion. The crowd loved it.

"Somebody over there wanted to know if they named a candy bar after me," the colonel continued. "It's true; they did. The Clark bar. I sure thought that was sweet of them."

Wayne was one of the few participants in the landing who was not authentically attired. His suede cloth buckskins were made for the occasion by a local costume company and rented to the Heritage Corporation.

Most of the people who landed from the flatboats were members of various pioneer clubs whose members often make their own buckskin clothing and their own flintlock rifles.

They came from as far away as Tennessee and Illinois to participate, and some were left standing on the dock when a fifth flatboat lined up for the occasion did not make it.

After the landing, the crowd gawked at the pioneers, many of them with long, outlandish beards, who strutted about and seemed pleased to be the center of attention.

The men wore broad-brimmed or coonskin hats, and almost all carried a flintlock rifle, flintlock pistol, powder horn, sheath knife and ammunition bag.

The women wore long cotton dresses, patterned or solid-colored, and bonnets.

The strangely clothed people, dwarfed by the downtown buildings and looking out of place on the concrete, stood out as much as a group of astronauts would have in the Louisville of 200 years ago. But it was their day.

"Are you Daniel Boone?" a youngster asked Jim Morse of Anderson, Ind. Morse said his flintlock was made about the turn of the century, but he made his foxskin cap himself.

One Louisville resident said he makes his living as a truck driver but actually lives to be a primitivist.

"You want my real name or the name most people know me by?" he asked a reporter. He was told that "Hawkeye Hagan" would suffice to identify him.

Hawkeye, who said he is 40, was wearing an open-throated white muslin "settlers' shirt," buckskin pants and a broad-brimmed black hat.

His wife Joann had on a brown cotton dress, muslin apron and shawl, and a dust-bonnet. Pioneer women wore the hats even to bed, she said, "because they washed their hair only about every 30 days."

The Hagans insisted that their costumes, every bit of which were homemade, were of the type that would have been worn by Clark's party.

Others, such as 16-year-old Andrew Clark, acknowledged that their clothing was somewhat more modern. Andrew said his calico shirt dated his outfit about 1840.

Andrew said he was descended from Col. Clark's brother, William, and he thanked Logsdon when the master of ceremonies announced his relationship to the colonel to the public.

Hawkeye professed to know a good deal about the original expedition and practices in 1778. For example, he said Col. Clark's expedition "traded its way out of trouble" two or three times by offering hostile Indians such goods as blankets.

He said the pioneers actually would have shed their buckskins and worn next to nothing during the river voyage on a hot day like yesterday.

And did Hawkeye, by participating yesterday, get a better feel for the Clark party's experience?

Well, no.

"I think we've gotten more of a feel of what it was like other times," he said.

FIFTY YEARS OF SERVICE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the RECORD a statement regarding two fine, outstanding men who have contributed much time and effort to their community of National Park, N.J.

Mr. Louis E. Berryman, 510 Asbury Avenue and Mr. Ellwood J. Bentz, 105 North 5th Street, both of National Park, are celebrating their 50th anniversary as members of the National Park Fire Department. Both Mr. Berryman and Mr. Bentz have been active participants of this organization working strictly on a volunteer basis. Certainly, their unselfish devotion in service to their town is deserved of the highest of commendations. May they continue to serve National Park for many more happy and healthy years.●

DONALD M. SOMERS

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker: My good friend, Congressman PETE MCCLOSKEY from California's 12th Congressional District, and I would like to bring to the attention of our colleagues in the House of Representatives some of the accomplishments of Mr. Donald M. Somers, director of public works for the city of Sunnyvale, Calif., who was honored last week as one of the Top Ten Public Works Men of the Year.

The selection of Mr. Somers for this honor was a part of the celebration of National Public Works Week, May 21–27, an annual observance spotlighting the work done by public works agencies throughout the United States and Canada. The event is sponsored by the American Public Works Association in cooperation with the American Society of Civil Engineers, American Water Works Association, Council of State Governments, Institute of Traffic Engineers, National Association of Counties, National League of Cities and the Water Pollution Control Federation. Donald Somers was selected as a representative of the finest in public works from scores of nominees by a distinguished panel of judges. In their opinion and in the opinion of Mr. MCCLOSKEY and myself, Mr. Somers' work reflects the highest standards of professional conduct and the wise use of manpower and public funds.

Somers is a graduate of Polytechnic Institute of Troy, N.Y., and has been with the city of Sunnyvale for 22 years. When he joined the city in 1955 as assistant city engineer, its population was 24,000. It has since grown to about 107,000. The community has experienced rapid industrial growth and today an estimated 80,000 people are employed within the city limits. Somers has kept pace with this expansion by planning and directing the design and construction of traffic, waste water, and water supply systems, as well as recreational facilities and public buildings. Furthermore, he supervised the preparation of farsighted master development plans and created an efficient operating and maintenance organization.

Somers has attracted and held dedicated and experienced personnel willing to pursue new ideas and concepts. The department has also adopted progressive management techniques.

The challenge of heavy automobile traffic has been met by widening and extending major thoroughfares as well as providing new streets. During Somers term, over 146 miles of streets have been added and 82 traffic signals installed. Recently, funding was approved for converting 7,500 street lights to sodium vapor, resulting in an estimated 40-percent energy savings.

Under Somers' leadership, the city's water systems were consolidated by 9 miles of transmission lines and 156 miles of distribution pipes. Storage tanks and booster stations were added and Sunnyvale is now served by two outside water supplies and nine municipal wells. Other notable programs completed during his career include a city hall and council chambers, eight parks, eight parking lots, a community center, 238 miles of sidewalks, 106 miles of storm drains and a 100-year storm retention basin.

Somers' dedicated approach to improving the quality of life for Sunnyvale citizens through topnotch public works programs meets the profession's highest standards.

On June 1, 1978, Mr. Somers will be honored locally at a dinner in his honor sponsored by the South Bay chapter of the American Public Works Association.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, Mr. MCCLOSKEY and I would like to ask our colleagues to join us in saying congratulations, Don, and best wishes for future successes.●

GOVERNMENT COSTS QUESTIONED

HON. DEL CLAWSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a spirit abroad in our land with prospects for sweeping improvement or added malaise, according to how it is channeled. The popular revolt against taxes and the intrusions of Government, the dawning realization that take-home pay may be a poor measure of prosperity, can force realistic appraisal of Government costs and services. If so, we may see reduction in the Government spending at all levels which raises taxes and fuels inflation, destroying the purchasing power of our money. The column by Bill Gold which appeared in the May 30 issue of the Washington Post combines telling logic with personal insight into the problems faced by most Americans which have set the stage for the present rebellion. Under leave to extend my remarks the column follows at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Washington Post, Tues., May 30, 1978]

THE DISTRICT LINE—THE PAY RATE WAS SIX BITS HIGHER THEN

(By Bill Gold)

A few days ago, the last paragraph of the District Line quoted Bob Orben as saying, "Going ahead with the neutron bomb would be sheer waste. We already have something that destroys people and leaves the buildings intact. It's called a 9¾ percent mortgage."

Gaetano Gentile responded: "I fail to understand why he is so appalled by the 9¾ percent mortgage rate.

"In 1926, I bought a home. The interest rate on my mortgage was 6 percent. Today's 9¾ percent interest rate is therefore about 50 percent over the 1926 rate.

"The enclosed picture, which appeared in your Business and Finance section recently, shows the George Hyman Construction Co. sign on a building site, and under it is the legend, 'Bricklayers Wanted, $13.25 an hour.' In 1926 bricklayers were getting $2.50 to $3 an hour.

"So lenders are not the only guys in black hats."

You'll get no argument from me on that proposition. I think borrowers, lenders and all the rest of us have gone off our fiscal rockers.

While you're marveling at a $13.25 rate for bricklayers, let me tell you about a word carpenter named Gold whose pay rate used to be $14.

The town was Springfield, Ohio.

The year was 1934. And the $14 was for a 6-day week, not for each hour.

At 5:45 each morning, I began editing sports copy and writing headlines. At 9, I went to the composing room to supervise the makeup of the sports pages. Later I made my rounds looking for news: hunting and fishing handouts, public and private recreation centers, high school and university athletic departments. There were also amateur and professional games to cover. And boxing and racing. And a column to write for the next day.

On Saturdays, I had to work an extra shift. At 4 p.m.—quitting time on normal days—I was farmed out to the city editor and worked for him until the big Sunday paper was rolling. I got off at 2 a.m. Sunday. Then at 5:45 Monday morning the cycle began anew.

After I had worked my way up to $18 a week, I told the managing editor that the next raise would have to be to $25 because I was getting married. He threw his head back and laughed heartily. He was still laughing when I left his office. I left because I had the distinct feeling that when he stopped laughing he wasn't going to say "yes." For all I know, he's still sitting there laughing. I haven't been back.

But I have done a lot of wondering about us poor slobs who broke our backs to earn that kind of money and saved a little of it for our old age. What we saved has been debased and devalued with every subsequent increase in wages and prices.

I have seen inflation steal the savings of several generations, and today I am watching a new generation of workers being robbed by accelerating inflation. Husbands and wives both work and save their money because some day they want to be able to afford a home of their own, an education for their children and a nest egg that will make their futures more secure.

What they'll discover is that prices will always stay a little bit ahead of wages. Whatever you want, it costs a little more than you can really afford. So you wait for wages to catch up—but by the time wages rise, the price of what you want has also gone up. You can't win.

Yes, $13.25 an hour for bricklayers seems a mite high to a fellow who used to earn $14 for a 6-day week. But it doesn't seem at all high to a fellow who is trying to provide for a family at today's prices.

Those who lend money, whether for mortgages or any other purpose, are also caught in inflation's trap. Picture yourself as the owner of a house that cost you $18,000 but will bring an inflated $60,000 on today's market. You sell your home for $10,000 down and $50,000 to be paid to you over a period of 25 years with 9¾ percent interest. That sounds like a smart move on your part, doesn't it? For once in your life, you're going to be a lender, not a borrower.

However, if inflation steals 8 or 9 percent of your money each year, what is your true rate of return at 9¾ percent? And what will your children do with your "vast wealth" if they inherit $50,000 from you? One thing they will not be able to do is buy back the house you sold. By that time, your $18,000 house will be selling for $180,000.

Meantime, if you sell your house at an inflated price you will have several choices, all bad. You can buy another house at an even higher price. You can pay an outrageous rent for an apartment. Or you can live in a tree.●

U.S. AIR FORCE DEMONSTRATION

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, each year, McGuire Air Force Base in New Jersey sponsors an open house to demonstrate to New Jersey and the Nation the latest developments in military and civilian aviation, along with displays from various industries and military organizations. In addition, the U.S. Air Force aerial demonstration team—known worldwide as the Thunderbirds—and the U.S. Army parachute team, the Golden Knights, perform amazing feats of aerial courage.

This show is a convincing demonstration of the excellent training, recruiting, and operational skills of the U.S. Air Force and the U.S. Army Paratroop Training School.

I had the pleasure of attending the most recent Memorial Day exercise at McGuire Air Force Base. It attracted one of the largest crowds of any event in New Jersey . . . about 325,000 spectators.

Let me quote from an excerpt of a report written by Charles O. Finley of the Newark Star Ledger:

The hundreds of thousands of enthusiastic spectators stretched along the edge of the main highway for more than a mile. The highlight of the air show was a precision flying demonstration by the Thunderbirds—the official demonstration flyers for the U.S. Air Force.

Spectators were awed as the sleek aircraft streaked low over their heads in complicated maneuvers.

Mr. Speaker, the Air Force not only gives the public a tremendous demonstration of advanced aerospace technology, but this show is without doubt one of the most effective methods of recruiting young men and women into the U.S. Air Force.

I was not only impressed by the skills of the pilots and ground crews, but I was moved by the patriotism and commitment of the pilots and Air Force personnel and officers to the security of our Nation. We have some of the finest, most talented men and women in America serving in our Air Force, as proven on my visit to McGuire Air Force Base.

I wish to extend my thanks to all those who participated in this event, and I would like to commend Maj. Gen. Thomas M. Sadler, Commander of the 21st Air Force; Brig. Gen. Erskine Wigley, Vice Commander; Col. Dwayne H. Erickson, Wing Commander of the 438th Military Airlift Wing; and Base Commander, Col. Kenneth S. Landon, for the courtesy shown to my party and all the other thousands of visitors to McGuire Air Force Base.●

A TRIBUTE TO SAMUEL H. BEER

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, each of us has studied under teachers who have made particularly strong impact on his or her life, and one of the finest teachers I have ever known is Samuel H. Beer, Eaton Professor of the Science of Government at Harvard University.

A man of enthusiasm and wit and considerable practical experience in politics, Sam Beer insisted on the highest intellectual standards in his teaching and scholarship.

Several weeks ago, Sam Beer delivered his final lecture.

Professor Beer expects to retire in July after four decades of teaching.

I take this time to pay my own tribute to him and to insert at this point in the RECORD an article from the May 1978, Harvard Gazette, entitled "Sam Beer and Soc. Sci. 2: A Legend Comes to a Close."

[From the Harvard Gazette May 19, 1978]

SAM BEER AND SOC. SCI. 2: A LEGEND COMES TO A CLOSE

Samuel H. Beer, Eaton Professor of the Science of Government, gave his final lecture May 4 before a packed house in Room 18 at 2 Divinity Avenue. His students, colleagues, some of whom were section men 25 years ago, and his wife, Roberta, gathered to pay tribute to him. Mr. Beer will retire in July after 40 years of teaching.

He explained to his class, "I really have changed my lectures over the years. I've even changed the jokes. But this lecture I haven't changed. There's such an air of finality about it."

Western Thought and Institutions or Soc. Sci. 2 started as a 1946 General Education "experiment" but when it ended, it was a Harvard institution, said former students.

"Although Soc. Sci. 2 gained its reputation as an excellent undergraduate course, it's also been a central part of graduate education for section leaders," says Professor Michael Walzer (Government). Notable section leaders have included Mr. Walzer, Professor Stephan Thernstrom (History), Former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, and Secretary of Energy James R. Schlesinger.

Each week Mr. Beer held a two-hour meeting with his section men to discuss not only the daily problems of the course, but the central intellectual issues it raised.

Section men who gathered at a luncheon in Mr. Beer's honor following the lecture said they could not duplicate his teaching style but would continue to emulate it. "It's an ideal we model our teaching after," says Mr. Thernstrom.

"Sam Beer understands that the function of lecturing isn't most importantly to convey information but rather to stimulate interest," says Mr. Walzer. His extraordinary success in getting students to wrestle with the fundamental moral and intellectual issues was crucial to Soc. Sci. 2's success, adds Mr. Walzer.

The course was structured around six stages in Europe's political development including the Puritan, French, and Nazi revolutions. Students read major works of social or political theory including Locke, Rousseau, Marx, and Weber.

"I used the course for a springboard for my research," says Mr. Beer who continually reworked the lectures. "I changed the emphasis during the years depending on what work I was doing." Most recently that emphasis was on the modern state (in England) and nationalism.

He told his last class about the interviews he conducted the summer of 1945 in Germany. The histories, ripe with human details, "gets close to the reality of life," says Mr. Beer.

He will continue to teach two courses, American Federalism and Modern British Politics and Policy next fall.

Mr. Beer will also continue his research and, time permitting, his backpacking. An avid parachutist for some time, he gave that up several years ago.

An expert on the theory of federalism, he has written widely, including the book The Modernization of American Federalism.

Before coming to Harvard he served as a speech writer for President Franklin D. Roosevelt, a New York Post reporter, and a staff member of Fortune. He also served on the Federal Resettlement Administration and the Democratic National Committee in 1935. Mr. Beer is past president of the American Political Science Association.

A graduate of the University of Michigan (1932), he was a Rhodes Scholar and also received a bachelor's degree from Oxford University, Engand. A recipient of Fulbrights and Guggenheim Fellowships, he earned the doctorate in political science at Harvard (1943).

Mr. Beer looks back on Soc. Sci. 2's demise with no regrets. "It was time to stop the course; I am greatly relieved. It's a blow from which both Harvard and I will survive."

THE TELEVISION IMPORTS CASE

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, the importance of the television imports case currently before the Supreme Court can hardly be underestimated. This case will undoubtedly affect much of our international trade policy in the years to come.

I would like to call attention to an article written by our colleague, MORGAN F. MURPHY, which appeared in the May 30, 1978, issue of the Chicago Sun Times. I encourage all Members to read MORGAN's account for it illustrates that unfair trade practices threaten not only American jobs but the viability of continued world trade:

[From the Chicago Sun Times, May 30, 1978]

JAPAN'S COLOR-TV REBATES BREAK U.S. TRADE LAW

(By Morgan F. Murphy)

Some time in June the U.S. Supreme Court will decide whether the federal government is giving Japanese TV makers an unfair advantage over their U.S. rivals by failing to enforce a U.S. trade law. The decision is being closely watched for its possible impact on world trade.

The issue is whether Japan is breaking an American trade law by illegally subsidizing its color TV industry. Zenith Radio Corp., which brought the suit, argues that under the Tariff Act of 1897, Japan's refunding of a value-added tax on color TV exports is an unlawful "bounty or grant" requiring the United States to impose offsetting duties. Congress has re-enacted the offsetting-duty law five times, most recently in 1974.

Many foreign countries generate revenue through a value-added tax, which is applied to a commodity or product at every stage of production—unlike a sales tax, which is applied only to the final price. Rebating the value-added tax permits these countries to sell abroad more cheaply than at home.

Zenith charges that the tax rebate has made it possible for Japanese TV makers to undersell their U.S. rivals by 15 to 20 per cent. As a result, the company maintains, Japan has been able to increase its share of the U.S. color TV market from 11 per cent in 1968 to 38 per cent in 1976. Zenith contends that this growth in Japanese imports has contributed to the loss of 60,000 jobs in the American TV industy.

The Treasury Department, on the other hand, argues that Japan's 15-per cent tax refund is not a direct subsidy. It fears that offsetting duties imposed on color TVs made in Japan would set a precedent for heavy duties on foreign-made steel, clothes, autos and most other imports. This would raise prices for consumers. Treasury officials warn, and might provoke Europe and Japan to retaliate with higher tariffs on U.S. goods.

The Zenith case has far-reaching importance because nearly all countries rebate value-added taxes on products they sell to the United States. This practice is permitted under international trade rules, but the United States has never accepted the clause authorizing the rebates.

America is one of the few nations that does not impose some kind of value-added tax. Instead, it collects most of its revenue from income and corporate taxes, while the states usually levy modest sales taxes. These sales taxes are refunded to U.S. companies that sell overseas, but they are substantially lower than the value-added tax, which often amount to 15 per cent or more of an Item's wholesale price. In the case of European steel, the value-added tax is as high as 30 per cent. By rebating such steep taxes, Europe and Japan enable their manufacturers to sell in the U.S. market at low prices.

In my view, the Supreme Court should rule in Zenith's favor. Zenith's contention that Japan's rebate is a bounty or grant is solidly supported by a Supreme Court ruling in 1903. In that case, a Baltimore importer challenged the government's imposition of an offsetting, or "countervailing," duty on sugar shipped from Russia. The duty was levied because the Czarist government, which imposed an excise tax on sugar sold in Russia, lifted the tax when the product was sold abroad. The court ruled in favor of the sugar duty, saying: "When a tax is imposed upon all sugar produced but is remitted upon all sugar exported, then, by whatever process or in whatever manner or under whatever name it is disguised, it is a bounty upon exportation."

Treasury officials argue that the 1903 countervailing duty was imposed only on the amount of the tax refund considered "excessive." But what is the meaning of "excessive," if not a resulting 15-to-20-per cent price advantage that has helped cause 60,000 American TV workers to lose their jobs?

Would a decision in Zenith's favor destroy free trade? The answer is no. What it would do is prod Europe and Japan to face squarely the long-simmering issues of rebates and subsidies at the international trade talks being held in Geneva, Switzerland. Despite the best efforts of our trade negotiators at these talks, no country is likely to make significant concessions on these points unless Zenith wins its case.

Free trade is not endangered by Zenith, but by unfair and illegal trade practices that destroy U.S. jobs. The way to preserve free trade is to ensure that it is also fair trade.●

OPENING OF THE EAST BUILDING OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday President Carter officially opened the new East Building of the National Gallery of Art.

Mr. Speaker, the dedication of this building marks a significant day in the cultural life of our country and I take this opportunity to commend some of the many individuals who have given our Nation its newest architectural and artistic treasure.

First, the building itself, designed by one of America's foremost architects, I. M. Pei, is already being widely acclaimed as an architectural masterpiece.

Washington Post art critic Jo Ann Lewis has called Mr. Pei's latest work a "Cathedral of Art," and New York Times architectural writer Paul Goldberger has praised the building "as the very best of the current generation of museum structures." He writes that it is "surely the finest piece of contemporary architecture in official Washington."

Second, the Nation is once again indebted to the Mellon family for its contributions to a wider public appreciation of art. The entire cost of the new East Building, $94.4 million, was borne by Paul Mellon and his family.

Indeed, as with the National Gallery of Art, which was built in 1941 through the financial assistance of Andrew Mellon, the new gallery contains priceless paintings on loan from the Mellon family. I refer particularly to the Ailsa Mellon Bruce collection of 60 French impressionistic and postimpressionistic works.

Here, Mr. Speaker, let me recall that the National Gallery of Art opened with only 125 paintings. Yesterday the new East Building was opened with a showing of over 1,200 paintings, tapestries, and pieces of sculpture many of which were commissioned solely for this event. I refer here to the works of Alexander Calder, Robert Motherwell, Joan Miro, Henry Moore, David Smith, James Rosatis, and others which will certainly contribute to making the new gallery one of the Nation's foremost centers for the exhibition of art of the 20th century.

Third, Mr. Speaker, I want warmly to congratulate the outstanding Director of the National Gallery, J. Carter Brown, and its other officers and advisers for their effors in commissioning these works of art and their excellent preparations in successfully inaugurating the new gallery

Fourth, the new gallery opens with one of the largest collections of art from another nation ever to be displayed in this country. We must be particularly grateful to the people of the German Democratic Republic for their loan of five centuries of extraordinary works of art as well as to the International Business Machines Corp. for contributing some $750,000 to bring "the splendor of Dresden" collection to our country.

Mr. Speaker, that the new gallery has had such an auspicious beginning and that its home is itself such a splendid work of art, demonstrate the great interest of the people of the United States in art of excellence.

Over the last decade public attendance at museums and galleries has increased dramatically, and I think there can be little doubt that the new East Building of the National Gallery of Art will soon become one of the more popular sites for Americans visiting their Capital City and for visitors from other nations to the United States.●

CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD APPLICATIONS

HON. JOHN E. MOSS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, by notice of proposed rulemaking dated April 28, 1978, the Civil Aeronautics Board has proposed to establish expedited "hearing" procedures for processing applications for new or modified air route authority and the establishment of Board-made rates. Historically, the Board has interpreted existing law as requiring full evidentiary hearing in all route cases.

"Basically, the new procedures would require the submission of all evidence in written form and would dispense with an oral hearing and an initial or recommended decision by an administrative law judge." Instead, the Board would in most cases subject to this procedure, receive and review all the evidence itself and issue an agency decision.

In support of this rulemaking the Board states that its conventional procedures are both expensive and time consuming; that its increasing workload makes it imperative that the Board now explore new methods for processing cases; and that it is unable to entertain this increasing number of applications and other requests because it simply lacks the staff to process all these applications and requests in a timely fashion under conventional procedures.

Insofar as the proposed rule provides for the use of expedited procedures where there are no material facts at issue, it tracks procedures at other agencies which have been approved by the courts in a long line of cases. On the other hand, the CAB acknowledges that the proposed rule would go beyond existing agency practice by expanding the nonoral hearing procedure to embrace cases where material facts are at issue. The legality and advisability of this proposal has been the subject of extensive debate within the agency. In this regard, the public is indebted to member Richard J. O'Melia for attaching to his separate statement several memorandum prepared by various bureaus of the CAB dealing with the preceived legal risks associated with the proposed rule. These memorandums and the proposed rule are set forth in the Federal Register of May 5, 1978, at pages 19403–19417.

I

Mr. Speaker, I fully endorse the objectives of the proposed rule for reducing delay, costs, and administrative burdens upon the public and the Board. But I am concerned that the Board in articulating its rationale for this procedure initiative has not focused on the standards contained in the Administrative Procedure Act.

The issue is reasonably straightforward. The Board proposes to dispense with oral hearings and associated cross-examination principally for initial licenses and modifications of license to the extent that this is "fair to applicants and opponents;" Federal Register, page 19410. The Administrative Procedure Act provides for a similar dispensation with respect to this class of matters to the extent a party will not be "prejudiced;" 5 U.S.C. 556(d).

I rise therefore to bring to the attention of Members the history of this standard in the hope that it will prove useful in sharpening the focus of the debate on this important initiative. The elimination of oral hearings in certain initial license cases is not a new proposal. It was first advanced 38 years ago in the final report of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure, chaired by Dean Acheson:

5. UNNECESSARY RESTRICTION UPON USE OF INFORMAL METHODS

In most cases in which a person applies for some official permission, the agency, if satisfied that the permission is proper, grants it without any formal proceedings. Sometimes the public interest in a full record of the grounds of decision is thought so important by Congress that formal proceedings and a formal record are required by law. For example, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Communications Commission must hold public hearings before either may approve consolidations of the companies which it regulates.

But there are other cases where formal proceedings are required either by the terms of the statute or by administrative interpretations in which, in the Committee's opinion, something less would fully protect the public interest and make for more expeditious dispatch of business. For instance . . . the Civil Aeronautics Board is required to hold hearings before granting a certificate of convenience and necessity for a new air route. In these and other similar cases, it should be enough for the statute to require the agency to give public notice of the application, but to dispense with a formal hearing if no protest or request to be heard is received and if its own investigation establishes the propriety of granting of the application. (Chapter III, "Informal Methods of Adjudication;" 1941) pages 40–41.

With respect to the CAB in particular, the committee further stated:

In general, the Committee's recommendation . . . in chapter III relating to informal methods of adjudication . . . are applicable to the Civil Aeronautics Board. In respect to the Board's procedures, particular attention is called . . . (2) to the recommendation in section 5 of chapter III that the statutory requirement of hearings prior to the issuance of certificates of public convenience and necessity and foreign air carrier permits be amended so as to make it possible to dispense with hearings where the Board finds the application satisfactory and no protest is heard: pp. 172–173.

Congress was favorably disposed to the recommendations made by the Attorney General's Committee, the CAB, and other Federal agencies, and therefore carefully re-drafted the bill proposed by the Committee:

(A) to specifically include "licensing" in addition to rulemaking and adjudication;

(B) to distinguish initial licenses from renewal and other licensing procedures; and

(C) to provide that all applications for initial licenses should:

(1) be determined promptly; Sec. 558(b),

(2) using non-oral, expedited hearings, Sec. 554(d), 556(d), and 557(a),

(3) without an initial or recommended decision by the hearing officer; Sec. 557(b),

(4) when the agency issues either:

(1) a tentative decision, or

(2) a report prepared by the staff normally engaged in that portion of the agency's operation to which the proceeding related; Sec. 557(b)(1), or

(3 in lieu of any sort of preliminary report, a final order granting or denying an initial license in emergency instances, Sec. 557(b)(2), except where a party will be prejudiced thereby, Sec. 556(d) or cross-examination is necessary to bring out the truth, Sec. 556(d), 557(c).

Congress freed initial licenses from the requirements of sections 554, 556, and 557 for "such matters as the granting of certificates of convenience and necessity which are of indefinite duration, upon the theory that in most licensing cases the original application may be much like rulemaking."

Mr. Speaker, because the CAB's proposed procedural rule evidences some ignorance as to the intent of Congress in incorporating the "initial license exception" in the Administrative Procedure Act, I believe it is necessary to review the legislative history of the act. I do so because Senate and House reports of the act are no longer widely available; because other regulatory agencies may be similarly uninformed; and because of its impact upon our own consideration of various regulatory reform initiatives.

By way of introduction, the page numbers I shall cite are those from Senate Document 248, 79th Congress, 2d session, entitled "Administrative Procedure Act, Legislative History, 1944–46." This document contains the Senate and House committee reports of 1945 and 1946, the May 1946 proceedings of the House and Senate as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and several statements by the Attorney General regarding the bill.

II

The basic scheme underlying the act is to classify all administrative proceedings into two categories, "rulemaking" and "adjudication." Since licensing is neither, Congress found it necessary to specifically include licensing in the act under the definition of "Order," section 551(6). The Senate's analysis of the provision stated:

The term "order" is defined to exclude rules. "Licensing" is specifically included to remove any possible question at the outset. Licenses involve a pronouncement of present rights of named parties although they may also prescribe terms and conditions for future observance. It should be noted, however, that licensing is exempted from some of the provisions of sections 5, 7, and 8 relating to hearings and decisions; page 197.

I should note that sections 5, 7, and 8 of the bill refer to sections 554, 556, and 557 of the act. Similarly, section 9 is section 558 in the act. The House report contained similar language:

The term "order" is essentially and necessarily defined to exclude rules. "Licensing" is specifically incuded to remove any question, since licenses involve a pronouncement of present rights of named parties although they may also prescribe terms and conditions for future observance. Licensing as such is later exempted from some of the provisions of sections 5, 7, and 8 relating to hearings and decisions; page 254.

Congress next defined a "License" and "Licensing" in sections 551(8) and (9). In its analyses of these two terms the Senate discussed for the first time the difference between initial licenses and other types of licenses:

This definition supplements subsection (d). Later provisions of the bill distinguish between initial licenses and renewals or other licensing proceedings. A further distinction might have been drawn between licenses for a term, such as radio licenses, and those of indefinite duration, such as a certificates of convenience and necessity; page 197.

The House committee emphasized the importance of these differences:

The definition of licensing supplements section 2(d). It is included because licenses take many forms and the term is important in some of the remaining sections. Later provisions of the bill distinguish between initial licensing and renewal or other licensing proceedings.

Having classified licensing as an adjudication, Congress turned to the task of exempting initial licenses from the burdens of the adjudicatory process, except in certain defined situations. I should probably note for the record that the original application of adjudication procedures to licensing is the result of an historic accident, especially since the court held in 1930 that licensing was nonjudicial for purposes of review. In 1920, Congress granted the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to issue certificates of convenience and necessity. Unfortunately, Congress did not specify what would constitute a licensing hearing, but instead left that to the Commission. As a result, because the Commission developed as an adjudicatory tribunal, it simply applied adjudicatory procedures to its new task, and hence the trial-type hearing came into use for transportation licensing. One of the purpose of the initial license exemption was to correct this mistake.

III

The initial license exemption is first stated in section 554(d)(A). In support of this exemption, the Senate report states:

The exemption of applications for initial licenses frees from the requirements of the subsection such matters as the granting of certificates of convenience and necessity which are of indefinite duration, upon the theory that in most licensing cases the original application may be much like rule making. The latter, of course, is not subject to any provision of section 5. The exemption of cases involving "the past reasonableness of rates" (if triable de novo on judicial review they would be exempted in any event) is made for the same reason. There are, however, some instances of either kind of case which tend to be accusatory in form and involve sharply controverted factual issues. Agencies should not apply the exceptions to such cases, because they are not to be interpreted as precluding fair procedure where it is required; pages 203–204.

The House report language at page 262 is virtually identical. Congressman Walters, however, did provide a little more insight as to the intent of the exception with respect to receipt and review of evidence in expedited proceedings during the debate on the bill on May 24, 1946:

However, the subsection does not apply in determining applications for initial licenses, because it is felt that the determination of such matters is much like rule-making and hence the parties will be better served if the proposed decision—later required by section 8—reflects the views of the responsible officers in the agency whether or not they have actually taken the evidence; page 361.

By way of further clarification, Congressman Hobbs inserted into the RECORD on the following day a letter from Attorney General Tom Clark, which stated:

Sec. 5. . . . The section does apply, however, to licensing with the exception that section 5(c), relating to the separation of functions, does not apply in determining applications for initial licenses, i.e., original licenses as contradistinguished from renewals or amendments of existing licenses.

Section 5(c). . . . As explained in the comments with respect to section 5 generally, this subsection does not apply either in proceedings to determine applications for initial licenses or in those to determine the reasonableness of rates in the past; pages 409–410.

IV

A principal effect of the exemption is the dispensation of cross-examination in Section 556(d). However, the House committee's analysis of the provision sets forth two caveats to the exception:

The provision on its face does not confer a right of so-called "unlimited" cross-examination. Presiding officers will have to make the necessary initial determination whether the cross-examination is pressed to unreasonable lengths by a party or whether it is required for the "full and true disclosure of the facts" stated in the provision. Nor is it the intention to eliminate the authority or agencies to confer sound discretion upon presiding officers in the matter of its extent. The test is—as the section states—whether it is required "for a full and true disclosure of the facts." In many rule-making proceedings where the subject matter and evidence are broadly economic or statistical in character and the parties or witnesses numerous, the direct or rebuttal evidence may be of such a nature that cross-examination adds nothing substantial to the record and unnecessarily prolongs the hearing. The right of cross-examination extends, in a proper case, to written evidence submitted pursuant to the last sentence of the section as well as to cases in which oral or documentary evidence is received in open hearings. Even in the latter case, subject to the appropriate safeguards, technical data may as a matter of convenience be reduced to writing and introduced as in courts. Among these are technical statements, reports of surveys, analyses, and summaries. The written evidence provision of the last sentence of the section is designed to cover situations in which, as a matter of general rule or practice, the submission of the whole or substantial portions of the evidence in a case is done in written form. In those situations, however, the provision limits the practice to specified classes of cases and, even then, only where and to the extent that "the interest of any party will not be prejudiced thereby." To the extent that cross-examination is necessary to bring out the truth, the party must have it. An adequate opportunity must also be provided for a party to prepare and submit appropriate rebuttal evidence; page 271.

The Senate committee's analysis of the provision at pages 208–209, while not as detailed, is similar. The Attorney General's statement on the provision, entered into the record by Congressman Hobbs, adds one additional detail which may be of interest to the members of the bar:

It may be noted that agencies are empowered, in this subsection, to dispense with oral evidence only in the types of proceedings enumerated; that is, in instances in which it is not necessary to see and hear the witnesses in order properly to appraise the evidence. While there may be types of proceedings other than those enumerated in which the oral testimony of the witnesses is not essential, in such instances the parties generally consent to submission of the evidence in written form so that the inability of the agency to compel submission of written evidence would not be burdensome: pages 411–412.

Given the foregoing explanation of the section, it is clear that Congress has authorized the agencies to only waive cross-examination where it is not necessary for "a full and true disclosure of the facts" and "the interest of any party will not be prejudiced thereby." It is difficult to conceive of a fairer test.

Another effect of the initial license exemption is contained in section 557. This section allows an agency to dispense with an initial or recommended decision by the hearing officer and instead to issue either a tentative agency decision or a report recommending a decision by one of its responsible employees, other than the hearing officer, who is normally engaged in the particular portion of the operation to which the proceeding is related. In addition, agencies are authorized to issue final orders granting or denying an initial license in emergency situations without such a preliminary report.

Once again, however, the two committee analyses of the provision clearly state the exemption should not be used in those situations where the case cannot pass two tests set forth in Section 556(d). The language in the House report at page 273 is substantially similar to that provided by the Senate committee:

The alternative intermediate procedure which an agency may adopt in rule making or determining applications for initial licenses lies in the discretion of the agency. In order to simplify the bill, the exception which confers this discretion is broadly drawn. However, it may be noted that even in those cases, if issues of fact are sharply controverted or the case or class of cases tend to become accusatory in nature, sound practice would require the agency to adopt the intermediate recommended decision procedure; page 210.

The Attorney General's statement, introduced by Congressman Hobbs, is particularly enlightening with respect to recommendations made by the staff:

The second exception permits, in proceedings to make rules and to determine applications for initial licenses, the continuation of the widespread agency practice of serving upon the parties, as a substitute for either an examiner's report or a tentative agency report, a report prepared by the staff of specialists and technicians normally engaged in that portion of the agency's operations to which the proceeding in question relates. The third exception permits, in lieu of any sort of preliminary report, the agency to issue forthwith its final rule or its order granting or denying an initial license in the emergent instances indicated. The subsection, however, requires that an examiner issue either an initial or recommended decision, as the case may be, in all cases subject to section 7 except rule making and determining applications for initial licenses. The act permits no deviation from this requirement, unless, of course, the parties waive such procedure; pages 412-413.

Thus with respect to initial licenses there are three ways to render an expedited agency decision. This exemption predates the CAB's Show Cause procedure—the use of which the agency has been reluctant to expand—by more than three decades.

The two congressional committees provided further guidance as to the processing of applications for initial license in their analyses of section 557(c):

"Supporting reasons" means that briefs on the law and fact must be received and fully considered by every recommending, deciding, or reviewing officer. They must also hear such oral argument as may be required by law, and the bill does not diminish rights to oral argument. Where the issues are serious or the case becomes one adversary in character, the agency should provide for argument before all recommending, deciding, or reviwing officers; pages 210 (Senate) and 273 (House).

VI

Having established expedited procedures for determining initial licenses. Congress enacted Section 558(b) which "requires agencies to determine promptly all applications for licenses" page 368. As the House report stated:

This section operates in all cases whether or not hearing is required, but it does not provide for a hearing where other statutes do not do so. Nor does it diminish statutory rights to a hearing. It does not confer licensing powers. The requirement of dispatch means that agencies must proceed as rapidly as is feasible and practicable, rather than at their own convenience. Undue delays are subject to correction by mandatory injunction pursuant to section 10; page 275, see also page 212 (Senate).

The section 10 referred to in the report has now been renumbered as 5 U.S.C. 706. The two committees state in their reports that this section "expressely recognizes the right of property interested parties to compel agencies to act where they improvidently refuse to act;" pages 214 (Senate) and 278 (House).

Congressman Walters explained the reason for incorporating the requirements of sections 558(b) and 706(1) for expeditious action during the debate of May 24, 1946, as follows:

These special provisions are necessary because of the very severe consequences of the conferring of licensing authority upon administrative agencies. The burden is upon private parties to apply for licenses or renewals. If agencies are dilatory in either kind of application, parties are subjected to irreparable injuries unless safeguards are provided. The purpose of this section is to remove the threat of disastrous, arbitrary, and irremediable administrative action; page 368.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Congressman Walters' statement 32 years ago today, together with all the exemptions outlined above, clearly indicate the intent of Congress, to wit; all applications for initial licenses should be determined by expedited, non-oral procedures as quickly as possible, except where cross-examination is necessary for a "full and true disclosure of the facts," or the interest of any party will be prejudiced by a lack of cross-examination.

With respect to initial applications for certificates of convenience and necessity and other licenses, expedited proceedings should be the rule, not the exception. To the extent that the proposed rule requires the applicant to request an expedited proceeding, the proposed rule is inconsistent with this policy.

VII

While the emphasis of the CAB's proposed rule is directed primarily toward the licensing of air routes, it also incorporates ratemaking. Under the Administrative Procedure Act the three exemptions, which I have just discussed, also apply to ratemaking where the agency is authorized to initiate the rates. In this regard, it should be observed that the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 provide two separate and distinct procedures for establishing rates.

Section 406(a) of the act of 1958, which deals with the carriage of mail, directs the CAB to fix and determine the rates of compensation to the carriers effective from such date as it shall determine to be proper—past, present, or future. Since these rates are always agency-made rates, the exceptions to sections 544, 566, and 557 of the Administrative Procedure Act apply. As a consequence, expedited hearing procedures may be utilized in mail rate proceedings, subject of course to the caveats set forth in the House and Senate committee reports.

Passenger and property rates present a different situation. The CAB is not authorized to establish these rates initially, sections 404(a) and 1002(g), and it may only change an existing or carrier-proposed rate if, after notice and hearing, it finds the rate to be unlawful; section 1002(d). Since these proceedings tend to be accusatory in form, written evidence procedures are not appropriate.

VIII

Mr. Speaker, as I stated at the beginning, I fully endorse the objectives of the proposed rule. But the current proposal does not take full advantage of the expedited procedures already provided by the law. That can be corrected. The important thing is that after almost a third of a century the CAB, under the direction of Chairman Kahn, is exploring expedited procedures for the processing of important elements of that agency's workload.

It is my hope that the information which I have placed in the RECORD today will encourage the Board in this endeavor and spur other agencies to follow suit. Finally, I hope that my colleagues in this and the other body will find the information as useful as I have in considering the various regulatory reform initiative currently pending before the Congress.●

CONGRESSMAN WYDLER'S 1978 QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. JOHN W. WYDLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to share with the Congress today a letter from home. The residents of our fabulous Fifth Congressional District have again enthusiastically responded to my annual questionnaire. Their responses, in number and in quality, indicate to me the deep feelings so many Americans have that to their elected public officials the individual citizen's opinion matters.

They are right, Mr. Speaker. More than ever before, as our lives and times grow more complex, we must look to the source of democracy's power—the people—and pay heed to their commonsense views on the news as we formulate legislation.

This annual survey has been held yearly during my service in the House. For the Fifth District of Long Island, it has been my practice to develop straightforward questions about the major national and international issues having a direct impact on the lives of all Americans.

The questionnaire is then mailed to every household in the congressional district, giving residents an opportunity to answer in a multiple choice fashion. This year, for this first time, I asked my constituents to list the five most important issues we face in the coming year.

After all tabulations are completed the final results of the opinion survey are of extraordinary value to me, giving, as they do, a personal insight into the feelings of my Long Island neighbors on the key issues in Congress.

Results of the 14-question opinion survey are now being sent to Fifth Congressional District residents. Those constituents who appended personal messages have received replies from me.

There were some surprises and some very thought-provoking responses to the 1978 questionnaire. In the Fifth District, 73.39 percent of those responding believe the United States should place nuclear power production on a high priority, in order to make America more independent of foreign oil producers—a policy I would very much like to see the present White House administration adopt.

Asked about an across-the-board cut in Federal income taxes as the keystone in an economic incentive proposal, 66.02 percent were in favor of such a plan. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I am working for such a tax cut—of one-third of all rates charged on individual returns.

While President Carter has proposed a 5-year amnesty period for illegal aliens, 74.97 percent of those responding are against such a proposal, disagreeing with the White House plan to allow the illegal aliens to work here for 5 years and then making a decision on their status by congressional action—yet undefined by Mr. Carter.

In general, by large pluralities, the residents of the Fifth District who sent me their responses oppose more low income housing in the district (78.17 percent); favor offshore oil drilling 50 miles south of Long Island (70.45 percent); and favor allowing private industry to compete with the U.S. Postal Service in delivering mail (73.06 percent).

The complete results of the 1978 questionnaire also include a tabulation of what residents believe to be the five most important issues we face in the coming year. Not surprisingly, these issues are energy, taxes, inflation and the economy, crime, and employment.

The following is a complete tabulation of the 1978 fabulous Fifth Congressional District questionnaire:

RESULTS OF THE ANNUAL "FABULCUS FIFTH" QUESTIONNAIRE OF 5TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, NASSAU COUNTY, N.Y.

[In percent]

	Yes	No	No opinion
1. Should the Federal Government subsidize construction of more low income housing in our 5th Congressional District?	16.53	78.17	5.30
2. Would you favor legislation to allow private industry to compete with the U.S. Postal Service in delivering mail?	73.06	23.76	3.18
3. Would you favor creation of a "free trade zone" on Long Island a large area in which factories could manufacture goods for export without being charged U.S. Customs fees?	56.46	28.21	15.33
4. Should the so-called mandatory retirement age be increased from 65 to 68 yrs?	57.71	35.66	6.63
5. During the next year, do you think the economy will improve?	23.24	63.11	13.65
6. Should the United States place nuclear power production on a high priority in order to make America more independent of foreign oil producers?	73.39	21.39	5.22
7. Do you favor an across-the-board cut in Federal income taxes as the keystone in an economic incentive program?	66.02	27.18	6.80
8. Would you favor delay of environmental controls in order to ease the energy crisis?	56.59	37.16	6.25
9. Do you favor the Panama Canal treaties as proposed by President Carter—and now before the U.S. Senate—including Panamanian control of the Canal by the year 2000?	32.10	58.60	9.30
10. Do you think public utilities, such as Lilco, should be charged for use of military or other public facilities in times of energy crisis, such as the recent Long Island ice storms or the New York City blackout?	29.11	62.87	8.02
11. Do you favor offshore drilling of oil in the Atlantic in the waters 50 mi south of Long Island?	70.45	25.50	4.05
12. Would you favor a 5-yr "amnesty" period for illegal aliens who entered the United States between Jan. 1, 1970, and Jan. 1, 1977 (as proposed by President Carter), so that they may be allowed to work as resident aliens for 5 yr, and then, in 5 yr, making a further decision on their status through congressional legislation?	18.95	74.97	6.08
13. Do you believe the United States is actually undergoing an energy crisis?	62.25	31.20	6.55
14. Would you be willing to pay more at the gas pump and the electric meter to have all the energy you want to use?	20.25	73.20	6.55

Your thoughts on the 5 most important issues we face in the coming year would be of great importance to me: A. Energy B. Taxes C. Inflation and the economy D. Crime E. Employment.

ENERGY FACTS

HON. WILLIAM L. ARMSTRONG

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1978

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, over a year ago, President Carter proposed new legislation to cope with the Nation's worsening energy shortage. He recommended new and more complex price controls, tax incentives, rebates, regulations, exhortations, the creation of a new Department of Energy—to name just a few components of what Mr. Carter himself termed "one of the most complicated legislative packages—that a President has ever sent to Congress."

In the ensuing year, the President has seen a Department of Energy created by Congress, and little else besides a long and often bitter fight over his substantive proposals.

Now it looks like the Congress may act and, in fact, may create an energy bill even more complicated than the contraption fashioned by the administration. As an example, the "natural gas deregulation compromise" appears not to be a real deregulation of natural gas, at least not for 10 years, while extending immediate Federal price controls to all natural gas with 23 separate classes of prices.

Already over the past 5 years, Congress has created the Federal Energy Administration, which was incorporated into the new Department of Energy. The FEA became deeply involved in regulating oil producers and consumers, and in the process promulgated regulations which make a pile over three feet thick. More than 10,000 persons have been hired to interpret and enforce these regulations and, awful thought, to think up new regulations.

In addition, the Environmental Protection Agency has increased its restrictions on how, when, and where oil and gas wells may be drilled. For example, if an oil well may be located near a historical site, it cannot be started if any snow is present—the snow precludes an archeological clearance, and snow removal efforts could also damage any artifacts. So it becomes difficult to drill a winter well in the Northern Rockies.

The Security and Exchange Commission has attempted to restrict the use of limited investment partnership formerly used by many wildcatters to raise drilling capital.

The result of this type of frenzied Federal activity is as depressing as it is obvious: in 1977, domestic oil consumption reached an all-time high; but domestic oil production dropped to the lowest level since 1961; imported oil averaged 47 percent of U.S. consumption, and at some times during the year accounted for more than half of total U.S. oil consumption; since 1972 the dollar costs of imported oil have jumped from $4.3 to $41.5 billion in 1977; yet petroleum accounts for a greater percentage of U.S. energy use now than it did in 1970—up from 44 to 49 percent.

Under the circumstances, Congress would be foolish to agree to even more controls and restrictions—regardless of the rhetoric.

Over the past 5 years, I have submitted several proposals to alleviate the Nation's fuel problems. The centerpiece of my recommendations and, in my judgment, of any plausible energy policy, is decontrol of energy prices and elimination of at least the worst of the regulatory burdens.

These issues are sure to be debated as the House readies itself to consider the final version of the energy bill. Hopefully, the Members of this body will make their decisions not on political expediency, not on wishful thinking, but on the facts. As a prelude to this debate, however, I submit the following digest of energy facts and some observations:

B. THE CONVERSION LOSS PROBLEM

Depending on the fuel mix burned under the steam boiler, the conversion of fossil fuels to electrical energy results in a loss of 60–75% of the potential energy (or an efficiency of only 25–40%).

Older style nuclear plants have an efficiency of as low as 1%. With effective breeder reactors, however, the efficiency may approach 80% (20% energy waste) . . . even though the amount of heat loss is tremendous.

C. NUCLEAR POWER, OPERABLE PLANTS, AND CAPACITY

D. THE NUCLEAR FUTURE, A FEW OBSERVATIONS

1. On January 1, 1973, 131 nuclear power plants were under construction or had reactors on order.

2. By January 1, 1975, construction of 60 of those nuclear plants had been postponed 1–3 years . . . and 18 had been cancelled outright.

3. In some states, it now requires approval from 36 different local, state and federal agencies to site and build a nuclear power plant—stretching lead times to 10 years.

4. Two principal problems are still not solved to regulatory groups' complete satisfaction—the waste disposal problem and emergency reactor cooling systems.

5. Even so, electric utilities plan over 30% of the new power plants built in the next ten years as nuclear (comprising almost 50% of the generating capacity).

OIL—A GOVERNMENT CREATED SHORTAGE

The United States is using more and more petroleum each year. But we are producing less and importing an increasing proportion of our needs from overseas sources, primarily from the OPEC nations.

In the last 5 years, U.S. production has declined from a daily average of 9.5 million barrels to 8.4 million barrels in 1977. Consumption rose from about 15 million barrels daily in 1970 to 17.3 million barrels in 1973. The embargo reduced demand somewhat, but the daily average rose to a new high of 18.4 million barrels by the end of 1977.

As a consequence, we are now dependent on foreign sources for 47 percent of our day-to-day needs. The cost of this imported oil has skyrocketed from $2.1 billion in 1966 to $41.5 billion in 1977, an 1,875 percent increase. And, oil producing nations are now threatening another additional price increase.

Aside from the purely financial considerations and the drain on our balance of trade and balance of payments, our heavy dependence on foreign sources for a crucial raw material has omnious geopolitical and strategic implications. It literally makes our Nation's energy-based prosperity the hostage of the oil sheiks. Is it not about time that we face the facts about why domestic oil production is lagging and start solving the problem?

OIL PRICE REGULATION—A FLOP

After 4 years' experience with oil price controls and substitution of bureaucratic controls and regulations for marketplace decisionmaking, the results are clear.

The regulatory bureaucracy has been spectacularly successful in creating jobs for regulators. There are over 18,000 employees at DOE. The regulatory scheme has promulgated a stunning number of regulations—over 3,200 pages of such regulations and proposed regulations were issued by FEA in its first year alone. The FEA manual is now over 36 inches thick, and monthly revisions add 50 to 100 pages at a crack. While solving some injustices, the regulations and regulators have created many new injustices, disrupted the Nation's oil industry, and imposed severe hardships on many producers, refiners, distributors, retailers, and consumers.

But all this economic regimentation has not prevented consumer price increases—gasoline has gone from about 32 cents a gallon to over 64 cents a gallon in the last 4 years. Nor has this regulation encouraged new U.S. oil production. Quite obviously, the whole regulatory scheme has had the opposite effect.

While consumer prices have responded to the unregulated prices of OPEC oil, domestic oil prices have been held below the level at which producers have an economic incentive to discover, produce, and market oil. So we are producing less oil at home and becoming even more dependent on overseas sources. The situation will surely grow worse until free market pricing is restored.

Will a return to free market oil prices result in still higher consumer gasoline and oil product prices? Probably not, although a modest price increase would be better than the present trend toward ever-increasing dependency on OPEC, which means vastly higher consumer prices and unhealthy reliance on undependable sources.

Both letters from my own constituents and public opinion polls show that while a slight majority of the American people believe we face an energy problem, a majority also feels that the oil companies are getting too much and somehow to blame.

Yet both the current laws and regulations and the President's proposal do nothing to deal with one of the principal problems of the current situation. Domestic crude oil discovered in the United States before 1973 is price-regulated at $5.25 per barrel, while imported oil sells for around $14.60 per barrel.

So the current Government policy rewards U.S. companies for having explored and produced foreign oil, while penalizing domestic production.

While there is a chance that some type of oil price deregulation might cause price increases and untoward profit margins, the first priority should be a price policy which will encourage exploration, new discoveries, and new production of oil and natural gas.

Then if the resulting profits are truly windfalls, Congress could and should enact windfall tax legislation, including plowback provisions to encourage oil companies to reinvest profits in increased new production.

But the main thing is to encourage production through either gradual decontrol of prices or by legislating the end of the entire price-control allocation scheme.

ENDING THE NATURAL GAS SHORTAGE

In the 94th Congress, I introduced legislation to end the Nation's worsening natural gas shortage by removing Federal controls on the wellhead price of natural gas. And I continue to support deregulation.

Even after two severe winters on the east coast, Congress again seems ready to ignore the basic cause of the natural gas shortage. Government regulations caused the shortage, and more Government regulations are not soon likely to solve the shortage.

Yet the latest proposal adopted by the Energy Conference Committee, while hailed as a deregulation compromise, amounts to more regulation, not less. This proposal would regulate all natural gas, not just that transported across State lines, and would set up 23 different categories of Government-regulated natural gas prices—for the next 8 years. Deregulation in 1985 is held out as a reward for accepting 8 years of even more natural gas controls.

But there is another catch. If the President feels that natural gas prices should be rising too fast, he can reimpose price controls between 1985 and 1987. So we really are looking at 10 more years of regulations.

What is most dismaying about this latest regulatory scheme is that once again Congress has failed to learn from experience and has ignored the growing number of natural gas curtailments.

The severe curtailments of gas service which have plagued many areas could have been averted if Congress had heeded warnings of the impending problem. Unfortunately, however, until gas curtailments began to close schools and factories, most Members of Congress tended to ignore the consequences of Federal price regulations which encourage consumption while virtually eliminating incentives to increase, or even maintain, production.

AN ARTIFICIAL SHORTAGE

Even now some of our colleagues are reluctant to face the central fact about the natural gas shortage—it has been artificially created by these Federal controls. Until these restrictions are eliminated, or drastically modified, the situation is bound to grow worse. And the longer a decision is delayed, the more serious the consequences will become.

Until 10 years ago, America enjoyed an abundant supply of this efficient and environmentally desirable fuel. Gas consumption rose dramatically, but production more than kept pace. Year after year, more new gas was developed than consumed; reserves steadily increased.

But in 1968 the Supreme Court upheld the Federal Power Commission's complicated system of price regulation which was imposed on all natural gas sold for transmission in interstate commerce.

The effect was dramatic. Incentive to produce new gas for interstate commerce vanished almost overnight. The Nation's total gas production leveled out after rising for years, and the country began to use more gas than was produced. By 1973 new reserve additions were less than one-third of consumption and the Nation's total natural gas reserves dropped from a 15-year supply in 1967 to a 10-year reserve in 1970.

Actual new reserve discoveries in 1976 amounted to about 7.5 trillion cubic feet—36 percent of 1976 consumption levels. And of that 7.5 Tcf, only 3.5 Tcf were actually new discoveries. The rest was "discovered" by revisions in existing reserves.

In 1977, the same pattern continued. New natural gas reserve additions totaled 11.8 trillion cubic feet. But only 2.15 Tcf were from the discovery of new reservoirs; 2.11 Tcf resulted from new gas reserves "discovered" in existing gas fields; 7.58 Tcf resulted from "revisions and extensions" of the figures applying to existing fields.

As the Federal Power Commission regulations, and then those of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, have held down the price of gas, more and more has been diverted to intrastate use. Even though the highest regulated price for new natural gas has been increased to $1.49 per Mcf, the average price paid by gas suppliers is still only 87 cents per Mcf for interstate sales. But almost all intrastate gas is being sold at close to $2 per Mcf.

Consequently, new discoveries in the continental United States are mostly sold inside State boundaries, and less and less of U.S. gas is sold in interstate commerce.

As a result of these short-sighted Federal policies, shortages have plagued the Nation for the past 5 years.

In my own State of Colorado, lack of natural gas has at times closed schools, shut down factories, and slowed new home construction. In Colorado Springs, all interruptible gas customers are shut off the majority of the winter, and new customers have been added only on a replacement basis.

In Denver, the waiting list for natural gas, begun in 1973, is almost a year long, and Public Service Co. sees no improvement in sight.

Meanwhile, industries located in areas with local supplies of natural gas have a significant competitive advantage over firms which must rely on other forms of energy. Consequently, firms are foregoing plans to expand in nonproducing areas and relocating plants to take advantage of abundant natural gas available in a handful of States where it is produced in great quantity.

Homeowners and industries elsewhere who are, in effect, prohibited from bidding on natural gas are being forced to switch to higher priced substitutes.

In Colorado Springs, for example, the city council spent $1 million for equipment to inject a propane-air mixture into natural gas lines at times of peak demand. This cost, and the use of higher priced propane, became necessary simply because regular gas supplies were inadequate to maintain pressure in the lines on the coldest days when peak demand occurs.

Other communities have responded in other ways: Burlington, for example, maintains a large supply of fuel oil for emergency use if their interruptible supply of gas is cut off, leaving the powerplant—and city buildings, including the hospital—without service.

As municipalities and other priority users are increasingly forced to depend on propane, coal, and oil, the price of these substitutes is bid up in response to increased demand. Mobile home owners who use propane for heating and farmers who use it extensively in crop drying were horrified when the price per gallon jumped from around 18 cents to over 60 cents within a few months. Although part of the reason for the increase was the unconsidered impact of an FEA regulation, even after that was rectified, propane has remained twice as expensive as it was 4 years ago, and an even worse price-supply crunch may develop in the future.

The price of coal has been similarly affected—since 1968, the average price per short ton for coal has gone from $4.68 to $21.

OTHER AREAS OF THE NATION

Although I have mentioned hardships and dislocations in my own State, the shortage of natural gas is causing similar consequences elsewhere. Recently, the Federal Power Commission turned down an oil company's request to supply domestic natural gas to New York State users at a cost of 52 cents per Mcf. So instead these users ended up with imported liquefied natural gas from Algeria at $1.86 per Mcf.

In New Jersey, gas curtailment levels last winter averaged 28 percent. If they rise to 30 percent, the State estimates that 12,000 workers could be laid off, and that the working hours of another 40,000 employees would be reduced. In Ohio, in 1970, a 10-day shutdown of natural gas caused 1,500 man-years of unemployment.

These are just a few of many dislocations that has resulted from the Federal Government's unwise attempt to substitute administrative judgments and regulations for the efficient working of the free market. Even the Federal Power Commission, the agency which regulates the field price of gas, has repeatedly called for legislation to decontrol gas altogether. FPC studies, and much other evidence, including an ERDA study last year, indicate that decontrol is the only feasible way to assure the Nation a dependable supply of natural gas.

OBJECTIONS TO DECONTROL

The main objection to returning to free-market pricing seems to be the fear of a drastic increase in home heating costs. Such increases may be justified by comparison to other fuels which are harder to transport and use, less desirable environmentally and far more expensive on an energy equivalent basis. Fortunately, however, further higher prices to residential users do not seem likely.

Most of the burner-tip cost of natural gas to the consumer is the cost of distribution, not gas. Only about 25 to 30 percent of the price paid for home heating is accounted for by the fuel cost, the balance representing the distribution charges. So even if the field price of gas were to double or triple, a pessimistic estimate, I believe, the effect on most homeowners would be relatively modest, certainly far less than converting to other fuels if natural gas stocks are further depleted. And such increases would probably be phased over many years.

The alternative should also be considered. If nothing is done, and the volume of gas carried in interstate pipelines declines, the shrinking volume of gas will necessarily become more expensive as the cost of the pipeline—the major component of the cost—is amortized over fewer and fewer units of natural gas. In short, some experts believe that price increases resulting from decontrolling the wellhead price will be less than price increases required by a regulated price structure. As the former FPC Chairman John Nassikas pointed out:

> Whatever the cost of deregulation may ultimately be, it will be far less than the costs associated with current and anticipated curtailments of gas deliveries, idle pipeline capacity, high cost supplemental supplies.

THE FREE MARKET APPROACH

The Nation has suffered long enough as a result of this experiment with regimentation in the natural gas industry. By substituting Government decisionmaking for the free market, we have curtailed supply, increased costs, fostered economic dislocations, and permitted the Nation to become increasingly dependent on foreign sources of natural gas.

There are over 4,000 producers of natural gas in this country. I think it is time to turn them loose again. Let us go back to the kind of competition that provided us with abundant natural gas before and will do so again.

There is no reason to delay. This subject has been exhaustively studied and the conclusions are obivous.

By deregulating natural gas, Congress can do more to alleviate the Nation's overall energy shortage than by any other piece of legislation before Congress.

MORE TAXES IN THE U.S. ENERGY FUTURE?

The President has proposed a system of taxes and more taxes.

This approach should be rejected. Americans pay far too much in taxes as it is, and usually the burden falls on those least able to bear it.

While some taxes may be necessary to shift preferences where the market system does not reflect the true cost of energy (in most cases due to Government intervention), the more than $40 billion a year in energy taxes proposed by the President could drag the economy down, hike unemployment levels, and boost inflation—without making a substantial impact on the energy problem.

For example, unemployed Americans are not likely to buy any cars, let alone smaller ones. Neither will higher taxes cause Americans to use less gas and oil if the regulations keep the price low.

And higher taxes will certainly not prompt the oil companies to look for more oil or create alternatives to our excessive cost of importing oil and natural gas.

TRANSITION TO NEW TECHNOLOGIES

Much has been said about the need for new technologies—from solar energy, geothermal, tidal, and wind-powered systems to the dream of unlimited clean fusion power.

All of these can and will make a substantial contribution to our energy situation, but what we need is both the time to make that transition and the encouragement of both businesses and individuals.

Some encouragement should come through the price system. How does maintaining an artificially low price for natural gas encourage the development of solar heating for homes? Deregulating natural gas prices would give a natural boost to solar heating and cooling. So would tax credits for individuals who installed their own solar heating systems.

Electric rates which place a heavy emphasis on the first kilowatt hours tend to discourage both conservation and private power supplementation, yet many remote locations might be better off with either independent or supplementary systems. High rise buildings are prodigious wasters of electricity, but the current rate structure does not really reflect any need for conservation.

There are certainly other changes that could be made in the income tax structure to encourage technological innovation, as well as in building codes, Federal and local regulations, and transportation pricing.

All of these should be explored, especially with an eye to reducing the more meaningless and oppressive Federal regulations.

WHO REALLY MUST BEAR THE BURDEN?

In conclusion, I would like to comment briefly on an implicit misunderstanding which seems to complicate much of the public discussion of energy issues. It is often implied, and sometimes openly charged, that a handful of affluent consumers are using so much energy that the shortage could be largely or completely alleviated if they would reduce their consumption. So many proposed solutions to the energy problem are based on cutting off or reducing "excessive" use of energy by snowmobiles, motor boats, private aircraft, racing cars, and so forth.

Such proposals might reduce consumption marginally, but they would not solve the main problem. Over 40 percent of the demand for petroleum in 1977 was for automotive transportation. Less than 1 percent was for snowmobiles, motor boats, and private aircraft.

Moreover, American families with incomes of more than $30,000 comprise about 10 percent of the population and have 16 percent of the cars—around 19 million. Their actual mileage per car is about the same as all American families who make more than $7,000 a year. Since more than 70 percent of all American families make more than $7,000 and Americans consumed over 100 billion gallons of gasoline last year, it is obvious that any real reduction in gasoline use must involve all Americans, not just a few high-income gas hogs.

The same pattern holds true for natural gas consumption. According to studies by natural gas companies around the United States, there is only about a 20-percent difference in consumption levels between the highest income areas and the low-income areas.

Obviously, meaningful energy proposals will affect all Americans.

Domestic oil and natural gas production are continuing to decline, and even after the embargo of 1973–74, our reliance on imported fuels continues to increase, while the prices we shell out for such fuels also skyrocket. In 1973, U.S. dependence on petroleum imports was 34 percent; in 1974 it increased to 37 percent; and this year to over 47 percent.

The failure of Congress to come up with a realistic energy policy has also created a situation where Americans who invested in the oil and natural gas business in the United States are being penalized, while Americans who invested abroad are being rewarded.

I think it is clear; we have no choice. Regardless of Government policies, political promises, self-deception, and little white lies, energy prices have gone up and will continue to go up.

Unless we choose a tremendous loss of personal freedom for all Americans which will result from the increase in Government controls and regulations, we cannot choose lower prices. As we have seen, even thousands of pages of regulations could not keep energy prices from some increase. So, more regulations, and the corresponding loss of personal freedoms are no answer.

What we can choose, however, is the kind of future we pay for with higher energy prices. Will it be one where we have new energy sources, a continuation of personal freedom, and a faith in personal initiative? Or will it be one where the Government controls energy use, legislates the morality of energy consumption, and mandates all phases of the economy?

I believe the choices we face are that fundamental and that there is no escaping a choice, because U.S. prosperity is based on energy.

Refusing to make a choice is, in effect, choosing higher prices and surrendering control of energy policy and our economy to the oil producers of the world.

Continuing the present situation is merely a "share the shortage" philosophy requiring greater and greater Government involvement as the shortages become worse, as they will.

And if the Government controls energy, it must control our most personal choices.

I feel the choices which face this Congress should be made as an active decision, rather than as a passive acceptance of current policies.

We can encourage new technologies, new discoveries, and new ways of life, or we can blindly assume that everything will somehow remain the same, and that we can scrape up another $40 billion to pay off foreign oil suppliers this year, and the year after, and the year after, ad infinitum.

After the experience of the past 4 years, I suggest we choose the American tradition of letting Americans be free to work out solutions, rather than opting for more and more regulations.●

SENATE—Monday, June 5, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 12 noon, at the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. EDWARD ZORINSKY, a Senator from the State of Nebraska.

PRAYER

God of our fathers and our God, we thank Thee that in every generation Thou dost lift from our common life leaders of uncommon strength and wisdom. Now that his chair is vacant and his voice silenced, we thank Thee for Thy servant, our colleague and friend, JAMES ALLEN. We thank Thee for his sharp mind, his parliamentary skills, his courtly manners, his magnanimity, his kindness, his abiding friendship, and his living faith in Thee.

Surround with Thy love all who are dear to him, comforting them and strengthening them in the days to come. Guide his State in determining its future leadership. Be with us here as we continue to work without him, that we may be strong as he was strong, gracious as he was gracious, faithful as he was faithful. And finally wilt Thou bless this land with justice and righteousness.

Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., June 5, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable EDWARD ZORINSKY, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ZORINSKY thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield briefly to the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN).

DEATH OF SENATOR JAMES B. ALLEN OF ALABAMA

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. President, I shall not make any extended remarks at this time, but at an appropriate time, I shall speak on the life and death of my dear friend and colleague.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be stated.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, Senate Resolution 472, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of the Honorable James B. Allen, late a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee, of which he shall be a member, to attend the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate at the conclusion of its business today, do stand in recess.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution is considered and agreed to.

Pursuant to the resolution just agreed to, the Chair appoints all Members of the Senate to constitute the committee to attend the funeral of the deceased Senator JAMES B. ALLEN.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be stated.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read the resolution, Senate Resolution 473, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed to arrange for and attend the funeral of the Honorable James B. Allen, late a Senator from the State of Alabama, on vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution is considered and agreed to.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the leaders today be extended from 10 minutes each to not to exceed 30 minutes each.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR JAMES B. ALLEN—THE PASSING OF A TRUE GENTLEMAN

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, all Members of the Senate were deeply saddened last week by the sudden passing of our friend, the distinguished Senator from Alabama, JAMES B. ALLEN. For nearly a decade, Senator ALLEN had served diligently and brilliantly as one of our colleagues, and his presence and influence will be genuinely missed in this Chamber.

Ralph Waldo Emerson wrote, "Life is not so short but that there is always time enough for courtesy." Courtesy was a hallmark in Senator ALLEN'S relations with people. The source of that courtesy was an inherent sense of respect that he bore for others. Even in the most heated legislative battles, of which he was a master, JIM ALLEN never lost the qualities of dignity and human decency that endeared him to everyone, including those who on a particular issue were his opponents.

Some men in this life are consumed and eventually wasted in the pursuit only of self-interest. But Senator ALLEN was a man who gave himself away in the service of his principles and the people of Alabama. He believed in ideals that are lasting, and he sought to fulfill his obligation to those ideals in everything he did.

In every respect, JAMES ALLEN was a gentleman. He was one of those rare men to whom to know is to understand the meaning of the word "honor." Throughout his life, he had cultivated in himself those qualities of character and personality that are recognized and cherished in refined society almost universally.

JIM ALLEN was born reared, and educated in Alabama. After serving in the Alabama State House of Representatives, he resigned from that body to enlist in the U.S. Navy during World War II. In 1946, after completion of 3 years duty in the Pacific theater of war, he was elected to the Alabama Senate. Subsequently serving twice as the Lieutenant Governor of Alabama, he was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1968. As a Senator, he became a meticulous legislative craftsman, and was an articulate spokesman for the issues that were of deepest concern to him.

I recall that he had asked me upon several occasions to lead the prayer breakfast in the Vandenberg Room, which occurs on every Wednesday morning. I suppose it had been 3, 4, or 5 years since I had attended such a prayer breakfast. Finally, I said, "Yes, JIM, I will lead the prayer breakfast for you." So we set a date, and it was on a Wednesday, a week ago last Wednesday.

I am glad that I told JIM ALLEN that I would speak at that prayer breakfast for him. That was the last Senate prayer breakfast he conducted.

He was that kind of man. He had time to give not only to the Senate and to the work of the Senate but also time to give to the spiritual side of life, which, in the final analysis, is what is lasting.

Mr. President, throughout the history of the U.S. Senate, many men have won distinction as Senators. JIM ALLEN won such distinction also. But he added luster and honor to the Senate through the service he rendered among us, and he will not soon be forgotten. He will never be forgotten by those of us who have served with him and who came to know him and to love him.

Many times he shook hands with me and said: "BOB, I love you. I really love you." In the midst of our heated debates he would do this. That was the kind of man he was, and that is the kind of man that I shall remember.

Let fate do her worst.
There are relics of joy,
Bright dreams of the past
That she cannot destroy.

They come in the nighttime
Of sorrow and care,
And bring back the features
That joy used to wear.

Long, long be my heart
With such memories filled,
Like the vase in which roses
Have once been distilled.

You may break, you may shatter
The vase, if you will,
But the scent of the roses
Will hang 'round it still.

Mr. President, after Senators have had a chance to speak of Senator ALLEN, I wish to make reference on the passing of former Senator Joseph Montoya.

I yield now to the distinguished minority leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the sudden death of our colleague, Senator JIM ALLEN, has come as a shock to all of us. He was admired and respected by Members of this body on both sides of the aisle, and his own respect for the Senate as an institution was well-known. Although he had served in the Senate a shorter time than many of his colleagues, few Senators spent as much time attending to the business of the Senate. His fine legal mind quickly grasped the intricacies of Senate rules and procedure, and he applied his expertise consistently to protecting the rights of the minority during Senate debate of many controversial issues.

JIM ALLEN and I were on opposite issues in a number of these debates, and he was always a formidable opponent. His dignity and courtly manners set a standard for all of us during the most spirited discussions. I believe that even those who disagreed with him strongly on philosophical issues admired his patience and his keen sense of fairness.

Mr. President, when I found myself in agreement with Senator ALLEN on legislative issues, he was a staunch and valuable ally. We worked closely together on legislation dealing with public financing of congressional campaigns and on the Labor Reform Act, which is now before the Senate. And whether he agreed or disagreed with your point of view, JIM ALLEN was unfailingly courteous, on and off the floor. He treated his fellow Senators with respect. He in turn was highly respected for his personal conduct and his loyalty to the Senate. No man championed those causes in which he believed more firmly or effectively. His skills as a legislator and as a parliamentarian will be sorely missed, and his passing represents a great loss, not only to this body, but to the Nation as well.

Mr. President, JIM ALLEN was not only a colleague but a friend. He served the Senate and his State with distinction. His talent was incisive. His intellect was keen. His compassion was great. His understanding of the fundamentals of the Republic was unexcelled. His grasp of the rules of the Senate, the precedents, the reason and the rationale for their existence and their present state of evolution was astonishing.

I once remarked when someone asked me, "Don't you wish you knew the rules as well as JIM ALLEN," that, in my view, I had no ability to do that, but rather I wanted to make sure that JIM ALLEN understood them so that he could impart that special knowledge to the rest of us in the course of our deliberations and our legislative endeavor.

All of us will miss JIM ALLEN, Mr. President; none as keenly and personally as his family—and I take this opportunity to pay my special respects to Mrs. Allen and to his family—nor as immediately and fundamentally as will his constituents in the State of Alabama. But all of us, nonetheless, will miss JIM ALLEN for his special contribution of himself and his considerable talent to the formulation of public policy in this Chamber.

So, Mr. President, I join all of my colleagues in wishing a fond farewell to a man who contributed much to the modern history of the Senate, and he will be long remembered for that effort.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield now to the senior Senator from Alabama.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. President, I did not make remarks as I introduced the resolution because I thought that the two leaders should like to come first. But let me say that I am greatly grieved at the death of my colleague and my good friend, JIM ALLEN.

I was in Alabama when I received the news. As a matter of fact, I was attending a meeting, and a rather large crowd was there, when I got word that he had died. I refused to believe it until I had the Associated Press check and verify it. JIM ALLEN was a man of good health. I had never known him to have any great difficulty healthwise.

I had known JIM ALLEN ever since he was a young lawyer starting out in the practice of law at Gadsden, Ala., his hometown. I knew him when he served in the State legislature. I knew him when he served as Lieutenant Governor twice with a 4-year interval between the two periods of service.

We have all said that JIM ALLEN was the master of parliamentary procedures in this body, and I have often said that he gained that ability as a result of his presiding over the Senate of the State of Alabama so that when he came to the Senate of the United States he had a tremendous grasp of parliamentary procedures generally.

JIM ALLEN and I worked together for 10 years here in the Senate. We got along fine. As a matter of fact, recently there was a very large meeting in Alabama that was held in connection with my announced retirement. JIM ALLEN was one of the speakers there, and I shall always remember one thing that he said.

He said:

John Sparkman and I have served together in the Senate all of these years. We have not always agreed, but there has never been an unkind word between us.

And that is true. Many times JIM would offer an amendment or a motion that I could not agree with, and very often I would meet him in the well of the Senate and say:

Jim, I am sorry, but I cannot vote with you on this.

He would say:

I fully understand, and you ought to vote just the way you are voting.

He was that kind of a man.

JIM has rendered tremendous service here in the Senate as well as in other legislative bodies at the State level. He was a man of ability. He was a good lawyer. He was a good member of the legislature, a good Member of the Senate, and he rendered a good service as Lieutenant Governor on two different occasions, as I have mentioned.

He not only knew parliamentary procedures, but he knew how to get along with other people.

We shall miss JIM ALLEN greatly.

I remember when he was first elected to the Senate a dinner was given for him in the State capital, Montgomery, Ala., I was there. The retiring Senator, Lister Hill, was there, and Lister made a great presentation at that time.

In my talk following that I told JIM ALLEN that I had been described one time as a person with the longest service as a junior Senator in the Senate of the United States. That was not quite right because Bill Fulbright held that position. But I had served 22 years as junior Senator, and I said to JIM ALLEN: "JIM, I hope you serve as junior Senator for 22 years."

Some time ago he laughingly said to me, "I believe I am going to break that record that you boasted of."

But now JIM has gone. My wife and I are greatly grieved. We extend our deepest sympathy to Maryon, his widow.

When I learned of JIM's death I tried every way I could to reach Maryon by telephone, but she was not reachable. As a matter of fact, she was undergoing treatment down in south Alabama.

JIM died at Gulf Shores in south Alabama, and his death was sudden, a heartbreaking surprise to all who have known and worked with him.

We extend our sympathy not only to Maryon but also to his children and all of his loved ones and his great mass of friends everywhere.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise to express my feeling of the great loss the Senate has suffered with the passing of JIM ALLEN. When the history of the U.S. Senate is written, and they talk about the greats of the U.S. Senate, JIM ALLEN's name will belong in that book.

It was not too often that I agreed with the Senator from Alabama. His views were not always the same as mine. Mine were not always the same as his. But I had such tremendous respect for him as a person and for his conduct of the Senate's business, for his courtly presence, and for his effectiveness on the floor of the U.S. Senate that I feel it a personal loss, as do all the other Members of the Senate at his having left us.

He fought for his points. He was effective. He understood, comprehended, and had digested the rules of the Senate as probably no other man in the U.S.

Senate. In his way he used those rules to fight for his positions. He did it in a gentlemanly manner.

You always knew where JIM ALLEN stood. He never equivocated, and whether there was 1 other Member of the Senate or 99 other Members of the Senate who were in accord with his point of view, he took it, he fought for it, and he made his point known to the Senate and the people of this country.

When I would talk to others outside the Senate about some of the strong leaders of this body, there was never an occasion in which I failed to mention the name of JIM ALLEN as one of those strong leaders. In his manner and in his mastery of the Senate rules he did as much to have impact upon the course of legislation in this body as any other single individual.

I did not know him intimately but I knew him well enough to know that he was a warm, considerate, concerned person. When I was engaged with the Senator from South Dakota in the filibuster on deregulation of natural gas I had occasion during many of those days and before the filibuster took place to inquire of JIM ALLEN as to whether he would be of assistance in explaining and helping with respect to the Senate rules. He said he would and, indeed, he did.

He did not agree with my position, but he was the kind of Senator's Senator who felt that the rules were to be interpreted and applicable to all Members equally, and if he could be helpful to another Member in digesting those rules and understanding them he was there to do so.

Personally I always think of him as the one human being whom I know and whom I met in my life whom I could never follow through a door. No matter what the occasion, JIM ALLEN was so courteous and had such a degree of warmth toward his fellow man that he always insisted that whoever he was walking with preceded him before he passed through that door. A small gesture, but I think it was a mark of the man's humaneness, kindness, and gentlemanliness.

I am a northerner. I had often heard of southern courtesy and southern graciousness. JIM ALLEN was the epitome of that courtesy and graciousness in every possible way.

We will miss him. The Senate as an institution will miss him, and the country will miss his total dedication and effectiveness on the floor of this body. I consider it a privilege personally to have known JIM ALLEN, and I grieve with his family at their loss.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair alternate from side to side in the use of the time of both leaders on this occasion and under the circumstances.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, the sudden and untimely death of our colleague, Senator JAMES B. ALLEN, of Alabama, has left a feeling of deep sadness in the Senate.

JIM ALLEN, as we all referred to him, was one of the giants of the Senate, not only during his comparatively short time in the Senate but in the past quarter of a century or more. He was a most formidable foe of legislation which he deemed unwise or not in the best interest of our country. In opposing such legislation, though, he was always tenacious and formidable. He coupled with this an unusual knowledge of the intricate rules of the Senate. No one in my time had ever more completely mastered the rules of the Senate than had JIM ALLEN.

JIM had the unusual faculty of relentlessly fighting legislation and treaties he strongly opposed, but while doing so he always remained the typical Southern gentleman. Even those who bore the brunt of his opposition could not help but have a deep sense of admiration and respect for this beloved Senator.

I was privileged to serve with him on the Senate Agriculture Committee where he always had a deep interest and concern for farmers. His keen mind and great legal expertise were always so evident through the years that he served on that committee.

JIM ALLEN will be greatly missed, not only by the Members of this body, but by people everywhere. Pat and I extend our deepest sympathy to his beloved wife Maryon and all the family.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, Mrs. Helms and I were preparing to return to Washington on the evening of June 1 when the shocking news came that JIM ALLEN had died in Alabama about an hour earlier.

It was not a moment that I will forget quickly. A thousand thoughts raced through my consciousness: Concern for the country in the loss of such a dedicated defender of American principles, my own deep and personal loss of a treasured friend, the countless hours that JIM ALLEN and I had worked together on this floor during the past 5 years.

Then came a steady stream of calls from news media, wanting to know my reaction. Mr. President, how do you answer questions of this type? One gropes, at a time like that, for an adequate expression of sadness, for the words to pay tribute to an outstanding friend. The words would not come—not in an adequate sort of way.

My former colleague in the Senate, Sam Ervin, offered the best assessment of JIM ALLEN. Senator Ervin said:

> If I had to stand with one man at Armageddon and battle for the Lord, I hope that man would be Senator James Allen of Alamana.

That summed it up. Both Senator Ervin and I worked closely with JIM ALLEN in efforts to preserve what we felt were the fundamental principles of America. When vital issues were before the Senate, JIM ALLEN and I had an agreement that at no time would both of us leave the Senate floor simultaneously. I remember the Panama Canal debates, and the hour after hour that JIM ALLEN sat over there, watching and observing rising so often to debate and discuss that momentous issue.

That fight was lost by two votes, but it was not JIM ALLEN's fault. As always, as in everything he did, he did the best he could.

As I look back on my friendship and my relationship with JIM ALLEN, I think it was his will to stand up for his country that made him an acknowledged statesman. He was a strong man, but his strength was not really his greatness. Victor Hugo once said that people do not lack strength; they lack will.

Well, Mr. President, JIM ALLEN lacked neither strength nor will.

The news accounts of Senator ALLEN's death and, indeed, the comments today on this floor, have emphasized his parliamentary skill, which was, indeed, amazing. Some news reporters have written about JIM ALLEN in terms of his being one of the few remaining Southern conservatives. But the nobility of JIM ALLEN was that he cared about the freedoms of the American people, and he was willing to stand up for them.

He often expressed puzzlement that so many Americans often do not seem to understand that the Federal Government is the cause of many of their problems. So he frequently took stands which were not politically popular. It would have been easier for JIM ALLEN to have rolled with the punch, not bothering to stand in protest against things he believed to be wrong. He would not have been subjected to the cirticism that he sometimes had to endure. But he took the positions constantly, as someone once put it, that nothing is politically right which is normally wrong.

The last time I saw JIM ALLEN was the morning of May 24, a Wednesday morning, to which the distinguished majority leader has already alluded. We had attended the Senate prayer breakfast and as JIM ALLEN and I walked together to our respective offices he mentioned that he would be glad to go back to North Carolina with me—"if," as he put it, "it would help."

He will not be going back to North Carolina, Mr. President, not in the flesh. But the spirit of JIM ALLEN, a man of principle, courage and dedication, is kindred to the spirit of the people of North Carolina. It is a very special blessing to me that for more than 5 years I have had the privilege of knowing him, working with him, having him as my friend, and being his. Mrs. Helms and I extend our deepest sympathy to Maryon, and to the rest of JIM ALLEN's family.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to the eloquent statements made concerning our friend, JIM ALLEN.

On Saturday, the Senator from Kansas was in Alabama and had the opportunity to visit Gadsden, Ala., and pay his respects to Mrs. Allen and Jim Allen, Jr. As has been said this morning, I believe by the distinguished majority leader, many Senators gain distinction as Senators in one way or another, but I would guess the true measure of a Senator is whether or not he gains respect from his colleagues. There is no doubt about it that JIM ALLEN gained respect. Some of it came slowly, some of it was begrudging, but there was respect, a respect based on his ability, which has been referred to a number of times on the Senate floor; a respect based on his demeanor; a respect based on his attitude, his courtesy.

There is no doubt that Senator ALLEN will be missed. Probably some will feel that with the passage of time this might eliminate a possible roadblock to legislation. But having had the opportunity to visit in Alabama on Saturday, there is no doubt in this Senator's mind that JIM ALLEN was loved and respected. He was loved and respected by men and women in all walks of life, of all political persuasions. Yes, because of his parliamentary prowess, but perhaps more importantly because of his dedication to duty, his devotion to the people of Alabama, his willingness to work quietly.

He left his mark in the Senate. He was a good legislator. It was certainly a privilege, particularly for those of us who shared his philosophy, to have had the opportunity to work with him, side by side in a common effort, time after time after time.

Mr. President, I am deeply grieved at the death of Senator JAMES ALLEN. The people of Alabama have lost a great representative, the U.S. Senate has lost a respected leader, and I have lost a close friend and dear colleague.

DEVOTED TO ALABAMA

Alabamians shall long remember JIM ALLEN as a repository of those deeply held traditional values—love of country, respect for authority, dedication to duty—which can best be described as "American." Born and raised in Gadsden, Ala., a product of Alabama public schools, the voice of JIM ALLEN was an accurate reflection of the will of the people of his State. While in the Senate, he made a practice of visiting every Alabama county at least once a year to keep in touch with his fellow citizens. This devotion did not go unrewarded. When Senator ALLEN ran for reelection in 1974, he received 95 percent of the popular vote, carrying every county in his State.

PARLIAMENTARY PROWESS

Senator ALLEN's command of Senate rules and procedure, and his prowess in debate, have earned for him a secure place in the history of the Senate. Like any Senator, JIM ALLEN had his critics, but none doubted his sincerity and good will. A master tactician, uncanny and stalwart, he was a formidable presence on the Senate floor. The Senator from Kansas, and undoubtedly all of his colleagues, could tell dozens of stories of the times JIM ALLEN tied the Senate in parliamentary knots—stories that may one day be legends.

These maneuvers, however, were not idle play or blind obstructionism, but stemmed from a deep-seated faith in the soundness and justness of his beliefs. None took his responsibilities as a U.S. Senator more seriously than JIM ALLEN. And if he was sometimes a considerable foe, he was always a gentleman, treating his colleagues with deference and respect.

MAN OF INTEGRITY

After his reputation as a parliamentarian, JIM ALLEN was perhaps best known for his personal integrity. Since his election to the Senate 10 years ago, he each year published a financial statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. JIM was a devoutly religious man, too, who viewed his chairmanship of the Senate Prayer Breakfast Group as one of his most treasured responsibilities.

These qualities made JIM ALLEN a wonderful husband and father, in addition to a good friend. At this time of sorrow, I would like to offer my most heartfelt condolences to the Allen family.

Senator JAMES ALLEN left his mark on the Senate—a mark that will long be remembered. He was a virtuous man, a courteous, if tenacious, legislator. I consider it a privilege to have known him and worked with him. He will shortly be succeeded, but it is unlikely that he will be replaced.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am a Senator who did not share JIM ALLEN'S philosophy. I mourn his loss. I think it is a real loss to the Senate. I rise to pay my respects and condolences to his widow and to his son.

Mr. President, I have been in this body a long time—not as long as some others, but I think I qualify as having been here a long while. I have learned one thing about it, which is also a reflection of our country. That is that the Senate is a conglomerate, really; it is a mirror of our Nation and its diversity of view, of character, of background, of sectional interests, and the philosophic as well as pragmatic outlook. In that composite, which is the finest expression of the Senate, JIM ALLEN had an honored and important place.

Tribute should be paid to him for the skill, the diligence, and the profound dedication which he devoted to what he conceived to be his duty in the interests of making this body as representative as possible of the American ideal and the American idea. He performed his role strongly and, as has been said before, occasionally nettled me and many others, but he performed his role well and creditably as an essential element in what goes into making up our minds.

I, like others here, at the same time that I might have been annoyed at the delay or the other problems which I thought were caused, realize that I had to prove my case, just as others did; that I had to sit up and take notice of the arguments made against them. In my judgment, it elevated my own judgment, commanded more of my ability than sometimes I thought I had, and I think that is just as true of other Senators. So he rendered a real service as an outstanding servant of his country and the people of his State in the cause of democratic government.

Also, and I should like his widow and his son to know, Mr. President, JIM ALLEN was reasonable. When you finally did find a formula, and we did, in respect of some prohibitions which he wished to place against participating in foreign aid by some of the African States, for example, for reasons which were very weighty, when you did find a formula, he was not one to haggle or niggle about it. When the formula appealed to him, he accepted it. When he was with you, he was just as strongly with you and just as effective as when he was against you. And we all know how effective he could be when he was against you and how, as a single and individual Senator, he very often carried the power almost to the majority in terms of his knowledge of the way things are done here and the rules by which they are done.

So, I say of JIM ALLEN, a noble son of his State, who has had a fine and very distinguished career here, that he fulfilled one of the primary obligations of being a Senator: He contributed affirmatively to the total wisdom which we consider to be, when we are lucky enough to have it, our finest aggregate product.

His family has every reason, in the midst of the tragedy of his having left them at so relatively young an age, as modern ages go, to derive deep consolation and satisfaction from the appreciation which he developed here.

He did not seek it. As a matter of fact, often, he did many things which one would think would repel it. But we are a little over 21 around here and we did appreciate it.

I extend my wife's and my profound condolences to his family and to the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise also to share some of my feelings with regard to the Senator from Alabama, my dear friend, JIM ALLEN. When I arrived here as a freshman Senator, he was one of the first people to take me under his wing and to assist me in understanding a little more about the Senate.

Not only have I enjoyed him as a fellow Senator, but I have enjoyed him as a person who has similar ideals and similar beliefs.

One of the most enjoyable things about Senator ALLEN was his conduct of the Senate prayer breakfast every week. Whenever he, as the leader of the prayer breakfast, would take charge and lead the discussion, we could always expect a lively, intelligent, spiritual discussion that provoked all of us into thinking more about what we are really here for and helped us all to realize that, after all, material things are pretty fleeting in the light of the overall world.

I like Mrs. Allen just as much as I did Senator ALLEN, although I did not know her as well and do not know her as well. But Senator ALLEN, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, on which I was ranking Republican, has befriended me in ways that I could never express here, on the floor of the Senate. I would say he was one of my dearest friends, one of the people whom I looked up to the most. The news of his passing the other evening was almost, at that time, more than my wife and I could bear, because she knew how very much I loved him and still do.

I do not know many people with whom I have been in contact, and I have known a lot of wonderful people in my day, whom I would rate in the same class of humanity and diligence, effort, energy spirituality, and intelligence as Senator ALLEN. I just happen to believe that there is a life hereafter and that he has to have a great place therein because of the life that he lived here.

I join my colleagues who have eulogized him today in expressing my high regard, my deep-felt love for all that he meant to us here in this body and for what he means personally to me, and for the many good things that he did. In fact, I do not know of one bad thing that Senator ALLEN did in the whole time that I knew him. William Wordsworth said, in his ode, "Intimations of Immortality:"

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar:
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home:
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing Boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy

I think that, in some way, sums up some of my feelings about Senator ALLEN.

So, also, does William Cullen Bryant's "Thanatopsis," in which he said:

So live that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

If ever a man could have that said about him, I think it was our friend, Senator JIM ALLEN.

Finally, Elaine and I would like to join in extending our deep-most sympathy to Senator ALLEN'S wife and family, because they have to grieve over the loss of someone that great. Our love and our prayers will be with them.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I, too, wish to pay my respects to the memory of our colleague and friend in the Senate. He was one of the finest men I was privileged to know. He and Maryon had visted our home just within the last few days. We were good personal friends.

I believe JIM ALLEN will be remembered for the statesman that he was, the parts that he played in the debates on the floor of the Senate, his mastery of the parliamentary arts, and his courtesy to his colleagues in the Senate.

I was privileged to serve with him on the Senate Judiciary Committee. It was a pleasure to be associated with Senator ALLEN, in committee, in the Senate, and in a personal capacity.

I extend my deepest sympathies to his widow.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, Senator JAMES ALLEN was a truly distinguished gentleman and will long be remembered for the unwaivering dedication and incomparable talents he brought to public service. The principles he stood for with such devotion earned him a special place in the hearts of the people of Alabama. These same principles earned him a special place in the hearts of the Members of this body.

I happened to be with him on many occasions in the prayer breakfast meetings with which he associated himself weekly. His christian devotion was certainly an outstanding part of his private life, his family life, and his public life.

This past year, he was the chairman of the President's prayer breakfast, which I think was the most successful one I have witnessed in the several times I have attended.

This body is a body of debate and the compelling purpose of the Senate is to embroil itself in controversy. Out of this controversy, hopefully, and I think actually, does come light, the truth of the better way. JIM ALLEN found himself embroiled in the controversy of the Senate on many, many occasions. Sometimes he was in the majority, but oftentimes in the minority and a number of times, he almost seemed to be a light by itself, shining very brilliantly and very confidently.

Because of the light he brought to our deliberation, the legislative record of this body during the time he was a Member of the U.S. Senate is far superior to what it would have been if it had not been for the interest, the activity, the energy, the courage, the devotion of Senator JIM ALLEN of Alabama.

What we think of him can be shown quite accurately statistically by what his constituents in Alabama think of him. After his first term in the U.S. Senate, he was reelected in 1974, carrying every county in Alabama and receiving 95 percent of the popular vote, a unique testament to his popularity.

Here on the Senate floor, his unflagging spirit and mastery of Senate rules and procedures earned him the admiration and deep respect not only of each of his colleagues but of the citizens of this Nation.

Senator ALLEN was a unique public servant and a fine man. His friends here in the Senate, in Alabama and across America, and, for that matter, throughout the world, are deeply saddened by his passing and are going to miss him.

If I had to sum up my thinking of Senator ALLEN in a few words, I would say he was a Christian man, a gentle man, a gentleman.

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the shock and sadness of Senator JAMES B. ALLEN'S passing last week is eased only by the great respect and appreciation we have for his years of service among us here in the Senate.

The Senator from Alabama and I disagreed on many issues which came before the Senate. And yet at all times his resourcefulness and imagination made him a formidable opponent; courtesy, fairness, and respect were his unfailing trademarks.

Perhaps the greatest debt of gratitude owed to JIM ALLEN by the Senate and the Nation is for his tireless defense of minority interests in Congress. His innovative and skillful use of the Senate rules and procedures on many occasions preserved the precious right in our democracy of minority voices to be heard and to have their influence felt at the highest levels of government.

In times which cry for the reestablishment of political and ideological balance in America, JIM ALLEN stood as an immovable object in the path of some seemingly inexorable majorities. For that we respect him, honor him, and will deeply miss him.●

● Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, in this past Sunday's Washington Post, there appeared an editorial in tribute to our late colleague from Alabama, entitled "JAMES BROWNING ALLEN," which captured some of the substance of the man and his impact on the Senate and on legislation. Mr. President, I ask that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

JAMES BROWNING ALLEN

Sen. James B. Allen of Alabama, who died suddenly on Thursday, was a master of the Senate rules. That is the first thing to be said of Mr. Allen, and it is no mean praise. He did not merely learn Jefferson's parliamentary manual; he absorbed it and employed it more doggedly, shrewdly and creatively than any other senator in years. In the era in which the all-night Senate filibuster went out of style, Sen. Allen substituted tactical skill for oratorical stamina. He was constantly devising new—but impeccably precedented—ways of sustaining debate, blocking legislation he opposed, and defending the conservative positions that he held tenaciously.

He was effective—far too effective, from the liberals' point of view. At various times he managed to block or delay campaign-financing legislation, voter-registration bills, civil-right measures, tax changes and much, much more. On the Judiciary and Rules Committees, he was always a factor to be reckoned with. On the Senate floor he was a formidable, independent force.

In short, Sen. Allen was an old-style Southern conservative. He was akin to that generation of very adept, very strong-minded and very parliamentary Southern Democrats who ruled the Senate not so long ago. He didn't merely love the rules; he relished the institution and its traditions of courtesy, precedence and rich debate. It was no accident that, for all their disagreements over issues, Mr. Allen and Majority Leader Robert Byrd developed a generally good working relationship. One would expect that of two "inside" senators with high regard for details and proprieties.

Mr. Allen's death surely diminishes the power of the Senate's conservatives. But liberals, to, may miss him, for he did impose a kind of discipline on the Senate's life. Every sponsor of a bill knew what he might have to contend with; outrageous measures were called up less often, and fewer corners cut, because Mr. Allen was there. Now other senators of both parties have learned some of his tactics—there has been ample evidence of that. But no one uses them quite as predictably or calmly or consistently. With Mr. Allen gone, there may be fewer parliamentary sieges in the Senate, but lots more guerrilla warfare. For the institution, that is not necessarily a gain.●

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I am saddened to speak today of the passing of JAMES ALLEN. The junior Senator from Alabama served the people of his State and of this Nation with great skill and an eager desire to do what he believed was right. He was an authentic power in the Senate, a master of the legislative and parliamentary processes. There is not one among us who has not seen the impact of Senator ALLEN's personality and idealism. Mr. President, we have all felt the power of his presence in the Senate, and I know that my colleagues are, as I am, grieved at his loss.

Two characteristics come to my mind when I think of Senator ALLEN. First, I knew JIM ALLEN as a Senator who was a bold, tirelessly dedicated advocate of his ideals: the kind of man who commands respect. He began his extensive record of public service in 1938, when he was first elected to the Alabama House, where he served until 1942. After World War II, he was elected to the Alabama Senate for 4 years and later served twice as Alabama's Lieutenant Governor. Throughout his career he was aggressive and tenacious in executing his duties, and always fair. We all know he gave up his law practice of 33 years in order to devote himself totally to the Senate and to the people.

The second vivid memory I have of Senator ALLEN is a very personal one. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alabama served on the Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution, which I chair. We did not always agree on legislative issues and often vigorously opposed each other on the merits of various pieces of legislation. But the important thing, I think, is that our disagreements were never personal. JIM ALLEN was a courteous, kind, and thoughtful man, and that personable character was never submerged by the political debate of the hour. I will always cherish the very personal feelings and concern for me and my family which he extended. During the period in which my family has faced serious health problems it was characteristic of JIM and Maryon ALLEN that they were consistently expressing their deepest personal concern for our well-being. I am certain that each person who knew Senator JAMES ALLEN can repeat that statement. Senator ALLEN respected everyone and conferred dignity by that respect on us all. He will be missed greatly. I would like to express for myself and my family a sense of deep personal loss to Maryon Allen in the hopes that her grief will be tempered by fond memories and a full understanding of the contributions that JIM ALLEN made to the lives of all us who were fortunate enough to know him.●

● Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, "there are very many characteristics which go to make a model civil (public) servant. Prominent among them are probity, industry, good sense, good habits, good temper, patience, order, courtesy, tact, self-reliance, manly deference to superior officers and manly consideration for inferiors * * *." These words make up a portion of the first annual message to Congress by President Chester A. Arthur, delivered December 6, 1881. They describe many of the attributes JIM ALLEN displayed as a highly influential Member of the U.S. Senate.

As one who came to the Senate in 1968 at the same time JIM ALLEN was elected, I marveled at the mastery my colleague displayed of the legislative process and of parliamentary procedure. Senator ALLEN quickly came to be the unchallenged master of Senate procedure and, over the years, was often helpful to me as he was to other Members who needed guidance on complicated parliamentary questions. His knowledge of the rules and his willingness to share this knowledge with others gained him a wide following and made him one of the most respected Members.

Mr. President, each Member of the Senate makes a contribution in a unique and special way. JIM ALLEN's special contribution was in his ability to make certain that the rights and prerogatives of Members were protected and preserved. Others might agree or disagree with the position he might have taken on a particular issue but there could be no disagreement with the basic fairness with which he approached the issues and which was so prevalent in his dealings with others. The Senate will not be the same without JIM ALLEN. This body will be seriously impoverished unless others who are endowed with the same instincts of probity, industry, good sense, good temper, courtesy, tact, and self-reliance about which President Arthur spoke and which JIM ALLEN displayed throughout his Senate career quickly come to the fore.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I wish to announce that there will be a date and hour set aside for eulogies to our late departed friend and colleague, JIM ALLEN, and all Senators on both sides of the aisle will be appropriately notified of that occasion.

I yield now to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR JOSEPH M. MONTOYA

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I stand today before my colleagues at a sad time for New Mexico and the rest of the Nation, because my former fellow Senator from New Mexico, Joseph M. Montoya, passed away this morning here in Washington, D.C., at about 9:15.

Senator Montoya was the senior Senator from our State when I began my Senate duty. He had already established an historic record of service, beginning in elective politics at 21 and becoming a great force in New Mexico politics early in life. He rose from humble beginnings and, using his ability and intelligence, became the youngest New Mexico State Senator in our history. At 42 years old, he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and was elected 7 years later, in 1964, to the U.S. Senate.

Senator Montoya presided over great advances in our State and ambitious new programs in the Senate. Remembering his own beginnings, he always had a tremendous sympathy for the underdog, for those burdened by poverty, for the disadvantaged, and for all of those who somehow failed to get their share of the good things this Nation had to offer. He was a strong spokesman for the Hispanic-American, knowing firsthand the plight of this segment of our society. He was a leader in the fight for a better education for everyone, knowing that the key to success was education. He was, above all else, a strong voice for our home State of New Mexico. Thousands upon thousands of people are now employed in our State, and in this Nation, because of Senator Montoya's farsightedness and hard work. One of his greatest achievements was a father of the Economic Development Act. Under that act, which Senator Montoya pushed so hard for, individual States and communities in this country have made real progress in improving physical facilities and employing their people.

Senator Montoya and I didn't always agree on the issues confronting us in the Senate. But, that was of little importance when it came time to work together for the State of New Mexico. He was always willing to go to bat for any program, no matter how small, when it affected New Mexico. In addition, he was generous with his counsel and his help to me was invaluable.

To his wonderful family, and especially to his wife Della, Mr. President, I wish to extend my deepest regrets. I know that for them, and for all of Senator Montoya's friends in our State and in America, this is a sad day, indeed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I know that every Member of the Senate joins me in extending sympathy to Della Montoya and to the children of former Senator and Mrs. Joseph Montoya, Joseph, Patrick, and Lynda, in their bereavement.

Joe Montoya was our friend and colleague here in the Senate for 12 years. He served in the House of Representatives before that time, in the 85th through the 88th Congresses. He spent more than 40 years in public office, serving as Lieutenant Governor and in the New Mexico State House of Representatives and Senate. He was a public man, a devoted servant of the people, and a man who was dedicated to bringing opportunity to the people of his State and his Nation.

In New Mexico, Joe Montoya is a legend. He was a poor boy who was a brilliant student and a hard worker. He was first elected to public office while he was still in college—at 21 years of age. He went on to become a great leader of the Democratic Party in New Mexico, and a great representative and Senator for all the citizens of his State. He had a deep pride in his Hispanic heritage and in his historic roots in the American Southwest. He will always serve as an inspiration to those young Hispanic-Americans who were so often in the thoughts of this good man.

Because of his deep faith in the importance of education, Joe Montoya worked long and hard to improve the Federal programs which he believed would open the doors of opportunity to young Americans, especially those who were poor or handicapped by language skills. He was a strong supporter of economic development programs, of programs to help veterans, of programs to protect the security of senior citizens. He worked hard to make himself an expert in legislation pertaining to research and development in atomic energy, and as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, he was an early advocate of energy conservation and energy resource development.

Most important of all, Joe Montoya never lost faith in the American system and the great opportunities it offered to those who were willing to participate fully in making it work. In a speech which he made on July 8, 1974, he talked about the challenge and need for young Americans to rededicate themselves to the real meaning of the American Revolution. He said,

> It is not enough that the rights of man should be written in the books of philosophers and in the hearts of good people. It is not even enough that they should be written into our Constitution or declared in speeches on the Fourth of July. Instead, it is necessary that those who claim these rights also claim the responsibility for preserving them, with God's help.

Senator Joseph Montoya did accept that responsibility, and dedicated his life to preserving those rights for the New Mexican and American people he loved so dearly. He will be long remembered, both here in the U.S. Senate and in the State of New Mexico which was his home.

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR JOSEPH M. MONTOYA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I was deeply grieved to hear of the death of one of my former colleagues, Senator Joe Montoya, earlier today. During his nearly 40 years in public life, "Little Joe," as his fellow New Mexicans called him, endeared himself to his fellow Spanish-Americans, and to the people of New Mexico.

Joe Montoya's political rise was meteoric. Elected to the New Mexico House of Representatives at the age of 21, he was 2 years later named majority floor leader. After he attained the constitutionally prescribed minimum age of 25, he was elected to the State Senate, where he shortly became the majority whip. In 1957, upon his election to the House, Joe Montoya began his 20-year career in the Congress.

CONCERN FOR CONSTITUENTS

During those 20 years, Joe gained a reputation as an able legislator, most interested in truly representing the people of his State and carefully attending to the special needs of his diverse constituency. While in the Congress, Joe stayed in touch with his constituents by making an average of two trips home per month. Senator Montoya was loved and respected by many New Mexicans, but especially by his fellow Spanish-Americans. The tribute most often repeated was that "he never forgot where he came from." In the Senate, Joe championed legislation geared to help the farmer and laborer along with the Indian and Chicana populations of his home State.

BIPARTISAN LEGISLATOR

Mr. President, I remember Joe as tough and hard-working—a bread-and-butter Senator. He was a man who never allowed political considerations to overshadow his concern for his fellow New Mexicans and his desire for real improvements in their lives. His career is a reminder that although we may disagree on specific issues, we can still work together in a bipartisan manner to hammer out solutions to our country's problems.

Mr. President, Senator Joseph Montoya will long be remembered in New Mexico, and in Washington, too. I enjoyed my years working with him, and consider it a privilege to have known him.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

(The following occurred earlier:)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the time of the two leaders has expired today, which I believe originally was to be not more than 1 hour equally divided, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business, with the understanding that there be no call of the calendar, and that that brief period extend for not more than 10 minutes, and that any Senator be permitted to speak up to 3 minutes, the period to be 12 minutes, and at the conclusion of the period the Senate resume consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, that has no effect on the standing order with respect to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am glad the Senator reminded me. He has an order to be recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the expiration of the order, or the time being yielded back, for the recognition of the two leaders, Mr. HELMS then be recognized under the order previously entered, and that there then be the aforementioned morning business period, to be followed by a resumption of the unfinished business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPECIAL ORDER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from North Carolina is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this morning I sent a letter to President Carter, respectfully expressing the hope that he will resolve the differences in interpretation between the United States and Panama before any irreversible steps are taken to ratify the Panama Canal treaties, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
June 5, 1978.

Hon. JAMES E. CARTER,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am sending to you the text of the statement which I will deliver today on the Senate Floor with regard to the proposed exchange of the instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal treaties.

The purpose of the speech is to document in detail the intention of the Senate in approving six key amendments to the resolutions of ratification of the treaties, contrasting the documented Senate intention with the interpretations placed upon those amendments by the Panamanian Foreign Ministry communique of April 25, 1978.

The Foreign Ministry's communique is Panama's official explanation of its stand on the treaties to the Panamanian people. As such, it stands as part of the public record. The Panamanian communique goes to great lengths to repudiate the Senate's work on the six key amendments—either by outright rejection, or by interpreting the amendments in a fashion contrary to the Senate's intention. It is plain that fundamental disagreements still exist between Panama and the United States.

For the sake of future harmony between the two nations, and for the sake of the security of the Canal and of our country, it is imperative that this deep division be resolved before any irreversible steps are taken leading to ratification of the treaties. In particular, I respectfully ask you to reconsider the proposed concept that calls for the immediate exchange of instruments, with the effective date postponed until March 31, 1979. Not only is that concept contrary to the intention of the Senate, but it removes the last bit of leverage over the Panamanian government, at a time when these issues are unresolved.

If, at this juncture, the United States accepts the Panamanian signature on the protocols of ratification, the implication would be that the United States also accepts Panama's interpretation of the six Senate amendments in question. Since most of the Senate sponsors of those amendments conditioned their acceptance of the whole treaties on passage of those changes, the Executive Branch has a special obligation to ensure complete acceptance of the Senate's intentions. Unless the communique is withdrawn, with written assurances that Panama understands the Senate's intentions, the only alternatives left are to ask for another plebiscite in Panama on the Senate's text, or to return the treaties to the Senate for reconsideration of Panama's interpretations.

Mr. President, you and I did not agree on the treaties, but I know that we surely agree on the need to make sure that the United States and Panama see eye-to-eye on the meaning of the treaties.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS.

PANAMA REPUDIATES SENATE CHANGES IN CANAL TREATIES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, due to the complexity of the presentation I am about to make, I ask unanimous consent that an outline of the contents be printed in the RECORD at this point, preceding the rest of my statement.

There being no objection, the outline was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUTLINE OF CONTENTS

I. The significance of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry Communique in the ratification of the treaties.

II. The Communique's rejection of six Senate changes.

A. The Nunn reservation to the Neutrality Treaty:

1. The intent of the Nunn reservation.

2. Panama's rejection of the Nunn reservation.

B. The DeConcini reservation to the Neutrality Treaty:

1. The need for a unilateral right to defend the canal.

2. Legislative history of attempts to gain unilateral defense rights for the Canal.

3. Responses to Panamanian objections.

4. The leadership amendment to the second treaty.

5. Panama's April 25 repudiation of the DeConcini amendment.

C. The Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty:

1. The ambiguity of article XIII, paragraph (4)(c).

2. Senate attempts to clarify the ambiguity.

3. Panamanian expectations in the communique.

D. The Brooke reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty:

1. The intent of the Senate in passing the Brooke reservation.

2. Panama's interpretation of the Brooke reservation.

E. The Cannon reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty:

1. Limitations on financial potential of the Panama Canal.

2. Panama's expectations under the Cannon reservation.

F. The Danforth understanding to the Panama Canal Treaty.

III. Has Panama accepted the treaties and amendments?

Appendix: Text of the Foreign Ministry Communique.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, President Carter and Gen. Omar Torrijos are making plans to exchange the instruments of ratification of the Panama Canal treaties about 10 days from now; yet Panama has put itself on public record as repudiating virtually all the substantive changes which the U.S. Senate voted to add to the treaty documents.

This repudiation took the form of a 25-page official communique issued by the Panamanian Foreign Ministry on April 25. It is a formal statement analyzing the various amendments, reservations, and understandings one by one. Although superficially addressed to the Panamanian people, it is evidently the declaration of Panama's stand on the treaties which Torrijos promised to President Carter in their exchange of letters on March 15.

Although virtually unpublicized in this country, the document was published in Spanish on April 26 in the Panamanian newspaper La Estrella De Panama. It was translated into English and published as a supplement to the Foreign Broadcast Information Service, published by the Department of Commerce, on May 1.

In the communique, Panama sharply criticizes five reservations and one understanding—the very Senate amendments which most observers have credited with winning over the additional five or six supporters which the treaties needed for approval. Panama's repudiation ranges from outright rejection to elaborate "interpretations" which are diametrically opposed to the Senate's intention in passing the amendments.

Therefore, Mr. President, even if Panama accepts the amendments by signing the protocols of ratification, Panama has put the world on notice that she accepts them only according to her own interpretation—an interpretation that virtually empties the Senate changes of any significant content. The differences between the Senate's intent, as expressed in the treaty debates, and the Panamanian interpretation is so great that the potential for disputes, acrimony, and dissension will be vastly increased by ratification of the treaties. Once Panama assumes sovereignty over the canal, the United States will either have to acquiesce in Panama's demands, or withdraw early. We will be mousetrapped.

Indeed, the communique itself speaks of further struggles, further negotiations to shorten the life of the relationship with the United States.

Ironically, Mr. President, the treaties could not have passed without the very Senate amendments which Panama now repudiates. Most of the Senate sponsors of these changes announced publicly that their support of the treaties was conditioned upon acceptance of the changes in question. Without the votes of the sponsors, there would have been five or six fewer votes for the treaties themselves. And, of course, it is a matter of record that each treaty passed with only one vote to spare.

The communique thus calls into question Panama's good faith in proposing to sign protocols of ratification when the parties are so far apart in their understanding of the obligations imposed. It places a special burden on President Carter to resolve the differences before any irrevocable steps are taken to ratify the treaties. It is a settled point of international law that the exchange of instruments of ratification is a discretionary act on the part of the President. As is well understood, Senate approval of a resolution of ratification does not constitute ratification; the exchange of instruments constitutes ratification. Even after the Senate approves its resolution, the President still may withhold ratification if, in his judgment, circumstances warrant such a grave step.

President Carter, however, is reported to be taking an additional step, one without precedent: He is said to be planning to exchange the instruments of ratification with their effective date postponed until March 31, 1979. This action, too, is contrary to the Senate's intention in approving the reservation of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE). The President's proposed action is precipitous and, as I will demonstrate in my discussion of the Brooke reservation, seems calculated to conform with Panama's interpretation, rather than with the Senate's intention.

The President's proposed action is unnecessary at this time, and deprives him of the leverage necessary to resolve the differences between the interpretation of Panama and the intention of the Senate. Nothing in the treaty or in international law requires a hasty exchange of ratifications. On the contrary, the President is supposed to judge the situation on present circumstances. Since the Senate action, the following events have occurred:

First. Immediately after the Senate approval of the Panama Canal Treaty, a coalition of the suppressed political groups in Panama stated publicly that, when they returned to power, they would reject the treaties approved by the Torrijos regime.

Second. The dictator Torrijos, in well-publicized statements issued at the same time, announced that, if the treaties had not been ratified, the National Guard was planning to sabotage the canal installations. This confirmed information which had circulated in the Senate prior to treaty approval. It demonstrates conclusively that Torrijos was negotiating in bad faith; and it decisively increases the probability that Torrijos will resort to violence in the future to undermine or destroy the treaties.

Third. The Foreign Ministry communique repudiates some of the basic conditions imposed by the Senate, and speaks of new negotiations and struggles after ratification to shorten the treaties' term. It repeats the threat of violence against the canal if Panama's desires are not fulfilled.

These conditions point to a fundamental failure of the negotiating and ratification process. They leave the President with few prudent options. President Carter can send the Senate version of the treaties back to Panama and ask for a second plebiscite to insure popular acceptance of the Senate changes. He can send the treaties back to the Senate for reconsideration with Panama's interpretations. Or he can withhold ratification until further negotiations produce a protocol of ratification which concretely rejects the disputed Panamanian interpretations. Mere formal acceptance of the Senate text is not enough as long as Panama maintains the Foreign Ministry communique as its official interpretation of the treaties for the Panamanian people.

Although no option is without its disadvantages, the worst option would be to proceed with the proposed exchange of ratifications next week between the dictator Torrijos and the President of the United States, as long as a fundamental disagreement exists in interpretation. If we accept Panama's signature under the circumstances, it means that we accept Panama's interpretation.

The communique itself outlines Panama's view of the legal status of the treaties at the present time:

We can assert that, regardless of the term used, what matters is if the condition, reservation, amendment or declaration made by one party to the other modifies or changes what has been agreed to by the plenipotentiaries. If that change has not been made, it is unquestionable that the treaty has not been ratified but, rather, that a counteroffer has been made by one party which the other is at liberty to reject, modify, or approve. Only if it approves the counteroffer is the consent or perfecting of the wish of both parties to obligate themselves realized.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the communique of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a careful reading of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry communique demonstrates conclusively that Panama has not given consent to the changes imposed by the Senate. Rather, Panama regards the Senate changes as a counteroffer which Panama is at liberty to reject, modify, or approve." Now of course, Panama is absolutely correct; Panama is at liberty to reject, modify, or approve the Senate changes. The communique constitutes Panama's own counteroffer to the counteroffer. It becomes an integral part of Panama's understanding of the terms. The President must act to remove the fundamental disagreement, to send the treaties back to the Panamanian people for a plebiscite, or to send them back to the Senate for reconsideration. Only under such conditions, to quote the Panamanian communique, "is the consent or perfecting of the wish of both parties to obligate themselves realized."

II. THE COMMUNIQUE'S REJECTION OF SIX CHANGES

The communique of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry is 25 pages long, and contains long passages which present an extraordinarily strident tone for a diplomatic instrument. Nevertheless it is an instrument which must stand as part of the official documentation of the treaties. In any interpretation of the treaties, or in any subsequent dispute over intention or meaning, the communique will stand as a pivotal document.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the communique of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, a careful reading of the document is required, because it attempts to be, on its face, an officially authorized statement by the Government explaining its stand with regard to the Senate-authorized changes. But more importantly, it is an attempt to limit the scope of the Senate changes and their juridical effect through restrictive interpretations and outright rejection of some elements of the treaty. The communique says:

With the completion of the Senate's proceedings in the United States, the Foreign Ministry, complying with orders from His Excellency President Demetrio B. Lakas and His Excellency Chief of Government Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, now undertakes to fulfill its duty of explaining to the citizenry the juridical scope of the resolutions of the Senate and setting forth its stand concerning the Senate's decision.

If Panama were in complete agreement with the actions of the Senate, there would be no need for "setting forth its stand."

The plain fact is that Panama is rejecting the Senate's significant changes precisely because they are significant. The key points rejected by Panama are as follows:

The Nunn Reservation to the Neutrality Treaty, modifying Article V so as to permit negotiations for the stationing of U.S. troops in Panama after the year 2000; Panama says, "With total emphasis, the Foreign Ministry declares that Article V cited previously has not been changed."

The DeConcini Reservation to the Neutrality Treaty authorizing U.S. troops unilaterally to enter Panama to put down a threat to the neutrality of the Canal. Although the subsequent leadership amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty merely restated long-standing U.S. policy on intervention, Panama says: "It is necessary to stress that the Senate's definition of U.S. policy in this reservation covers both treaties, which are mentioned specifically in the reservation, so that there would not be the slightest doubt that the DeConcini amendment added to the Neutrality Treaty would not continue in force."

The Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon Reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty, providing that the U.S. is not obligated to pay any outstanding balance under the annual $10 million contingency payment (Article XIII, 4, c) when the Canal is turned over in the year 2000. Administration officials testified that the contingent payment would not be included in the estimated toll base, would never be earned, and never paid. Panama states it to be her understanding that the contingent payment would be included in the toll base, would be paid in subsequent years if not earned in a particular year, and that "Paragraph 4 C is not symbolic or worthless; the two countries, in good faith, must give it practical content."

The Brooke Reservation, providing that the instruments of ratification be exchanged effectively not earlier than March 31, 1979, and the treaties not enter into force prior to October 1, 1979, unless the implementing legislation is passed earlier; Panama says that October 1, 1979, instead of being the earliest possible date, is "the deadline for the treaties' entry into force."

The Cannon Reservation that the Panama Canal Commission reimburse the U.S. Treasury for interest on investment and amortization of assets. Although all financial studies have shown that the Canal cannot generate enough revenue to make such payments, Panama says that "this reservation does not alter what was agreed upon. To the extent that the United States does not violate the principle of honoring the treaties in good faith, Panama cannot present claims to the United States.

The Danforth Understanding that toll rates need not be set at levels to cover payment of the contingency payment. Panama threatens violence if the Danforth Understanding prevails: "To the extent that the Panamanian people are satisfied with the canal administration due to the products they derive from it, they will continue protecting their canal. But if a stingy spirit prevails, aggravating the injustice suffered by Panama since 1903, then a circle of friendship will not have been built around the canal, but rather one of hatred, with possible grave consequences if a crisis occurs, which the national government would be the first to deplore."

Mr. President, the attitude of Panama on any one of these points would be enough to invalidate the agreement. I repeat that Panama has a right to reject the agreement if she so desires; but the President has no right to ratify on the basis of Panama's conditions without once more sending it back to the Senate. With Panama's understanding of the treaties now on the record, it is clear that these are not the treaties which the Senate approved. Either the Panamanian people must agree to the Senate version by plebiscite, or the U.S. Senate must agree to the version of the Panamanian Foreign Ministry.

As already pointed out, the communique is a carefully premeditated statement by Panama's legal experts, issued only after authorization by the President and the head of state of Panama. These contradictions cannot be allowed to stand without resolution, or the future operation of the canal and our continuing relationship with Panama will be placed in grave jeopardy. The issue is important enough to analyze each of the affected Senate amendments, the legislative history, and the context of Panama's objections.

A. THE NUNN RESERVATION TO THE NEUTRALITY TREATY

The Nunn reservation was passed by the Senate on March 15, 1978, by a vote of 82 to 16, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Neutrality Treaty. The substantive portion reads as follows:

Nothing in this Treaty shall preclude Panama and the United States from making, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, any agreement or arrangement between the two countries to facilitate their performance at any time after December 31, 1999, of their responsibilities to maintain the regime of neutrality established in the Treaty, including agreements or arrangements for the stationing of any United States military forces or maintenance of defense sites after that date in the Republic of Panama and the United States may deem necessary or appropriate.

The Nunn reservation was deemed necessary because of article V of the Neutrality Treaty, which reads as follows:

ARTICLE V

After the termination of the Panama Canal Treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the Canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory.

On its face, article V prohibits the stationing of any military forces not maintained by Panama; obviously that would include U.S. military forces as well. Although the Neutrality Treaty is of permanent duration—that is, in perpetuity—the treaty would have to be renegotiated and reratified to enable the United States to maintain military forces in Panama, even if the Panamanian Government so desired. The Nunn reservation would avoid that uncertain and unsettling process, allowing a mere government-to-government agreement. As such, it was a considerable softening of the ironclad language of article V.

1. THE INTENT OF THE NUNN RESERVATION

The Nunn reservation was regarded as a significant change, both by its sponsors and by the treaty floor managers. On March 14, Senator NUNN said:

I have sought to strengthen the treaties through amendment. As I stated last November, I could not support the treaties as originally submitted to the Senate last November. The Treaties' vague and equivocal language concerning U.S. defense rights beyond the year 1999 and the priority passage of U.S. vessels in times of emergency would have laid the foundation for conflicting interpretations. . . .

Accordingly, I join many of my colleagues in cosponsoring the amendments of Senators Byrd and Baker. . . .

I am also dissatisfied with article V of the Neutrality Treaty, which prohibits the United States from retaining any military installations in Panama beyond the year 1999. In my view, a small but select U.S. military presence in Panama beyond 1999 would be highly desirable for both of our nations and for all who use the canal. . . .

Accordingly, I have sponsored a change in the treaties specifying that the United States and Panama in the future, could, by mutual consent begin negotiations for an extension of a U.S. military presence in the Canal Zone beyond the year 1999. I have been assured by both the leadership of the Senate and the executive branch that this significant change is now acceptable. . . .

On March 15, the distinguished assistant treaty manager, Mr. SARBANES, responded in kind:

The reservation he has offered does provide the opportunity that would be to some extent closed under the existing language of the treaty because then to accomplish this objective you would have to have actual amendments to this treaty or a new treaty; whereas, the reservation which the Senator from Georgia has offered would make it possible to act by mutual agreement other than a treaty arrangement.

On the basis that it was a significant change, many Senators voted to approve the treaty.

Indeed, the Nunn reservation was cosponsored by many Senators who had expressed doubts about the treaty, as well as by some who strongly favored the treaty. The sponsors with Senator NUNN were Senators BELLMON, DECONCINI, BROOKE, TALMADGE, HEINZ, RANDOLPH, CHILES, JACKSON, ZORINSKY, and BAYH. Senator NUNN said:

I think the American people are clearly concerned over the total U.S. military pullout mandated by the Neutrality Treaty. I believe that the vast majority of Americans who are aware of this treaty and have studied this treaty want changes which would grant both the United States and Panama greater flexibility on this issue. . . . So to me, Mr. President, this is a very important improvement.

I certainly think this amendment is in the best interests of the relationship between the United States and Panama, and it eliminates a part of my problem with the treaty.

Similarly, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) said:

I think the Senator has made a great improvement in this treaty. I commend him for offering this amendment. I think that it is a definite improvement over the Panama Canal Treaty, because I share with my colleague the view that before the year 2000, if the working relationship between the U.S. Government and the Panamanian Government is such as we hope and expect, they may desire to have a future military presence on the part of the U.S. Government in the Canal Zone . . .

Senator HEINZ, after reading a portion of an amendment he had intended to offer himself, said:

The language I just read the Senator comes from my own reservation I had intended to propose. I think the Senator's reservation accomplishes precisely the same goal and, as the Senator well knows, I support his reservation.

Clearly, the Senate was not just going through an exercise; the Senate thought it was doing something important.

2. NECESSITY FOR PANAMA TO ACCEPT THE NUNN RESERVATION

In the light of Panama's rejection of the proposition that article V was modified by the Nunn reservation, it is important to note in the legislative history that the Senate held extensive debate concluding that the treaty could not be ratified unless Panama accepted the Nunn reservation. Both opponents and proponents of the treaties were in complete agreement on this point: The instruments and ratification cannot be exchanged unless Panama agrees to the Nunn reservation—and of course, by implication, with any and all reservations. The exchange began with Senator DOLE on March 15:

Mr. DOLE. I guess the question is, what if the Senator approves the ratification and Panama rejects? What if the Senate wants to establish this treaty and the Panamanian people refuse to conclude a protocol and the change called for in this reservation, would the ratification of the treaty thereby be vitiated?

Mr. NUNN. The Senator from Georgia stated very clearly that legally, as the reservation itself expressed, unless Panama agreed to this reservation the instruments of ratification of the treaty would not be exchanged. This reservation also specified that it has to be done by the conclusion of a protocol of exchange to be signed by the authorized representatives of both governments. So, the Senator from Georgia understands that unless the reservation is accepted by the Government of Panama, there will be no treaty . . . If the floor manager has any different interpretation, I certainly think he should make it known now because that is my understanding.

Mr. SARBANES. No; I do not differ with the response which the able Senator from Georgia has given. . . . The language of the reservation makes it clear that this is a condition precedent to the exchange of the instruments of ratification, and therefore is a prior condition that has to be met before you can proceed to the conclusion of the treaty arrangement between the two nations.

The reservation, incidentally, as was indicated in yesterday's debate, does have binding effect and therefore it is a matter of consequence.

Mr. DOLE. Will the protocol come back to the Senate for debate and approval? How is that handled?

Mr. SARBANES. No, the protocol of exchange would not come back to the Senate. But the condition we have attached is that the instruments of ratification shall not be exchanged except upon the conclusion of such a protocol of exchange which shall include, among other things, the reservation offered here by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from Maryland pointed out, the Senate does not have another chance to act upon the protocol of exchange, a situation that makes the present situation extremely delicate. What is the Senate to do if the President of the United States ignores the objections and conditions officially raised by Panama, yet he goes ahead with the protocol of exchange anyway? The language of the protocol might contain a superficial acceptance of the Nunn reservation or any other of the reservations; yet Panama has already put forward her understanding of those reservations, an understanding which differs remarkably from what the Senate agreed to. Because the Senate will not have a chance to examine the protocol of exchange, the President is morally bound to send the treaties themselves back to the Senate for further debate. If there is no true agreement, then the protocol of ratification should not be signed, as pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), who began the following exchange:

Mr. KENNEDY. If I could have the attention of both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Maryland, is it my understanding that, if Panama does not accept this reservation, the treaty itself will fail?

Mr. NUNN. As I understand it, the execution of this protocol of exchange which would contain this reservation is a condition precedent to the effectiveness of the treaty.

Mr. KENNEDY. And that is the understanding of the Senator from Maryland as well?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I am now quoting from Charles G. Fenwick, International Law:

"Since the signature of a treaty represents a meeting of minds of the several parties upon specific provisions involving reciprocal obligations, any changes or amendments inserted by one party as a condition of ratification must be accepted by the other party if the treaty is to come into legal effect.

"I ought to point out that ever since 1922, the technique which the Senate has used to alter the legal effect of provisions contained in a treaty, in exercising its advise-and-consent function, or the primary technique, has been through amendments to the articles of ratification as reflected in reservations. Those, of course, then have to be agreed to, or accepted by the other party to the treaty if, in fact, there is to be a treaty."

Mr. President, this colloquy can leave no doubt in any person's mind that there must be a true meeting of minds, if a treaty is to have binding effect. I cannot believe that a single one of my distinguished colleagues would disagree with that point, no matter what their position on the treaties themselves. If Panama officially rejects the Senate's interpretation of the treaties, and then signs the protocol of exchange with the United States, then it means by implication that the United States accepts the Panamanian interpretation, and we are bound thereby.

3. PANAMA'S REJECTION OF THE NUNN RESERVATION

If the Nunn reservation does not change the scope of article V, then no reservation can be said to have any effect upon any treaty. The whole nature of a reservation is to make a substantive change. The fact that a reservation is an amendment to the resolution of ratification and is to be incorporated into the protocol of exchange, rather than into the article V itself does not change its practical effect. Therefore, the judgment of the Foreign Ministry's communique on the Nunn reservation can be considered as nothing other than a rejection of the effect of the reservation:

With total emphasis, the Foreign Ministry declares that Article V cited previously has not been changed.

The communique goes on to add the following cryptic note:

All states have the power to negotiate without limitations except those imposed by the UN Charter.

But negotiation is not the issue in the Nunn reservation; the issue is whether article V permits agreements for U.S. troops to remain in Panama after 1999 without negotiation of new treaties. If article V does not permit such nontreaty agreements, then we could face a serious confrontation on an issue which is of prime importance to the Senate, an issue which, indeed, could have defeated the treaties. If Panama does not accept the Nunn reservation as a substance change in article V, there should be no treaty.

Panama's reaction is particularly disturbing, because it runs contrary to the information given to the Senate as to Panama's attitude. The Senate had been led to believe that the Nunn reservation was consistent with the negotiations and our understanding of Panama's attitude. Even the Senate leadership was under that impression, as was evident in the following exchange on March 15:

Mr. KENNEDY. May I ask the Senator, again the floor manager, whether there has been any indication from the Panamanian Government as to the acceptability of this particular reservation?

Mr. SARBANES. I would have to say to the Senator in response to that question that we have no definitive indication.

Mr. KENNEDY. But it is the Senator's position that this reservation is completely consistent with the other provisions of the treaty and with the understandings and negotiations which have taken place between the United States and Panama?

Mr. SARBANES. I respond to that in the affirmative. . . ."

Mr. KENNEDY. In the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, it is very clear that the purpose is to maintain the regime of neutrality established in the treaties. Those words have great weight in terms of establishing both the purpose and tone of this reservation.

As I understand from the debate yesterday and from the statements today, that is the purpose of this reservation. Without this particular reservation, without other treaty arrangements—even with the agreement of the Panamanian Government and the United States—this treaty would preclude the opportunity for joint agreement to U.S. military presence for the purpose of maintaining the neutrality of the canal. This is really the purpose and the focus of this reservation.

Do I understand the Senator from Georgia correctly?

Mr. NUNN. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct.

The Nunn reservation imposes no additional burden upon Panama. However, it significantly alters the effect of article V to permit an exception to article V in the future, if both parties agree. For the Panamanian Government now to declare "with total emphasis" that article V "has not been changed" is to make a mockery of the Senate's proceedings. Indeed, it is more than that; it is a repudiation of the reservation itself.

B. THE DECONCINI RESERVATION TO THE NEUTRALITY TREATY

Mr. President, the DeConcini reservation No. 83 was passed by the Senate on March 16 by a vote of 86 to 13, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Neutrality Treaty. The substantive portion of it was as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article V or any other provision of the Treaty, if the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall each independently take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

Although this reservation is entirely consistent with the purposes of the Neutrality Treaty and the responsibilities of the United States under that treaty, the amendment made explicit a point that was before only implicit. Panama chose to take offense at the Senate's action and the Senate's debate, and the partisans of Panama felt it necessary to sponsor a so-called "leadership amendment" to the Panama Canal Treaty restating U.S. policy.

The Senate passed the "leadership amendment" to the Panama Canal Treaty on April 18, by a vote of 73 to 27. Cosponsored by the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BYRD, the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BAKER, and by Senators DECONCINI, CHURCH, SARBANES, SPARKMAN, JAVITS, LEAHY, and GRAVEL, the substantive portion read as follows:

Pursuant to its adherence to the principle of nonintervention, any action taken by the United States of America in the exercise of its rights to assure that the Panama Canal shall remain open, neutral, secure, and accessible, pursuant to the provisions of this Treaty and of the Neutrality Treaty and the resolutions of advise and consent thereto, shall be only for the purpose of assuring that the canal shall remain open, neutral, secure, and accessible, and shall not have as its purpose nor be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama or interference with its political independence or sovereign integrity.

There is, on the surface, no conflict between the language of the two reservations. Both are limited solely to actions designed to open the canal or to keep it open, pursuant to the regime of neutrality with both nations are pledged to maintain. The scope of the DeConcini resolution is limited to actions taken "to reopen the canal or restore the operations of the canal." Although the DeConcini reservation authorizes the United States to "take such steps as it deems necessary," the authority thereby granted is not unlimited, but rather is strictly constrained by the stated purpose; namely, "to reopen the canal or restore the operations of the canal."

Indeed, if anything, the leadership amendment to the second treaty goes beyond anything the DeConcini reservation threatened, for it goes beyond the question of keeping the canal "open" and adds three new substantive grounds for action; namely, keeping the canal "neutral," "secure," and "accessible." It is thus far more wide-ranging in offering motives for action, gives a far broader range for interpretation of any given set of circumstances affecting the canal's operations, and offers a blank check for anything the United States may wish to do. For if the logic of the leadership amendment is examined closely, its plain meaning is that both parties have agreed in advance that any U.S. action, including intervention in Panama's internal affairs, shall not be interpreted as "intervention" so long as such intervention has as its purpose keeping the canal open, neutral, secure, and accessible.

Thus the leadership amendment to the second treaty in no way cancels or amends the original DeConcini reservation. Although it appears to offer a legal fiction to redefine intervention as "nonintervention," it does nothing to make the DeConcini reservation inoperative in any way. And, especially, it leaves intact something to the legal status of any action, including military action, that the United States may wish to take in the future for the purpose of keeping the canal open.

It leaves intact the DeConcini reservation's use of the word "independently." The DeConcini reservation says that the United States and Panama "shall each independently take such steps as it deems necessary." On this key word hinges the right of the United States to take unilateral action to fulfill our responsibilities under the treaties. Without that word, our security rights with regard to the canal are worthless. Without that word, the withholding of consent by Panama is sufficient to make any action we take illegal.

The administration constantly maintained that the right of independent action was implicit in the treaties. When doubts arose, the administration maintained that the right of independent action was implicit in the so-called "leadership amendments" to the first treaty. When the argument of implicitness was still not enough to secure the last two or three votes needed for approval, the administration permitted the distinguished Senator from Arizona to use the word "independently" in his reservation, thus making explicit at last the central issue in the defense arrangements.

It is, therefore, vital that Panama accept the DeConcini reservation for there to be a meaningful agreement on central treaty issues. But Panama insists that the DeConcini reservation is somehow canceled by the reservation made to the second treaty. The Panamanian Foreign Ministry communique states flatly:

> It is necessary to stress that the Senate's definition of U.S. policy in this reservation covers both treaties, which are mentioned specifically in the reservation, so that there would not be the slightest doubt that the DeConcini amendment added to the Neutrality Treaty would not continue in force.

If the President of the United States does not uphold the full force and effect of the DeConcini reservation for "independent" U.S. action to maintain the neutrality of the canal, then he will be breaking the very commitment upon which the treaty structures were approved by the Senate.

1. THE NEED FOR A UNILATERAL RIGHT TO DEFEND THE CANAL

The central issue with regard to U.S. defense rights in the Panama Canal treaties is the question of the unilateral right to defend the canal. From the very beginning, the negotiators were faced with a basic contradiction: The key issue for Panama was the reversion of the sovereign rights exercised by the United States; the key issue for the United States was the right to defend the canal unilaterally.

The difference in size, stability, and military power between the two nations was the practical problem that made solutions difficult. Even Panama had to admit that she did not have the capability to defend the canal, nor could Panama be given the capability. Yet the unilateral right to exercise military force is the most fundamental of sovereign rights. Despite the fine structures of international law and multilateral treaties, no nation is truly independent, that is truly free from conquest, unless it has the power to defend itself without recourse to another, or has an unshakeable ally to protect its independence. But what happens if the only feasible ally is the very nation that nationalistic pressures claim to be the oppressor?

International law holds that each nation has the right to make decisions over all internal affairs without outside interference, and that no other nation has a right to violate its territorial integrity. This is summed up in the doctrine of sovereignty, that is, the exercise of supreme power or dominion over a defined territory.

Although the doctrine of sovereignty had its origins in the theory of the medieval monarchy, which considered all power to rest in the person of a living sovereign, the concept of the sovereignty of nations did not develop until the late 18th century began to transfer the actual power from the living monarch to representational government, with power theoretically flowing from the people. The doctrine of sovereignty held that it was immoral and unlawful to interfere with the will of the people.

However, the theory of inviolate sovereignty was first applied to nations with republican and/or democratic structures. The extension of inviolate sovereignty to despotisms of various sorts, or to situations of anarchy, was honored more in the breach than in the observance. Even today, the notion that the sovereignty of despotic countries may not be violated has not really been accepted by the mass of the American people. Despite the sophistication of opinion makers and establishment leaders, who would like to pretend that all nations should be treated as equals, many, if not most Americans doubt the wisdom of scrupulous observance of the dictates of sovereignty when it comes to Communist regimes or "tin horn dictators" whose power is based on force. They reason that if sovereignty is based upon the will of the people, how can we respect the sovereignty of nations where the will of the people has been suppressed?

The U.S. negotiators chose, for political reasons, to sidestep the issue of sovereignty in the Canal Zone. Apparently, they made a decision that it would be easier to begin negotiating from the premise that the United States did not hold sovereignty in the Canal Zone. By denying that the United States had ever held sovereignty, the negotiators apparently thought that it would be easier to sell the finished treaties to the American people, and easier to come to practical terms with the Panamanians.

The negotiators failed on both counts. The prestigious poll taken by Opinion Research Corp., of Princeton, N.J., showed that half-way through the treaty debates, 72 percent of the American people still opposed giving up ownership and control of the Panama Canal. Even other polls, which purported to show a shift of opinion, admitted that any such shift turned on the issue of adequate defense. When the question of adequate defense was put to the people by Opinion Research, it was found that acceptance of adequate defense turned upon whether the United States would have the unilateral right to defend the canal.

As for coming to terms with the Panamanians, the negotiators never solved the central problem of unilateral defense. The original drafts signed by the President were deemed to be unacceptable by the Senate leadership, because of the ambiguities of our defense rights. Not even a clarifying statement issued jointly by the President of the United States and the Panamanian dictator was deemed sufficient; the leadership insisted that the statement be incorporated into the treaties as amendments if two-thirds of the Senators were to be won over to support. As a desperate move to secure the final two or three votes needed, the Senate leadership agreed to the DeConcini reservation, giving both nations the right to act independently.

But apparently, this is precisely what the Panamanians still refuse to accept as part of the treaty instruments. If President Carter accepts the Panamanian understanding that the DeConcini reservation does not continue in force, by his act of signing the protocol of exchange, then he will have made a major concession that was not in the mind of the Senate.

What the negotiators have done by sidestepping the issue of sovereignty is to continue the fatal ambiguity of the 1903 treaty. For many experts far more competent in the field of international law than I have concluded that the 1903 treaty conveys the substance of sovereignty, the attributes of sovereignty, indeed, the total exercise of sovereignty. By the same treaty, Panama surrendered the same substance, the same attributes, the same exercise of sovereignty. It is a reasonable conclusion of law that sovereignty was conveyed; but the treaty is unique in that it is silent on the crucial point.

During our years of construction and operation, the United States possessed a position of strength. If sovereignty is the exercise of supreme power in a defined territory, then the United States exercised full sovereignty. Panama complained, but she had no position either in law or in power to complain. The United States never once acknowledged that Panama possessed sovereignty concurrently with the United States; even the notion of residual sovereignty meant only the claim of Panama to reassume sovereignty if we ever gave it up.

Despite Panama's complaints, the creation of the Canal Zone set up the only practical solution to the exercise of military power by the United States without being subordinated to Panama. So long as Panama did not exercise sovereignty within the Canal Zone, Panama could not object in law to any action that the United States took in defense of the zone. It set up a defined territory where the United States had freedom of action.

In the beginning, when Panama was first independent, the United States undertook to be guarantor of Panama's independence. Indeed, this was a condition demanded by Panama; it was not popular in the United States. The United States had further extraterritorial rights outside of the Canal Zone, rights (such as sanitation) that in fact conferred great benefits on Panama. As the doctrine of nonintervention grew, however, the United States, in deference to Panama's wishes, receded from any extraterritorial rights. We agreed that we had no right to act within Panama's territory without Panama's permission. In practice, however, the Canal Zone was treated by both countries as U.S. territory.

Thus, in 1947, the United States and Panama had negotiated a defense treaty that allowed the United States to keep a number of World War II military bases outside of the Canal Zone and within Panamanian territory. When the treaty was put to the National Assembly for ratification, organized mobs, provoked according to the U.S. State Department by Communist agents, filled the galleries and surrounded the building, threatening death to any deputy who voted to ratify. The agreement was defeated.

However, even though the United States felt that Panama had reneged on a defense commitment in the 1936 treaty, and even though the United States felt that the rejection was made by duress and did not represent the will of the Panamanian nation, all U.S. troops then in the territory of Panama were withdrawn in a matter of hours. They were withdrawn precisely because of the respect of the United States for the sovereignty of Panama.

The logic of sovereignty is inescapable. A nation has the right to determine its internal and external affairs without outside interference. The movement of foreign troops within its territory is an internal affair, even when regulated by treaty. The interpretation of treaties, particularly as the treaties affect its own territory, is also an internal affair. Because of the inviolability of sovereignty under international law, no outside nation can assert its foreign interpretation of such treaties in contravention of the sovereign's interpretation.

Thus, even if we believe that Panama has violated the Panama Canal treaties, even if we believe that Panama has violated the regime of neutrality, we have no right to use military force to remove what we interpret to be a violation. Once we surrender the exercise of sovereign rights, we must act only in concert with the new sovereign, or we face checkmate. Our only legal alternative is mediation, conciliation, arbitration; but Panama is not obliged to accept the results of any of those processes.

So long as the United States exercises sovereign powers in the Canal Zone, Panama has no legal right to object to our actions in that territory. Conversely, once Panama exercises sovereign powers in that territory, we have no legal right to object. The logical box is airtight.

That is why it was important, in my judgment, for the United States to maintain that the 1903 treaty was a cession of sovereignty en bloc, as well as a transfer of territory. Without the successful assertion of such rights, we would have no ground for the successful operation and defense of the canal.

Similarly, once the negotiators began with the premise that sovereignty was to be conceded to Panama, the United States shifted to a position of weakness. The best that could be hoped for was an explicit concession by Panama to the United States of the unilateral right to defend the canal. This, in itself, would be a dubious base for defense, because it would be a concurrent assertion of sovereignty by two different nations over the same territory. It involves a fundamental contradiction, even if the primary sovereign accedes to such a concession by the treaty. The primary sovereign would still have a right to renounce the treaty, or to contest an action under the treaty. The only advantage of the United States is one of pragmatism: The United States could act first in an emergency, and then sort out the legal consequences later.

Such a concession must be explicit, rather than implicit. If it is merely implicit, there is no agreement in law. Anglo-Saxon legal traditions are inclined to supply meaning to the law to make it work, if explicit sanction is missing; but Latin American legal traditions, based on code law, presume exactly the opposite rule of interpretation. If agreements are not spelled out exactly, the courts cannot supply a solution, no matter how logical in the implications of the language. When different cultural traditions govern the same negotiators, a collision is inevitable.

The method the negotiators chose was to carefully avoid making any explicit recognition of a unilateral right of defense. The rights of both nations were stated in parallel form, as though both would always operate concurrently and cooperatively. The treaties simply omitted considerations governing the operation of these rights if it should happen that they would be exercised in opposition to each other. The negotiators apparently hoped that such disagreements would never arise; or perhaps they simply allowed for the legal effect of the doctrine of sovereignty, namely, that the will of Panama would supersede the rights of the United States.

The proponents of the treaties constantly interpreted the parallel rights language of the treaties as a unilateral right; but they assiduously opposed any attempt to have unilateral rights written into the text. The desperate acceptance of "independently" in the DeConcini reservation, however, smoked out Panamanian discontent over any legal commitment to U.S. unilateral rights.

2. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF UNILATERAL DEFENSE RIGHTS

The struggle over the question of unilateral U.S. defense rights for the canal began in 1975. Up until that time, the Department of Defense had insisted upon the retention of a Canal Zone under the new treaty that would leave the United States with a defined territory of jurisdiction, if not sovereignty, similar to other overseas bases. The State Department negotiators insisted, however, that Panama would never accept such a concept. Instead the State Department began negotiating with the Department of Defense and the National Security Council, developing the notion of "combined defense" of the canal, in which United States and Panamanian forces would work cooperatively in all aspects of defense, with the zone itself being dismantled into operational units.

The then Deputy Secretary of Defense, Mr. William P. Clements, Jr., was delegated to go to Panama to discuss this with Torrijos. Mr. Clements testified before the Armed Services Committee on February 1, 1978, as follows:

In September of 1975, General Brown and I went to Panama and spent 2 days there and met with General Torrijos and his staff. Assistant Secretary of State Rogers went with us and we had a thorough, ongoing discussion while we were there, as you can imagine. We were joined by the President of Panama, President Lakas, and also by the U.S. Ambassador to Panama, Mr. Bill Jordan.

This was a fruitful trip in the spirit that we impressed upon Mr. Torrijos that the singlemost thing in any treaty negotiation had to be the security of the canal and as it affected our national security and our strategy on a worldwide basis.

General Torrijos understood this; he agreed that the security aspects of this had to be clear, and that the rest of the treaty could be accommodated to this basic building block.

Subsequently, a security clause acceptable to the Pentagon was evolved. The Department of Defense attorneys helped significantly in this. Ben Forman was the drafter of that particular clause. It was processed through the Interagency Group, including the State Department and the NSC staff at the White House, and that particular clause was included in the then existing draft of the treaty.

I would like to insert in the record that particular clause that was included, and I will read it to the committee:

"In the event of any threat to the neutrality of the Canal, the Parties shall consult concerning joint and individual efforts to secure respect for the Canal's neutrality and security through diplomacy, conciliation, mediation, arbitration, the International Court of Justice, or other peaceful means. If such efforts would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, each Party shall take such other diplomatic, economic or military measures as it deems necessary in accordance with its constitutional processes."

Mr. President, the first sentence in the Clements clause is merely a face-saving device; the real operative part is the last sentence. It is both prospective and retrospective; that is, it covers either threats which have occurred or which could occur. It is not limited to peaceful methods of conciliation, which obviously would be too time consuming in a crisis. If such methods "would be inadequate" then each Party can take such steps—and the operative phrase is "military measures"—"as it deems necessary."

Thus without using the word "unilateral" the clause would have given unilateral rights. In the questioning which followed, I asked Mr. Clements the following:

Mr. HELMS. Does that clause . . . give the United States the unilateral right to intervene in Panama to protect the Canal?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, sir, I was told by the legal counsel of the State Department and by our counsel in the Department of Defense, that this clause, 'it deems necessary,' it, referring to the United States, gave us all the rights that we needed. That gives us that unilateral right.

Mr. HELMS. Now, General Torrijos was in agreement with this at that time; is that correct?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, sir, he was

Nevertheless, when the treaties were finally unveiled by President Carter last September, the Clements language, with the right of unilateral action, was missing. In its place was a vague, general statement, based upon the parallel rights theory. Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty read as follows:

ARTICLE IV

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties.

The general consternation created by this weak statement was so great, even among treaty proponents, that President Carter and General Torrijos, when they met in Washington on October 14, 1977, were forced to issue a joint statement to clarify, or perhaps amplify, article IV. However, the statement was not a signed agreement. Suspicions about the efficacy of the statement—apart from its content—led to a demand that the statement be made a part of the treaty. This suspicions were heightened when the State Department steadfastly rejected every suggestion that the statement be included in the treaty.

Nevertheless, concern over U.S. defense rights remained so high that the Foreign Relations Committee, despite an almost solid front of treaty support, voted to put the language in the treaty. But Panamanian sensitivities were already high on the defense issue, already indicating that there was no meeting of minds on the most crucial issue. The committee voted to include the language as a new title, a move which raised an uproar from Panama. The new title gave entirely too much prominence to the U.S. defense rights; the committee thereupon reversed itself and broke the statement in two parts, attaching them as "interpretations" to articles IV and VI. The committee report tells the story:

The Committe had originaly voted to include the Joint Statement in a single amendment which would have added as a new article IX to the treaty. Upon being advised by the State Department—contrary to previous advise—that this placement could require a new Panamanian plebiscite, the Committee voted to reconsider the proposed article IX and voted instead to recommend the addition of that same material in two parts, to articles IV and VI. This did not represent a "flip-flop" . . . The difference is purely one of cosmetics. If a negligible change in form, with no change whatsoever in substance, could obviate the need for a new plebiscite—an eventuality which could complicate vastly the ratification process—then the Committee concluded that it could happily oblige.

The committee did not explain why no new plebiscite would be needed in Panama as a result of the change; it merely stated that "the Committee is informed by the Department of State that the Government of the Republic of Panama has concluded that no new plebiscite will be required for the approval of the two amendments." Although neither the joint statement nor the two amendments appeared on the ballots used in the plebiscite, the joint statement did appear in the newspapers, and was read by General Torrijos to the people of Panama on live television 3 days before the plebiscite. "It thus is clear that the Panamanian people were fully apprised of the Joint Statement prior to the plebiscite, and were accorded a full opportunity to consider its provisions before approving the treaties."

That position, of course, is a nonsequitur. The Panamanian peopple might very well have considered the joint statement as just so much rhetoric, and not legally binding. They might have been able to accept the joint statement as meaningless grist for the political mill in the United States, so long as it did not appear as an integral part of the treaty. Indeed, it is a fair conclusion that the Government of Panama also feared another plebiscite on the joint statement, because of its sensitivity to the unilateral defense rights question. That fact that the Government of Panama would take the unprecedented step of requesting the Foreign Relations Committee to submit a lower profile for the amendments indicates how anxious Panama was to avoid testing the feelings of the Panamanian people on this issue.

When the amendment is read carefully, however, it does not explicitly spell out unilateral defense rights, it merely elaborates on the parallel rights concept, making no provisions for resolution of a conflict between the rights of the two parties. Moreover, it goes beyond the exposition of parallel rights to deny, explicity, interference in the internal affairs of Panama. Since everything within Panama's territory is an internal affair, including disputed treaty interpretations, the rights of Panama are thus made paramount. That is a correct interpretation of international law; but it does not give the United States the unilateral rights of defense that, from a practical point, is absolutely necessary for the security of the canal.

Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

The language of the amendment says that each party had the right to defend the canal against "any threat." But if the United States perceives the threat to be the Government of Panama, then the amendment means that the United States has the right to use force against Panama, which reduces the treaty to absurdity. Astonishingly, the committee report boldly asserts that the United States has such a right, in language more provocative than anything later spoken on the Senate floor. The report says:

It allows the United States to introduce its armed forces into Panama whenever and however the Canal is threatened. Whether such a threat exists is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its own constitutional processes. What steps are necessary to defend the Canal is for the United States to determine on its own in accordance with its constitutional processes. The United States has the right to act if it deems proper against any threat to the Canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or non-military. Those rights enter into force on the effective date of the treaty. They do not terminate.

This statement is sheer nonsense, because any treaty is subject to the rule of sovereignty. Unless there is a total cession of sovereignty to another nation, every concession of a treaty is subject to the continuing will of the sovereign nation, and that nation's interpretation of the treaty. The committee argues that:

The prohibitions set forth in the second paragraph do not derogate from the rights conferred in the first. The Joint Statement recognizes that the use of Panamanian territory might be required to defend the Canal. But that use would be for the sole purpose of defending the Canal—it would be purely incidental to the Canal's defense; it would be strictly a means to that end, rather than an end in itself; and it would not be carried out for the purpose of taking Panamanian territory. The concepts of the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama are, in short, an integral part of the treaty. . . .

The committee's rationalizations simply set forth the committee's interpretation of hypothetical actions; but under the doctrine of sovereignty, it is Panama's interpretations that would be controlling. Panama need not, indeed, could not, accept the interpretation of the United States regarding military actions on Panamanian territory, particularly if those actions interfered, even temporarily, with the acts of the Panamanian Government. The poverty of the committee's argument is demonstrated by the assertion that the concepts of the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama are an integral part of the treaty, yet on the very same page, the committee sweeps away its own statement by saying:

Finally, even if a conflict were somehow to arise between the two paragraphs, because the United States has the right to act against "any . . . threat directed against the Canal", there is no question that the first would prevail. The rights conferred therein are stated in absolute terms and must be construed as controlling.

In one breath the committee asserts that Panama's integrity is an integral part of the treaty, yet in the next breath Panama's integrity cannot prevail against U.S. intervention. At the very beginning of the canal debate, the committee thus attempted to assert a right of armed intervention far more absolute than any statement made on the floor; it is all the more shocking because the assertion is not in the least supported by a fair reading of the text, or by basic principles of equity and international law.

When the debate on this amendment, amendment No. 20, began, the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BYRD, was far more temperate in his assertions, and far less absolute. Yet he once more interpreted the contradictions of the joint statement as guaranteeing to the United States "unilateral" defense rights. He stated on March 9:

It is also clear from this amendment that the United States has the right to act on its own, if need be, to protect the Canal. This amendment states that each country shall, in accordance with its constitutional processes, defend the Canal, and shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat.

This language is definitive; it is specific; it is clear. It does not state and it does not imply that the two countries must consult, or that they must act in concert, or that one country has veto power over the actions of the other.

It is to be hoped and anticipated that the two countries will, indeed, act on a cooperative basis, with consultation and concerted action. I believe that the approval of these treaties will increase the likelihood of cooperation between the United States and Panama. So while cooperation is possible and desirable, this amendment does not preclude unilateral action.

The statement of the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BAKER, also seized on the amendment as a guarantee of unilateral rights for the United States:

The treaty must be amended to provide the guarantee that the United States may, by the words of the treaty, unilaterally act to insure that the Panama Canal remains both secure and open. By this amendment to the treaty . . . it becomes the explicit position of the United States and Panama that the United States may act to meet any threat to the regime of neutrality whether it originates from without or within Panama. It should be clearly understood that a Panamanian decision to deny use of the Canal to any nation constitutes as much a threat to the regime of neutrality as would an invasion of Cuban troops.

By this amendment we admittedly are guarding against the worst scenario we could envision—one in which we would be forced to take action to keep the canal secure and open in the face of an action or even a failure to act by the Government of Panama.

In an attempt to make explicit the very concerns raised by the distinguished majority and minority leaders, I offered as a substitute to their amendment the language developed by former Deputy Secretary Clements, language agreed to by Torrijos, but which explicitly gave each nation power to act as it saw fit. Only by some such language as Mr. Clements devised, could the treaty make clear that the United States had a unilateral right of defense.

The purpose of offering the Clements language as a substitute was to draw the issue clearly between what rights we would have by law under the treaty, and what rights we would have by our interpretation only. The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the speeches of the distinguished majority and minority leaders all emphasized that the United States would have the rights of unilateral action. Yet the text itself did not specify that each nation could take the steps which it deemed necessary. The silence of both the leadership amendments and the treaty itself on the right of unilateral action leaves our rights to be governed only by the context, namely, the context of Panama's sovereignty.

The fundamental problem is that the United States apparently wants to appear to be giving back all sovereign rights to Panama, but, at the same time, keep some of the rights of sovereignty by subterfuge. The use of force within a specified territory is an exercise of sovereignty. Such force can only be used with the consent of the sovereign. If that consent is not expressed specifically in a treaty or other agreement, then the consent cannot be presumed. The fact that a treaty permits the United States to take some defense actions within the territory of another sovereign does not permit us to take any action, particularly when the treaty contains clauses preserving the ultimate sovereign rights of the nation. Such an interpretation would be contrary to international law and to other international agreements that we have signed.

In particular, as I pointed out in defense of my proposed substitute, such an interpretation would be contrary to the U.N. Charter, to the Rio Pact, and to the Charter of the Organization of American States. Insofar as we recognize the sovereign equality of all nations we must bow to the treaty interpretations of other nations when the use of force within their territory is involved. The U.N. Charter is very specific:

ARTICLE 2

The Organization and its Members . . . shall act in accordance with the following principles.

1. The Organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its Members.

3. All Members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security . . . are not endangered.

4. All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

In the Senate debate on March 10, I pointed out that the phraseology of article 2, paragraph 4 was incorporated in the leadership amendment—a fact which made the committee report's language that our right of intervention was absolute even more incredible. Should any dispute arise over whether U.S. military actions in Panama were directed toward maintaining neutrality or toward interfering with Panamanian internal affairs, the United States is bound to refrain "from the threat or use of force."

Moreover, article 103 of the U.N. Charter, the so-called "supremacy clause," provides that:

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

Thus, clearly, any dispute arising out of interpretation of the canal treaties is subject to the rules of the U.N. Charter. We cannot unilaterally assert our interpretation of treaty rights, particularly by using force. We cannot use force in the territory of Panama and maintain that the force is not directed against the territorial integrity of Panama if Panama is objecting to that use of force. We cannot even maintain that the treaties permit us to use force to keep the canal neutral in the face of Panamanian objections.

The U.N. Charter authorizes the use of force only in one situation, described in article 51; namely, for—

The inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations.

By no stretch of the imagination could we justify the use of force in Panamanian territory as the inherent right of self-defense. Nor could it be considered "collective" self-defense if the territory being attacked; namely, Panama, objected.

But these objections would be mitigated if the treaty specifically spelled out unilateral defense rights for the United States. Specific language would be equivalent to advance permission for such action as we thought necessary. It would amount to the reservation of a specific sovereign right at the time of the general transfer of sovereignty. It is true that Panama could still seek to renounce the treaty, or could protest a specific exercise of the defense right. But Panama could not assert that the right had not been given.

The Senate in its wisdom rejected the substitute, with its specific language, and adopted the leadership amendment, with its evasive language. Perhaps the mood was that we should not test the will of the Panamanians on a matter which went directly to the heart of the transfer of sovereignty; perhaps some of my colleagues preferred to sidestep the issue in the hope that it would never have to be confronted in practical terms, trusting to the generosity of the treaties to provide a basis for a firm cooperative partnership with Panama. Others, perhaps, trusted in the committee report's optimism that sheer naked force would override Panama's sovereignty should a crisis arise.

One Senator, however, who was not satisfied was the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Mr. DECONCINI. On March 16, he stated on the Senate floor:

For the last 3 months, I have argued that the treaties as drafted did not appear to contain sufficient safeguards for the United States . . . Until recently I believed that it would be possible for the Senate to make some constructive amendments to the treaty that would satisfy the needs of Panama—but not at the sole expense of the American people. However, as every member of this Chamber knows, the administration was unwilling to accept the slightest changes in the text of the agreement.

Because of this recalcitrance, I suspect that a number of potential supporters of the treaty were lost. . . . When it became clear that no amendments except the so-called leadership amendments would be accepted, I began to search for alternatives that would accomplish the desired objectives.

The major problem that bothered the distinguished Senator was the problem of unilateral U.S. defense rights. His concerns were expressed when he introduced his reservation:

The purpose of this amendment is quite simple, Mr. President. It is designed to establish a precondition to American acceptance of the Neutrality Treaty. That precondition states that regardless of the reason and regardless of what any other provision of the Neutrality Treaty might say or what interpretation it might be subject to, if the Panama Canal is closed, the United States has the right to enter Panama, using whatever means are necessary, to reopen the Canal. There are no conditions, no exceptions, and no limitations on this right. By the terms of the amendment, the United States interprets when such a need exists, and exercises its own judgment as to the means necessary to insure that the Canal remains open and accessible.

The Senator's explanation is considerably more moderate than the assertions in the committee report with reference to the leadership amendment. He was, however, expressing a very strong sentiment of the American people, going beyond any interpretation that could be supported by the text of his own amendment. He expressed his concerns very pointedly:

I have been . . . bothered by the possibility that internal Panamanian activities might also be a threat to the waterway, should we give it up. Labor unrest and strikes; the actions of an unfriendly government; political riots or upheavals—each of these alone or in combination might cause a closure of the Canal.

The distinguished Senator's analysis was exactly right. He had put his finger upon the contradiction in the administration's position in trying to distinguish between the internal affairs of Panama and threats to the neutrality of the canal. The administration failed to face the very real possibility that there might be no distinction between the two.

Moreover, the Senator from Arizona also put his finger upon the crucial issue that had been sidestepped:

The amendment contains a very specific reference to the use of military force in Panama. I believe these words are absolutely crucial because they establish the American right—which I am not convinced is adequately provided for either in the body of the treaty or the leadership amendment—to take military action if the case so warrants. It further makes it clear that the United States can take military action on Panamanian soil without the consent of the Panamanian Government.

The question of consent is also crucial. Since the main thrust of this amendment is directed toward situations in which the Canal is closed because of internal difficulties in Panama—difficulties like a general strike, a political uprising, or other similar events, the consent of the Panamanians to take action would not make sense. If America is to have any rights at all under this treaty, it must have the right to act independently to protect the Canal and to keep it open.

In other words, the DeConcini reservation made explicit what was only implicit before. In accepting the DeConcini reservation, the distinguished floor manager of the treaty, Mr. CHURCH, sought to minimize the scope which the Senator from Arizona had claimed by reading the language in a very restricted fashion; but he also repeated the interpretation that the leadership amendment already gave the United States the right of unilateral military action:

Now, Mr. President, this reservation restricts the use of American military force, should that ever be necessary in the future, to two purposes: The reservation clearly reads "If the canal is closed or its operations are interfered with."

In either of those two cases, Mr. President, the regime of neutrality, the objective of keeping the Canal open, neutral, accessible, and safe obviously would be thwarted.

When the leadership amendment to the treaty was adopted, the United States reserved the right to act unilaterally, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and consequently, to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

Any interference with the operation of the Canal, any stoppage, any closure, would clearly prevent the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal and clearly contradict the regime of neutrality to which both the United States and Panama are committed.

Therefore, this reservation must be considered, in my view, in part as a restatement, in part as an elaboration of the amendment already adopted by the Senate to Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty.

As such, it is acceptable and I hope that the Senate will adopt it.

Despite the attempts of the distinguished Senator from Idaho to limit the force of the amendment, his repeated use of the adverb "clearly" did not solve the basic contradiction. The circumstances surrounding the use of military force are seldom "clearly" manifested to parties on both sides of a dispute. His admission that the DeConcini reservation was an "elaboration" of the leadership amendment is a telling admission indeed; for the first time the "unilateral" rights which had existed in self-serving interpretation only, now existed in black and white. The reaction of the Panamanians was already beginning to demonstrate that Panama did not agree with the granting of unilateral defense rights to the United States at all. It was beginning to become evident that the negotiators' handiwork was fatally flawed from the beginning.

3. RESPONSE TO PANAMANIAN OBJECTIONS

As early as March 16, the day on which the DeConcini reservation was passed, newspaper reports began to circulate that the Panamanians strongly objected to it. Even before the debate on the DeConcini reservation began, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, Mr. GRIFFIN, raised the issue:

Mr. President, I was interested to learn of a report this morning by CBS Radio—and television, I take it, about the fact that the Ambassador of Panama called at the White House on yesterday and let the President and Secretary Vance know that General Torrijos is extremely upset over Senate additions to the treaties, as I understand the report.

I also understand, on the basis of the report that the President called General Torrijos on yesterday and attempted to calm him down and to assure him that, really, what the Senate was doing here was not making any significant changes in the treaty.

I can only read between the lines, Mr President, but I suspect that the concern is not only about what the Senate already has done but also what the Senate may be about to do this afternoon. I refer, in particular, to an amendment to be offered by the Senator from Arizona, (Mr. DeCONCINI). . . .

This, of course, would fly in the face of the Panamanian interpretation of the Neutrality Treaty, which is that the United States cannot come in with military forces to defend the neutrality of the Canal unless it is with the permission of the Republic of Panama.

The public press reports now are that President Carter—I do not know if it is true or not—has agreed to go along with this amendment by the Senator from Arizona, which obviously would be a significant change in the treaty as it has been interpreted and understood in Panama.

I would think that, in light of the situation in the Senate, it would not be unreasonable to ask the White House to inform the Senate if it is true, as reported by CBS, that General Torrijos and top Panamanian officials have expressed their outrage about the action taken in the Senate and about to be taken today, and whether such an exchange of views took place on yesterday. Also, how about informing the Senate, so that we can intelligently decide our responsibility?

Unfortunately, the profound warning of the distinguished Senator from Michigan was not heeded. No reply whatsoever was given to the Senator. The DeConcini reservation was proposed and accepted, and the Neutrality Treaty itself was approved as though all were well. The Senate had no warning from the leadership or from the administration that Senator GRIFFIN's perception was correct, and that the reservation was "a significant change in the treaty as it has been interpreted and understood in Panama."

Had that information been officially delivered to the Senate, or at least officially confirmed, the DeConcini reservation might have failed, and with it the approval of the Neutrality Treaty itself. Senators of opposite philosophical persuasions might have changed their votes on one or the other, judging by their reactions. Treaty approval had come and gone on March 16, without a hint of trouble ahead.

It was only on March 17, the day after approval of the Neutrality Treaty, that evidence of Panamanian discontent was produced. In a long colloquy between Senators ALLEN and GRIFFIN, sharp criticism of the withholding of the letters developed:

Mr. GRIFFIN. However, a matter that disturbs this Senator very much relates to an exchange, within the last 48 hours, of telephone calls and an exchange of letters between the President and General Torrijos relating to the reservations that were being considered in the Senate. I find now by reading the morning papers—not from any information provided by the White House—that a letter was received at the White House yesterday from General Torrijos, apparently sent in response to a letter sent by President Carter to General Torrijos on Wednesday, and that these letters pertain directly to the matter under discussion in the Senate. Despite the fact that this Senator, early in the debate on yesterday, following a CBS report by Phil Jones, called upon the White House to provide us with a report as to previous telephone conversations and the letter sent by President Carter, no information was provided to the Senate.

I find it rather disturbing that the exchange of letters between the two heads of Government was not made available to the Senate yesterday before the vote. I do not know precisely what was in the letters. In the news reports this morning I find strong indications that the President apparently was seeking to assure the Panamanians that the reservations and amendments being adopted in the Senate are meaningless and will not change the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the Senator talking about the amendments to the resolution of ratification?

Mr. GRIFFIN. And certain reservations, particularly the one offered by Senator DeConcini.

Mr. ALLEN. In other words, agreeing to something here that he was assuring Torrijos did not mean anything, is that right?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Obviously, until we see the letters, it is difficult to say what is in them . . . But there is every reason to be concerned that while Senators were being assured, on the one hand, that their amendments were meaningful in order to get their vote, there were assurances being given to the Panamanians or General Torrijos that the same amendments would not change anything.

As the debate continued, more and more Senators became involved. The distinguished minority leader, Mr. BAKER, joined in the call for the letters to be produced. Shortly thereafter, the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BYRD, came to the floor, and while he was engaged in colloquy, a messenger handed him copies of the Carter-Torrijos exchange. With all due allowances made for the rhetorical flourishes of diplomatic correspondence, the letters confirmed the attempt to down play the meaning of the Senate alterations in the treaty.

Under date of March 15, the day before the DeConcini reservation was accepted, President Carter wrote:

In the Senate debate, we have fortunately been able to prevent any amendments to the Treaty other than the so-called "Leadership" amendments to Articles IV and VI. These incorporate exactly the terms of the Statement of Understanding published after our conversation of October 14.

In considering its Resolution of Ratification of the Treaty, the Senate will almost certainly attach a number of reservations, conditions or understandings reflecting certain of its concerns. We have made every effort and have been successful to date in ensuring that these will be consistent with the general purposes of our two countries as parties to the Treaty. I hope you will examine them in this light.

When one considers that the executive branch and the legislative branch are two coordinate branches of the U.S. Government, the President's letter to Torrijos is a demeaning instrument, expressing contempt for the constitutional obligations of the Senate. It contains the bold assertion that the Presidency controls the actions of the Senate, and is able to vitiate any actions not conformable with the Presidential will. Whether that actually happened or not, it is astonishing for a President to boast in such manner to another head of state, with the strong implication that he has rendered the Constitution meaningless.

The substance of the telephone conversations has never come to light. Yet some hint of the representations which the President made to Torrijos is contained in Torrijos' letter of reply. He wrote, under the same date of March 15:

In your letter and conversation you informed me that the Senate will introduce some reservations, but that they will not alter nor detract from the content of what was agreed upon in the Neutrality Treaty and in our Declaration of October 14, 1977. In this respect, I wish to inform you that the Government of Panama will proceed to study carefully these reservations and will take its position once the Senate has voted on both Treaties. The situation is thus because in the plebiscite held in Panama the Panamanian people voted for the two Treaties together and not in separate form.

I do wish, nonetheless, to point out that such a study will be based on the following concepts: For Panama any reservation would be unacceptable which blemished our national dignity, which altered or changed the objectives of the Treaty or which were directed at hindering the effective exercise of Panamanian sovereignty over all of its territory, the transfer of the Canal, and military withdrawal on December 31, 1999. For that reason, I received with great gratitude your words that these objectives will absolutely not be changed by means of amendments or reservations. This reaffirms my estimate concerning the great morality and honesty which characterizes you as a political leader and as a person.

The Panamanian people would not accept words, misplaced commas, or ambiguous sentences which had as their objective, or which might signify, occupation in perpetuity disguised as neutrality or intervention in their internal affairs.

Of course, this contains Torrijos' version of the conversation, but the White House issued the letter voluntarily, and without comment. The assertions of Torrijos were never denied.

What did Torrijos assert to be his understanding of the promise to him of President Carter?

First. He asserted that the President had promised him that there would be no substantive changes in the treaties.

Second. He asserted the President had promised him that Panama's "objectives will absolutely not be changed by means of amendments or reservations," that is, any such amendments or changes would be meaningless.

Third. He stated that Panama would not accept an amendment that permitted "occupation" in the disguise of neutrality—a veiled reference to the DeConcini reservation.

Fourth. He stated that Panama would "take its position" as to whether any amendments were "unacceptable" after both treaties had been voted on.

The threat to refuse to accept the DeConcini reservation was thus manifest even before it was voted on. The threat that Panama would not accept any substantive changes was stated bluntly before the treaty was voted on. In short, Torrijos, as dictator of Panama, was refusing to accept the constitutional processes of a democracy. It is quite clear under our system of government that the Nation is not committed to the final draft of treaties, and that the Senate has the right and the responsibility to make such changes as it sees to be in the interests of the Nation. Torrijos was negotiating in bad faith if he did not accept the principles of our democratic form of government. The many references to his dictatorship during the Senate debate were perfectly proper. The implied threats of a dictator, indeed, had a derogatory effect on the democratic process in the United States. It is unfortunate that the President saw fit to conform to the habits of a dictatorship.

Finally, the threat that a study would be made of the "acceptability" of the Senate's work would be made when both treaties had been voted on was carried out; the Foreign Ministry communique is, of course, the result.

4. THE LEADERSHIP AMENDMENT TO THE SECOND TREATY

Despite the assurances which the President gave to Torrijos, dissatisfaction continued to increase in Panama, according to numerous news reports. Then, on March 28, the Panamanian Ambassador to the United Nations sent a letter from Torrijos to the heads of state of all U.N. members. In a letter to the U.N. Secretary General, the Ambassador, Jorge E. Illueca, explained why the letter had been sent:

General Torrijos's letter and the documents enclosed make reference to the vote which took place on 16 March 1978 at the United States Senate on the Resolution of Ratification of the Treaty concerning the Permanent Neutrality of the Panama Canal. In this resolution, approval to the ratification was granted subject to a number of amendments, conditions, reservations and understandings, inserting among them a precondition to American acceptance of the Neutrality Treaty, known as the "DeConcini Amendment."

According to its proponent, the "DeConcini Amendment" is intended to give the United States of America the unilateral and perpetual right to "take military action on Panamanian soil without the consent of the Panamanian Government," pretending that said amendment must be construed to permit the United States to intervene in Panama in the event of labour unrest strikes, a slowdown, or under any other pretext labeled as interference with Canal operations. . . .

Not only does the amendment make no reference to the regime of neutrality, but, as stated by Senator Edward Kennedy, who opposed the DeConcini Amendment, "Panama had waited 75 years since its independence to end American occupation of its heartland. I must wait another 22 years before it achieves full control over its national territory." Now Panama is asked, in Kennedy's words, "to accept an amendment which has the ring of military interventionism—not just during this century, but for all time."

The Panamanian action shocked supporters of the Treaty, with its pointed adoption of the views of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Kennedy. The amendment had not faced serious opposition; in fact, Senator KENNEDY's views were not even presented on the floor, but were printed in the RECORD under the "bullet" rule. Yet the Panamanian statement came close to repudiating the Senate action.

By the time of the Senate's Easter recess, Panamanian criticism had escalated to minicrisis proportions. The pro-Panama media in this country took up the cry, and began to deliver savage attacks upon the motives of the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Meanwhile, informal negotiations resumed with the Panamanian regime in an attempt to find a formula that would mollify Panamanian objections. Former Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs William Rogers made a special trip to Panama to discuss possible solutions. In Washington, the team seeking a solution was led by the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BYRD.

The problem, of course, was that the Panamanians were demanding more than could be resolved by logic. The U.S. negotiators had hoped to squeeze through by a carefully constructed semantic ambiguity, which would not concretely resolve the issue of unilateral defense. Apparently they hoped that the text would be vague enough so that the dictator could assert to the Panamanian people that they were receiving full sovereignty, but that actually would leave to the United States a toehold to violate that sovereignty if circumstances should develop where military force was absolutely necessary. The strategy was to get over the ratification hurdle by enveloping the contradiction in semantic doubletalk. When the Senator from Arizona quite properly called their hand by demanding that the contradiction be resolved, the deception was unmasked.

Senator DECONCINI was puzzled that the storm of controversy arose over his action, and he had good reason. On April 18, he told the Senate:

What puzzles me, Mr. President, is that suddenly the public debate has focused on whether it is appropriate for the United States to retain the right to keep the canal open regardless of the reasons that may lead to its closure. Frankly, I believed that there was no disagreement in principle on this point. I believed that it was accepted by the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate leadership. It has come as quite a shock to me that this is apparently not the case.

Let me be more specific, Mr. President. On February 3, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee ordered its report on the Panama Canal treaties to be printed and distributed to Members of the Senate to aid them in their consideration of the treaties. Since only Senator Griffin dissented from the report and appended minority views, I must assume—as I believe all of us assumed—that the rest of the Foreign Relations Committee agreed with the report.

As it turns out, Mr. President, a number of Senators who are fairly senior members of that committee have publicly raised serious questions about the principle behind the DeConcini amendment. The reason why this is perplexing, Mr. President, is that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report on the treaties endorsed that principle. . . . The Foreign Relations Committee . . . asserts broader rights than were asserted in the DeConcini amendment. In other words, the Foreign Relations Committee report goes beyond the rights asserted by my simple clarification.

Of course, the distinguished Senator was exactly right. I have already pointed out the sweeping and absolutist claims made by the Foreign Relations Committee for the leadership amendment, claims that pointedly asserted the supremacy of U.S. unilateral defense rights over Panamanian internal affairs and territorial integrity.

Senator DECONCINI went on:

I know there is nothing in my reservation that goes beyond the words of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I believe those words reflect the intent of the Congress. My only quarrel today as well as in the past has been what I perceive as ambiguity in the drafting of the leadership amendment. The Foreign Relations Committee report believes that the leadership amendment accomplishes the stated objectives; I do not. However, I assert no new right, but neither will I accept any changes in those words that derogate from the rights we have clearly established in our action on the Neutrality Treaty.

The Senator's final words set the tone for the debate on the "solution" to the problem of Panamanian discontent. The issue was whether the new leadership amendment derogated or changed the original DeConcini reservation or not. In proposing the new amendment, the distinguished majority leader, however, carefully avoided coming down on this point; he merely made the record that the amendment had been cleared with the Panamanian dictator.

The final text of the amendment represents a consensus which developed out of those discussions with the many Senators on both sides of the aisle.

On this Sunday, the past Sunday, together with the distinguished floor managers of the treaties, Mr. Sarbanes and Mr. Church, met with the Panamanian Ambassador, Mr. Gabriel Lewis, in the company of Warren Christopher, the Deputy Under Secretary of State, and showed to the Panamanian Ambassador the proposed text of the amendment.

Following our discussion, Ambassador Lewis relayed the contents of the proposed amendment to his government. Later in the day, Mr. Sarbanes and Mr. Church, and I were informed through the State Department that the Panamanian Government considered the amendment to be a "dignified solution to a difficult problem."

Nevertheless, proponents of the new leadership amendment, were very careful to maintain that it did not diminish or limit the DeConcini reservation, as the following exchange between Senator JAVITS and Senator LAXALT makes clear:

Mr. LAXALT. Is the Senator saying to all of us then that the effect of this reservation is to diminish the effect of the DeConcini reservation?

Mr. JAVITS. Not at all. On the contrary, it is to lay down the ground rules by which it should be used, and which are the only ground rules that are practicable for a nation like our own.

What concerned me about the original DeConcini reservation is that it was susceptible to abuse, and this, the ground rules here laid down, it seems to me, removes that danger.

Mr. LAXALT. To the extent then this is a limiting factor, a moderating factor, certainly at least to that extent then it has to diminish the thrust of the DeConcini amendment or do I misunderstand the observations of the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator does misunderstand my observations. It diminishes nothing. It increases our stature, but it diminishes absolutely nothing about what the purpose of the agreement between Carter and Torrijos, which was incorporated in the previous treaty, was intended to attain, and that is, under any circumstances, even if it means stepping upon the territory of Panama, under any circumstances, even if it means guerrillas or organized troops who are operating out of Panama, we have the obligation to keep that canal open, neutral, accessible and secure.

Thus, the distinguished Senator from New York makes clear his understanding that the United States has the power to send troops to Panama, even if it means fighting guerrillas or organized troops, and that the new leadership amendment does not abridge that right in any way.

Similarly, an exchange between the distinguished floor manager, Mr. CHURCH, and the distinguished Senator from Utah, Mr. HATCH, nailed down the fact that the new leadership amendment did not in any way undo the DeConcini reservation.

Mr. HATCH. Does this reservation mean that the United States may not use military force to defend the Canal?

Mr. CHURCH. No.

Mr. HATCH. Does the United States have the unilateral right, pursuant to this reservation, to send troops to keep the canal open under this reservation, or must the Panamanians agree to such sending of troops?

Mr. CHURCH. Each country, under the treaty, has the obligation to keep the canal open and, in accordance with the terms of the leadership amendments as well as the terms of the pending reservation, that choice can be made by each government.

Mr. HATCH. Can it be made unilaterally is my question; and can we, without Panama's permission, send in the troops?

Mr. CHURCH. I think I answered the question.

Mr. HATCH. Specifically, I think I interpret your answer to be that we can.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HATCH. If the Canal were to be closed and the Panamanians were to be opposed to an effort to send in the troops, would this amendment prevent us from sending such troops?

Mr. CHURCH. This reservation does not undo the previous action of the Senate.

Mr. President, this statement, by the distinguished floor manager of the treaties, the statement that "this reservation does not undo the previous action of the Senate," is critical to our present inquiry. It demonstrates without any doubt that the new leadership amendment, to the second treaty, did not in any way cancel or undo the DeConcini reservation to the Neutrality Treaty. It shows the clear understanding of the Senate that the United States must have the unilateral right to defend the canal.

Moreover, that interpretation is not merely the understanding of the Senate itself; it is also the understanding of the President of the United States. In a letter to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. BROOKE, under date of April 17, the President said:

It is abundantly clear, therefore, that the United States can, under the Neutrality Treaty, take whatever actions are necessary to defend the Canal from any threat regardless of its source.

The correlative part of the Memorandum of Understanding, embodied in the leadership amendment to the Neutrality Treaty, makes it quite clear that action of this character must be confined to the stated objective alone, and that it will not be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of Panama.

In this letter, the President manfully adheres to the basic contradiction imposed upon him by the circumstances, a contradiction which demands that any intervention in the internal affairs of Panama will not be interpreted as intervention in the internal affairs of Panama, if those internal affairs happen to be the threat to the neutrality of the canal. The President seems to be saying that, if we do intervene to protect the canal, such intervention "will not be interpreted as a right of intervention." In other words, we will take the action, but we will not interpret it as our right.

Nevertheless, the phrase "from any threat regardless of its source" is new language for the President, language as sweeping as the absolutist language of the Foreign Relations Committee report. Logic dictates that "any threat regardless of its source" includes the notion that the Panamanian Government, or lack of government, could itself be the threat. The DeConcini reservation still lives.

5. PANAMA'S APRIL 25, REPUDIATION OF THE DECONCINI AMENDMENT

It can be seen from the legislative history that the DeConcini reservation was important to the U.S. Senate's approval of the Neutrality Treaty, a treaty whose ratification is linked legally to the approval of the Panama Canal Treaty as well. Moreover, it is also clear that approval of the Panama Canal Treaty was fundamentally based upon the concept of unilateral U.S. defense rights for the canal, the very point which the DeConcini reservation made explicit.

Moreover, there was very little disagreement between opponents and proponents of the treaties on this point. Both accepted the fundamental principle of unilateral defense rights; the debate concerned whether or not these rights were properly protected by the treaties and the accompanying reservations. It is unquestionably clear that neither treaty would have been approved if there had been any doubt that the treaties gave us unilateral defense rights.

Moreover, no one reading the legislative history can claim that the DeConcini reservation was in any way modified, cancelled, repudiated, or superseded by the new leadership amendment. When the DeConcini reservation was first passed, the speech of the distinguished Senator from Arizona made clear that he considered it to cover only threats to the canal, not Panama's internal affairs. The distinguished floor leader made the same point.

The new leadership amendment merely restated what was already in the treaties, without resolving the issue of what happens when Panama's internal affairs become the threat to the canal's operations. However, the implication of the language of the new leadership amendment, and the legislative history quoted earlier, show conclusively that the United States believes that it has a right to move in to protect the canal from any threat, without Panama's consent.

Any attempt by Panama, therefore, to repudiate the DeConcini amendment, to minimize it, or to reject its force therefore strikes a blow to the heart of the understanding which the Senate believed to exist between Panama and the United States. Yet this is what Panama said in the Foreign Ministry's communique:

This is what has commonly been called the DeConcini reservation. Obviously its scope departed from the Torrijos-Carter declaration because it eliminated the obligation of the United States not to interfere in the internal affairs of Panama and to respect the political independence and territorial integrity of Panama.

As abominable as the DeConcini reservation were the baseless explanations of the same senator, who seeks to revive U.S. intervention in the internal affairs of Panama. Fortunately, the Senate approved the 18 April resolution . . . which reaffirms respect for the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of the countries of America. . . .

With this last Senate resolution, it is evident that the United States has reaffirmed its international commitments in light of the UN and OAS charters. With it the DeConcini reservation has been rid of its imperialistic and interventionist claws, and the enforcement of the principle of nonintervention has been reestablished.

Panama experienced moments of patriotic indignation following the introduction of the so-called DeConcini reservation. Via diplomatic channels the national government firmly expressed its rejection of that amendment as something harmful not only to U.S. relations with Panama but its relations with the entire continent. President Carter and the Senate leaders quickly understood this. The Senate then pointed out that a major tenet of U.S. policy is its adherence to the principle of nonintervention. And this adherence also pertains to the neutrality treaty which is of an indefinite duration. It is necessary to stress that the Senate's definition of U.S. policy in this reservation covers both treaties, which are mentioned specifically in the reservation, so that there would not be the slightest doubt that the DeConcini amendment added to the neutrality treaty would not continue in force. What continues in force are the legal commitments of the United States to the UN and OAS charters that forbid intervention.

The Foreign Ministry communique says explicitly that "the national government firmly expressed its rejection of that amendment." It states the firm belief that the addition of the new leadership amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty impacted retroactively on the Neutrality Treaty, so that there would not be the slightest doubt that the DeConcini amendment "would not continue in force."

Mr. President, the record shows conclusively that the Government of Panama does not accept the condition added to the Neutrality Treaty by the Senate, a condition that was added as a means of obtaining passage of the resolution of ratification. Moreover, this condition merely made explicit a principle that all factions in the treaty debates agreed to, namely, the right of unilateral military action against any threat to the canal, even if that threat arose from the internal affairs of Panama itself. Neither the DeConcini reservation itself, nor any Senator in the debate demanded a right of intervention per se; but the whole Senate did demand the right to act to protect the Canal against any threat. In rejecting the DeConcini reservation, Panama has rejected the foundation upon which the treaty structure was built.

C. THE HOLLINGS-HEINZ-BELLMON RESERVATION TO THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon reservation was passed by the Senate on April 17 by a vote of 90 to 2, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty. The substantive portion reads as follows:

Any accumulated unpaid balance under paragraph 4(c) of Article XIII at the termination of the Treaty shall be payable only to the extent of any operating surplus in the last year of the Treaty's duration, and that nothing in that paragraph may be construed as obligating the United States of America to pay after the date of the termination of the Treaty any such unpaid balance which shall have accrued before such date."

Paragraph 4 of Article XIII of the Treaty reads as follows:

4. The Republic of Panama shall receive, in addition, from the Panama Canal Commission a just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal, in accordance with the following:"

Subparagraph (c) reads as follows:

(c) An annual amount of up to ten million United States dollars ($10,000,000) per year, to be paid out of Canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts paid pursuant to this Treaty. In the event Canal operating revenues in any year do not produce a surplus sufficient to cover this payment, the unpaid balance shall be paid from operating surpluses in future years in a manner to be mutually agreed.

The terms of the treaty, then, provide that, in addition to other payments, the United States shall pay to Panama an amount of up to $10 million out of any surplus available; moreover an obligation remains to pay in succeeding years any part of such a sum not paid in the year it was due. The problem emerges at the end of 1999, when the canal is turned over. What happens to the accumulated "rollover" of payments which were not made if a surplus was never or seldom earned? Conceivably, there could be an outstanding obligation of as much as $220 million in 1999.

The interpretation of this part of the treaty is complicated by paragraph 1 of article XIII:

Upon termination of this Treaty, the Republic of Panama shall assume total responsibility for the management, operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal, which shall be turned over in operating condition and free of liens and debts, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

The issue therefore is whether the phrase "free of liens and debts" includes the treaty obligations under article XIII (4)(c). A reasonable argument can be made that article XIII(4)(c) is an obligation of the United States, and not of the Panama Canal Commission; and that, furthermore, (4)(c) clearly says that payment in any year is due only to the extent that "revenues exceed expenditures." The implication is that if no surplus is earned by 1999, no payment is ever due.

On the other hand, an equally reasonable argument can be made that any accumulated unpaid balance is an obligation that must be paid under paragraph 1 of article XIII. The very fact that paragraph (4)(c) was included in the treaty suggests that the United States expected to pay something under its provisions, and Panama expected to receive something.

Yet the testimony of administration officials made it very clear that the United States never expected to pay anything under this provision of the treaty, an attitude which has angered the Panamanians.

1. THE AMBIGUITY OF ARTICLE XIII, PARAGRAPH (4)(C)

The problem with article XIII, paragraph (4)(c) is not so much the legal ambiguity itself, but the contrast in expectations. When Gov. H. R. Parfitt, Governor of the Canal Zone and President of the Panama Canal Company, testified before the Armed Services Committee, he pointed out that all the economic assumptions excluded the $10 million contingency payment from their calculations. He was questioned by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. McINTYRE.

Senator McINTYRE. Governor, it is my understanding that our Government is of the opinion that the $10 million contingent payment is not to be included in the toll base, and you mentioned this in your statement, correct?

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, sir.

Senator McINTYRE. Further, I understand that the Panamanians expect this payment; is this true?

Governor PARFITT. As recently as Sunday I was advised to this effect by several Senators who were visiting with the Panamanian Government.

Senator McINTYRE. How would you suggest this problem be resolved? I understand that Torrijos or somebody down there is saying that if they don't get the $10 million by the year 2000, they will expect 22 times $10 million, or $220 million in payment. Do you know of this?

Governor PARFITT. I think that alludes to the fact that the treaty does say in any given year to the extent you don't pay the surplus it rolls over to the next year, and he is assuming then at the year 2000 it no longer rolls over, it is then paid off. It has been our negotiator's position that since the treaty says these funds will be paid to the extent earned, and if they aren't earned they are not a liability of the U.S. Government and they would not be paid.

Senator McINTYRE. It is obvious from your testimony today that you do not feel that if the $10 million contingency payment is not included in the toll base, it will be very unlikely that we will have a $10 million surplus running around.

Governor PARFITT. I feel very definitely if it is not included in the toll base, it will not be generally earned.

The gap between expectation and reality will thus be affected by manipulation of the toll base. If the Panamanians are expecting the toll rates to be set high enough to earn a surplus, then there will be a feeling of betrayal and of being cheated if the United States deliberately sets the rates at a level where no surplus will be earned.

Moreover, there is the additional problem of defining what a surplus is. Accountants have ways of manipulating balance sheets so that a surplus can disappear with slight of hand. The study prepared by American Management Systems, Inc., for the Armed Services Committee, took pains to point this out:

What constitutes a surplus? Under the treaty, the Commission is required to pay as much as $10 million per year to Panama, to the extent that such monies can be paid out of surplus. During implementation, specific agreements are needed to define exactly what constitutes a surplus. Some of the points that should be covered include:

Precise definition of how much depreciation is allowed as an expense. Any increase in current depreciation rates is likely to become controversial.

Determination as to whether and under what conditions previous year deficits can be applied against subsequent surpluses. . . .

Determination as to whether to permit temporary toll surcharges (for additional capital expenditures or for covering deficits) which do not enter the surplus calculation. Such a device appears likely to cause controversy.

Such devices, even though legitimate in accounting practice, are all likely to increase the danger of frustrated expectation, a feeling that the United States was not negotiating in good faith when the treaties were written.

The contention of the administration was that no ambiguity existed, and that the United States incurred no liability if a surplus were never earned. At the hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Mr. GLENN, raised the point with Ambassador Bunker. Senator GLENN asked:

In the event there is a balance owing at the end of the year 1999, what will be the obligation of the United States to pay that balance?

Ambassador BUNKER. No. There will be no obligation after the treaty expires, Senator.

Senator GLENN. There will be no obligation.

Ambassador BUNKER. No.

However, the difference between the Panamanian perception of the impact of article XIII, paragraph (4)(c), and the U.S. perception was underlined in a statement made by Panama's Economics and Planning Minister, Dr. Nicholas Barletta, in San Francisco. Superficially, his answer to a question from the audience at a Commonwealth Club meeting would appear to agree with the position of Ambassador Bunker; but clearly, his expectations were different. Dr. Barletta said:

If there is an accumulated deficit by the time the treaty ends, in 1999, that's it, the U.S. is not committed to make it up if such amount has not been able to be collected from the revenues of the canal operation. We do not hope in our interpretation of this clause of the treaty, that the U.S. is committed to pay any such deficit that might have accumulated. However, I would like to say, that, in our estimation, the revenues of the Canal and all the projections and studies that have been made should be able to cover this second $10 million that should come to Panama if revenues permit, so I don't forsee much of a problem in respect to deficit.

Dr. Barletta's statement that "all the projections and studies that have been made" support his estimate that there will be sufficient surplus earned can only be based on economic fantasy. Indeed, none of the consultants hired by the U.S. Government, or by Congress, suggest that the $10 million can be regularly earned. Governor Parfitt, who directs the day-to-day operations of the Panama Canal Company, is the one man in the world who is most intimately acquainted with canal finance. His expectations, based on realism rather than on politics, have already been quoted in his exchange with Senator McINTYRE. In response to further questioning by Senator BARTLETT, he went even further.

Senator BARTLETT. I believe you told Senator McIntyre that the Canal Commission would expect to set its toll revenue to meet its cost and that if this contingent payment was not included in the plan for setting tolls, there would be little surplus to pay the Panamanians since the Commission is not a profitmaking organization.

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, sir.

Senator BARTLETT. So what we would have here is a situation in which we have promised to pay the Panamanians out of any surplus which the Commission earns, but the Commission is not expected to have any surplus.

Governor PARFITT. Under a situation which we now forecast, which is one of ever-increasing demand for additional tolls, we would not be generating surpluses, at least in very significant amounts.

Senator BARTLETT. And if we include the contingency payment in the estimate of operating costs, we increase the chance of the Canal Commission running into debt, and we have said to the Panamanians that we will turn the canal over to them free of debt.

Governor PARFITT. That is correct, sir.

However, the intent of the Department of State and of the administration generally is most clearly shown in the draft implementing legislation submitted to Congress in response to earnest requests from both treaty supporters and opponents. As was carefully pointed out in an analysis of this legislation by the Comptroller General, Mr. Elmer Staats, the legislation does not provide for the toll base to include the contingency payment. In his "Comparison of GAO Concerns and Draft Implementing Legislation for Panama Canal Treaty," Staats writes:

Contingent payment of surplus to Panama, provides method of calculation not included in toll base; no mention of carryover beyond 1999, sec. 203, pp. 10–11, sec. 232, pp. 20–21.

Clearly, Panama's expectations will not be fulfilled.

2. SENATE ATTEMPTS TO CLARIFY THE AMBIGUITY

Although the leadership sought to maintain that there really was no ambiguity, the feeling that there was an ambiguity persisted. It was pointed out that the statement of Panamanian Planning and Economics Minister Barletta stood in isolation as a personal opinion, expressed informally in response to a question from his audience in San Francisco. There was no guarantee that it was anything more than a personal opinion which did not commit the Panamanian Government.

Indeed, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. BARTLETT, sought to elicit an official statement from General Torrijos by telegram on February 1 and again on February 22. Finally on March 6, the Panamanian Ambassador to Washington sent Senator BARTLETT transcripts of the Barletta statements, saying that they would "answer your question." Senator BARTLETT protested on April 7 that it did not really answer the question at all:

This leaves, of course, a lot of doubt as to what the President of Panama really does think and how he does interpret the ambiguities that exist in Aritcle XIII.

Senator BARTLETT, as a result, then offered an amendment to clarify the ambiguities. The distinguished Senator from Idaho, Mr. CHURCH, strongly opposed that amendment:

In the first place, we believe that the language of the Treaty does not present an ambiguity. Therefore no amendment is necessary.

Second, the interpretation of this particular provision by the American Government and the Panamanian Government is not in conflict. Both governments understand the provision alike, which lays additional emphasis on our contention that no amendment is necessary.

Third, if, for any reason, Senators still believe some clarification is called for, the proper way for the clarification to be made is by way of amendment to the articles of ratification, not by way of an amendment which would force a change in the text of the treaty itself, thus introducing the possibility of either having to renegotiate the treaty or having to submit the amended treaty to another plebiscite in Panama.

For these reasons, we feel it would be most unwise for the Senate to adopt this amendment.

The amendment, like all other amendments opposed by the leadership, was defeated by tabling, 40 to 33. But the doubts were not subdued. A group of Senators did feel that it was necessary to amend the articles of ratification. It is significant that the three cosponsors of the amendment were favorably disposed toward the treaties, ultimately voting for both: Senators HOLLINGS, HEINZ, and BELLMON. Senator HOLLINGS made the case for eliminating any possible ambiguities and false expectations:

Imagine nearly a quarter of a century down the line, when those in charge of policy get out their copies of the treaty and start the debate all over again. Imagine the confusion, the disagreement, and the possibility for ill-will. Arguments like that at the time of the turnover could cancel out many of the other advantages accorded us by these treaties.

How much simpler then—and wiser, too—to deal forthrightly with the situation now. We can do so easily and effectively in the Resolution of Ratification. Then there can be no doubts at century's end. The Panamanians will know—we will know—what the terms of the treaty provide and what they do not provide.

There will be no possibility of false expectations in Panama or anywhere else. Instead of debate and discord in the year 2000, the transition can be consummated in an aura of friendship and cooperation that is the whole purpose of these treaties.

This time, the leadership indicated that they were willing to accept such an amendment to the resolution of ratification. The Senate agreed overwhelmingly, by a vote of 90 to 2. Everyone believed that there was unanimity of agreement on interpretation between the Senate and the Panamanian Government, but that was before the April 25 communique.

3. PANAMANIAN EXPECTATIONS IN THE COMMUNIQUE

The statement of Dr. Barletta was continued and amplified in the Foreign Ministry communique. And although the communique agrees with the technical aim of the amendment, at the same time, it demonstrates a deeper and much more profound disagreement with the U.S. assumptions behind the reservation. The Panamanians are emphasizing not so much what happens in 1999, as what happens year by year under article XIII:

Panama has always understood, and so explained to the citizenry at the time, that the budget containing revenues from and expenditures for the operation of the Canal would be so drafted as to make the Canal Commission capable of paying to Panama the sum stipulated in Article XII, Paragraph (4)(c). If for unforeseen reasons this sum were not paid in a certain year, Panama understands that the United States will make an effort to cover that sum in subsequent budgets. Paragraph (4)(c) is not symbolic or worthless. The two countries, in good faith, must give it practical content.

For this reason, Panama does not foresee the accumulation of unpaid balances in the year 2000. However, if they did exist, the United States would not be obligated to make such payment to Panama. In summary, there is a clear understanding between the U.S. Senate and the Republic of Panama in this area.

Unfortunately, it is plain that there is no clear understanding between the U.S. Senate and the Republic of Panama in this area. From a practical standpoint, it is absolutely clear on the record that the United States does not intend that the Panama Canal Commission will earn enough to make article XIII, paragraph (4)(c) a reality. And because it does not intend to earn a so-called "surplus," the question of what happens in 1999 is very important. It is for this reason that the U.S. Senate overwhelmingly went on record that the U.S. Treasury will not owe anything in 1999.

But Panama's point of view is that the contingency payment clause "is not symbolic or worthless." Panama "understands" that "the United States will make an effort" to "give it practical content." This contrasts sharply with the U.S. point of view that article XIII, paragraph (4)(c), has no practical significance whatsoever because the United States intends to make no effort at all to earn the necessary surplus to give it practical content. So the superficial agreement on the technical point of what is owed in 1999 masks a far more important and more fundamental disagreement over what the paragraph means at all.

The consequences of this disagreement is bound to increase tensions and bitterness between the two countries. For the pathetic cry of Panama on this point is the cry heard from every victim of the shell game. To put it bluntly, article XIII, paragraph (4)(c) is a tactic that is unworthy of a great nation. It is not the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina that Panama came into the game with clean hands; indeed, it appears that the U.S. negotiators and the Panamanian negotiators both came together in an effort to swindle the other. But a cheap victory on this clause is small recompense for the imbalance of the terms of the whole treaty, terms which unnecessarily surrendered truly vital points to a nation too small to preserve the canal.

Our negotiators went into the talks on this point knowing full well that the canal operations could not support the $10 million contingency payment. If they did not know it, they were totally incompetent. But they also know that the U.S. Senate would never approve a treaty that required the U.S. Treasury to subsidize payments to Panama up to annual amounts of $10 million. They also knew that the definition of expenditures could be manipulated to soak up any so-called surplus. Yet they made the pretense of holding out to Panama the chance of an additional $10 million per year; then by sleight of hand they inserted an escape clause in the apparently innocuous "rollover" provision.

The Senate quite properly sought to make the escape clause explicit by approving the Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon reservation. The protection in that reservation aimed not at Panama but at the unnecessary problem created by the negotiators. By making the problem explicit, the U.S. Senate alerted Panama to the duplicity of the U.S. negotiators. The only way in which Panama's expectations can be satisfied at this point is to raid the U.S. Treasury—that is, to get the money from the U.S. taxpayers. Even under the treaty, Panama has no claim on that money; Panama admits that she has no claim on that money. But psychologically, Panama expected that money; and this fundamental disagreement brought out by the Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon reservation will undoubtedly poison the whole atmosphere of cooperation, and destroy the supposed climate of "good will" that the proponents of the treaties extolled exceedingly.

There is no proper way that the United States can fulfill the expectations which our negotiators raised among the Panamanians with regard to this clause, without further costs to the United States taxpayers. If the taxpayers are charged for the $10 million, then the administration would have to back down on every assurance given to the American people with regard to costs. Although we are not technically liable to pay those amounts, the fundamental disagreement underlying the issue is a time bomb waiting to go off.

D. THE BROOKE RESERVATION TO THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Brooke reservation was passed by the Senate on April 17, 1978, by a vote of 84 to 3, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty. The substantive portion reads as follows:

Exchange of the instruments of ratification shall not be effective earlier than March 31, 1979, and the treaties shall not enter into force prior to October 1, 1979, unless legislation necessary to implement the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty shall have been enacted by the Congress of the United States of America before March 31, 1979.

The effect of the Brooke reservation was to modify both treaties, because the ratification of both treaties was linked together. Article II of the Panama Canal Treaty states:

This Treaty shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two Parties. The instruments of ratification of this Treaty shall be exchanged at Panama at the same time as the instruments of ratification of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, signed this date, are exchanged. This Treaty shall enter into force, simultaneously with the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, six calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

Parallel language appears in article VIII of the Neutrality Treaty.

It will be seen from article II that no calendar date is set for either ratification or entry into force; the only timeframe established is that entry into force occurs 6 months after ratification (ratification, of course, being the Executive action, not the date of Senate approval). Thus, under the treaty as it stood before the Brooke amendment there was no obligation whatsoever even to ratify the treaties.

Even the Panamanian communique agrees on this point:

In international law there is no obligation to proceed to the exchange of the instruments of ratification of the treaties even if the treaties have been ratified. This is a political decision that is properly made by the body which manages foreign relations.

However, to make the Panama treaties work requires very complicated implementing legislation. Many treaties require, at most, the authorization and appropriation of funds to make them work. The Panama Canal Treaty, however, requires legislation to eliminate the Panama Canal Company, create the Panama Canal Commission, establish accounting and ratemaking procedures, alter our defense arrangements and installations, change pension arrangements, transfer property, and so forth. To put a time deadline on that process would be to fly in the face of congressional jurisdiction and procedures.

It is noteworthy that the implementing legislation for the 1955 treaty was infinitely less complicated than that needed for the present treaties; yet the 1955 implementing legislation took 3 years.

The problem, therefore, is that the President has it within his power to start the clock running on the 6 months between his act of ratification and the treaties' entry into force. If he ratifies the treaties; that is, if he exchanges the instruments of ratification, then Congress would be confronted with the need for a forced-draft schedule to hold hearings in several committees in both Houses of Congress, hold debate, have a conference, and have a second conference if necessary. Then the process has to be repeated for any appropriations necessary.

If the Panama legislation were ordinary legislation it would still have a hard time becoming law on such a schedule. But the Panama legislation is so complicated, requiring so many kinds of expertise, that it is difficult to believe that good legislation could be passed in 6 months. Moreover, it would require Congress to set-aside other legislative projects which might have higher priorities. Congress cannot overlook the fact that the administration promised a draft of the implementing legislation last October, a promise that was supposed to be fulfilled in a few weeks. By February, during the treaty debates, Congress was still demanding the legislation, since parts of the treaties could not be interpreted properly without seeing what the administration had in mind to implement vague sections. Not until March did a rough draft appear, with the administration's apologies for being so late. The apologies stated that the job was far more complicated than had been expected.

A final draft still has not been presented; but what has been presented is already controversial, with the Comptroller General stating that it has failed to meet GAO concerns on several key points. The concepts in the bill have already been sharply criticized by many Senators during the treaty debates, so it is doubtful that it will have an easy time in passage.

Therefore, if the President should start the clock running on the implementing legislation through rash action, a tragic confrontation might ensue. In the first place, Congress might not have time to do a proper job, leaving either a botched piece of work—or leaving no legislation at all. In the latter case, the United States would be confronted with a situation in which the treaties would go into effect so far as they could be effective without legislation. That is, all jurisdiction would return to Panama, all properties would revert to Panama, the United States would have no authority in Panama, and we would immediately owe Panama payments without any way to pay them; yet we would have no way to operate or protect the canal.

The dimensions of potential conflict are enhanced by the attitude of the House. During Senate debates, the Senate and its leadership emphatically rejected the claims of the House of Representatives to participate in the disposition of U.S. property under article V, section 3 of the Constitution. The Senate attitude has highly disturbed the House of Representatives. Some 240 House Members, led by Merchant Marine Committee Chairman JOHN MURPHY of New York and Congressman GEORGE HANSEN of Idaho, have cosponsored resolutions insisting on the House right to vote on the transfer of property before the property is transferred. The cosponsors include the chairman of half of the leading committees and subcommittees, as well as the ranking minority members of those committees, directly concerned with the Panama Canal legislation.

Although the resolution is presently being held in committee, 190 Members—only 24 short of the necessary majority—have signed a discharge petition to bring the resolution to the House floor for a debate.

Finally, it should be pointed out that the House has acted three times in the past month in a manner that can only be interpreted as hostile to swift passage of the implementing legislation should the President take actions to ratify or initiate ratification of the treaties. On May 9, under the leadership of Mr. HANSEN, the House added an amendment to the first concurrent budget legislation to prohibit the use of any funds to be used to implement the canal treaties. On May 24, also under the leadership of Mr. HANSEN, a similar amendment was added to the defense authorization bill. On May 31, Mr. HANSEN once again was successful, by a vote of 203 to 163, in adding the amendment to the foreign relations assistance authorization bill.

The fear that the President might be tempted to put Congress under the gun was the motivating force behind the Brooke reservation. The effect of the Brooke amendment was to prevent the ratification of the treaties before March 31, 1979, unless the implementing legislation were enacted earlier. In other words, the President could not start the clock running for nearly a year; but once he did so, Congress would still be under the gun.

Yet the Brooke amendment still gives Congress only about 17 months to act, about half as much time as was taken in 1955. And there is no guarantee that Congress will act, given the attitude of the House. A prudent President would not ratify the treaties at all until it was clear that Congress had acted or until all the difficulties had been satisfied. The Brooke amendment is supposed to guarantee at least 17 months for action, but if the President should ratify at the earliest possible date (March 31, 1979), Congress might still not be able to complete the legislation successfully. The literal effect of the Brooke amendment was to guarantee some time for the Congress to act; but the intended effect was to warn the President of rash and precipitate action. The intent was to warn the President that March 31, 1979, was the earliest possible date, and that if he were wise, he might wait until much later. Unfortunately, the Brooke reservation contains one ambiguous word, "effective," speaking of the effective date of the exchange of instruments of ratification. By an extraordinary interpretation of this word, administration officials have announced that the President is about to take precipitate action: An immediate exchange of the instruments of ratification, with the "effective" date of March 31, 1979. This was described as making the exchange "in escrow."

If the President actually takes such a step, he will be setting the clock moving on the 17-month period—an action that could well lead to international and constitutional confrontation.

1. THE INTENT OF CONGRESS IN PASSING THE BROOKE RESERVATION

Senator BROOKE, in presenting his amendment on the floor, very carefully spelled out his intent. He was very specific is describing the nature of the timetable it set up:

> The reservation as I am not submitting it provides the following timetable:
> First, the exchange of ratification shall not be effective earlier than March 31, 1979. It need not take place even at that date.

Thus, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts took pains to indicate that March 31, 1979, was the earliest possible date, and that it need not take place even then. He went on:

> Second, the treaties shall not enter into force prior to October 1, 1979, unless legislation necessary to implement the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty shall have been enacted before March 31, 1979. This stipulation sets the earliest dates the Treaties could come into effect. It does not require that it do so on a specific date.

Thus, once more, the Senator emphasized that March 31 and October 1, 1979, were "the earliest dates." He went on to explain the complexity of the problem and the need to use caution:

> It would provide us an opportunity to monitor the drift of events in Panama and elsewhere that would have an impact on U.S. capacity to manage the canal over the next 20 years or so. Given the emotions that have been evoked by this issue, I see great merit in not feeling forced to proceed immediately with the implementing legislation if the decision is made to ratify the Panama Canal Treaty.
> A relatively long time period between the decision to ratify, if it is made, and the effective date of the treaties is needed for several reasons. First, if the implementing legislation is needed, it will be extremely complex. Numerous statutes will be affected. All legal ramifications of the end to U.S. jurisdiction in an area we have controlled for three-quarters of a century will have to be explored. A new employment system will have to be established. In short, the passage of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977 would entail a wholesale reorganization of the Canal enterprise.
> Second, any reasonable assessment of the legislative schedule for the rest of this year leads to the conclusion that it would be impossible to give the necessary in-depth attention to the implementing legislation it deserves this year. There is a backlog of important legislation on energy, farm problems, labor relations, and so forth. . . .
> Third, the implementing legislation would be of interest to many committees. This will inevitably add to the time necessary to consider it in an adequate manner.
> Fourth, this is an election year. The necessity of campaigning will further restrict the capacity of Members to give the needed attention to this matter.
> Fifth, there are likely to be many controversies between Congress and the executive regarding this legislation. For instance, it appears that the administration, in many of its calculations regarding the financial arrangements envisioned in the treaty, has assumed that the United States will forgo the interest payments on the U.S. investment that are presently going to the Treasury from canal revenues. I believe Congress would and should insist that those payments continue. . . .

There is, thus, ample reason to prolong the period before the treaties go into effect.

Senator BROOKE, therefore, put the executive branch on notice that he did not expect ratification to take place until the President had time to review events in Panama and the Congress had time to act. He made it perfectly clear that the President was not required or expected to act by March 31, 1979. He outlined the difficulties facing the implementing legislation, and, finally, he pointed out the constitutional crisis that would be involved if the President acted precipitously:

> There is an additional important reason why sufficient time should be allowed to pass the implementing legislation. If the treaty came into effect before the United States had passed the legislation, we would find ourselves in the rather untenable position of being bound by a legitimate international obligation but unable to carry out our responsibilities under it. Such a situation would, at a minimum, be damaging to our international image. Moreover, it could precipitate a constitutional crisis if the executive acted to implement the treaties by Executive order rather than await the needed action by Congress. There is no reason to precipitate such a crisis if we can avoid it. By adopting the pending reservation, a major step will have been taken to lessen the likelihood that such a problem would develop.

The intent of the Brooke reservation, therefore, was to give time to allow prudence, caution, moderation, and discretion in the timing of the instruments of ratification. It was not expected that the President would take hasty action which might foreclose a decision not to ratify later on, and which would eliminate any leverage that the President might have in the posttreaty negotiations that the United States might have with Panama over implementation.

Yet the State Department has announced that it intends for the President to exchange the instruments of ratification immediately, with the effective date to be March 31, 1979. The theory that the instruments be exchanged "in escrow" means that the power of pulling back or delaying the entry into force will be removed from U.S. control. It means that the United States will be committed to a specific date even before the President can be sure that Congress will have completed its work in time. The proposed exchange of instruments "in escrow" is like delivering over a postdated check to a creditor.

If the President fears that the Congress will unduly prolong the legislative process, the sensible procedure would be to use the date in the Brooke reservation as a trump card, a force held in reserve to back up more expert and subtle forms of persuasion. But by playing it now, before he has had time to see how Congress might react, or how events develop in Panama, he is forcing an unnecessary confrontation that can only exacerbate his relations with Congress. He is saying to Congress, "I don't trust you and your judgment." He has almost a whole year to play that card, yet he appears to be on the verge of playing it now. The results could be unfortunate, both for Panama and the United States. Yet it appears that he is about to play it now as another capitulation to Panama's desires. despite the intention of Congress.

2. PANAMA'S INTERPRETATION OF THE BROOKE AMENDMENT

The Foreign Ministry communique's comment on the Brooke reservation shows that Panama either willfully misunderstood the original provisions of the treaty, before it was modified, or has adopted an erroneous interpretation now to justify the earliest possible date for ratification. The comment begins:

> In view of the abovementioned reservation, the fact that the instruments are exchanged will not make the treaties effective within 6 months as was previously agreed.

Of course, there was never any agreement that the treaties would become effective within 6 months. The agreement was that the treaties would become effective within 6 months after ratification (article II), not 6 months after Senate approval. The decision to ratify could take an indefinite length of time, as previously explained. Neither before the Brooke reservation was passed, nor afterward, has there been any agreement in the treaty that exchange of ratifications would take place at any specified time. Nor does the Brooke reservation contain any hint that the effective date of the exchange of ratifications might be different than the actual date.

Indeed, the fact that the Brooke reservation specifies March 31 as the earliest date, rather than the specified date, shows that no specific timeframe was envisaged. Yet the communique goes on to say:

> The significant ceremony in which the chiefs of government of Panama and the United States will exchange the instruments of ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties will soon take place in Panama. However, the exchange will not be effective until 31 March.

There is absolutely nothing in the treaty that requires the exchange to take place soon. Nor is there any obligation to make the exchange effective on March 31.

As a result, Panama's interpretation for the date of the entry into force of the treaties is completely erroneous:

> Panama understands that the deadline for the treaties' entry into force is 1 October 1979; however, it may take place before that date if the U.S. Congress completes, before that date the legislation to implement the treaties.

Plainly, October 1 is not a deadline. A deadline is the latest possible date. What Congress intended was that October 1 would be the earliest possible date, not the latest.

Thus, President Carter, in agreeing to exchange ratifications with an effective date of March 31, 1979, and an entry into force of October 1, 1979, is capitulating to a Panamanian interpretation of the treaty which is not justified by the text of the Brooke reservation. In so doing, he will be repudiating the Brooke reservation just as assuredly as Panama does in the communique.

E. THE CANNON RESERVATION TO THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Cannon reservation was passed by the Senate on April 18, 1978, by a vote of 90 to 10, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty. The substantive portion reads as follows:

After the date of entry into force of the Treaty, the Panama Canal Commission shall, unless it is otherwise provided by legislation enacted by the Congress, be obligated to reimburse the Treasury of the United States of America, as nearly as possible, for the interest cost of the funds or other assets directly invested in the Commission by the Government of the United States of America and for the interest cost of the funds or other assets directly invested in the precedessor Panama Canal Company by the Government and not reimbursed before the date of entry into force of the Treaty. Such reimbursement of such interest costs shall be made at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America and at annual intervals to the extent earned, and if not earned, shall be made from subsequent earnings. For purposes of this reservation, the phrase "funds or other assets directly invested" shall have the same meaning as the phrase "net direct investment" had under section 62 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code.

This reservation was brought up late in the afternoon of April 18, and was allotted 2 minutes of debate, equally divided. With the exception of the phrase "unless otherwise provided by legislation enacted by the Congress," it is identical to a reservation brought up by the distinguished Senator from Nevada earlier in the day. No substantive points were made in the debate, except for the following comment by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, Mr. CHURCH:

Since the reservation offered by the distinguished Senator from Nevada provides that the final decision on the reimbursement of interest will be left to the Congress when it passes upon the enabling legislation to implement this treaty, we see no objection to the adoption of the reservation.

The effect of that addition was to postpone the real debate on this issue to a later time, thus stripping the reservation of any content. The only action it accomplishes is to leave the door open for Congress to consider the problem later—an action to which Panama must implicitly agree in accepting the reservation.

The substantive points, however, were touched upon in the earlier debate on the amendment for which this was a substitute. The distinguished Senator's statement was also short, but it is worth quoting in full:

The subject of my reservation is interest payments and recovery of the U.S. investment. I was privileged to chair hearings in the Senate Armed Services Committee on the financial impact of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty. One of our witnesses was Elmer B. Staats, Comptroller General of the United States, who discussed the financial issues. He made the assumption that the forthcoming implementing legislative package will relieve the Panama Canal Commission of the obligation to pay interest to the Treasury on the interest-bearing portion of the U.S. investment. This asumption is in line with the administration's statements that the commission will be relieved of this obligation. The U.S. investment in the Canal is sizable and amounts to about $318 million. When figured at the rate of long-term treasury bonds the interest amounts to around $20 million a year. The Panama Canal Company has the statutory obligation to pay. At $20 million per year over 22 years this would amount to $440 million loss to the Treasury over the life of the Treaty. I might note that Comptroller General Staats stated that this $20 million estimate annual interest payment could be substantially more per year over the next 22 years. Since the interest rate is based on the U.S. Treasury average rate for long-term issues and "as that portfolio turns over, these rates are bound to go up, and I do not believe that this has been fully taken into account in these projections." According to an Armed Services Committee staff study, Mr. Staats estimated the total loss to the Treasury over the next 22 years at $505 million.

I have quite a problem accepting the forgiveness of this obligation. As a matter of fact, I cannot accept it. On February 1, 1978, President Carter in a nationally televised address to the American people stated:

"Are we paying Panama to take the Canal? We are not. Under the new treaties payments to Panama will come from tolls paid by ships which use the Canal."

On December 28, 1977, the President said:

"We wanted a treaty that did not put a financial burden on the American taxpayer and we got it."

On September 26, 1977, Secretary of State Vance in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee stated concerning the cost of the treaties:

"The treaties require no new appropriations nor do they add to the burdens of the American taxpayer."

Well in line with this spirit of not imposing upon the taxpayer, I submit my reservation to not relieve the Panama Canal Commission of this statutory interest obligation because if the Commission is relieved of that obligation obviously it would impose a burden on the American taxpayer by the loss of those revenues of at least $20 million a year for the next 22 years.

The distinguished Senator's remarks are so apt, so much to the point, that it is hard to believe that anyone could disagree with them. His original amendment would have, by direct action, imposed upon the Commission the obligation to repay the Treasury for those costs to the American taxpayer. Yet later on, he withdrew that amendment, and inserted language postponing the Senate's decision on the matter—an action that particularly pleased the distinguished floor leader, so much so that he was willing to accept the revised version. The question therefore arises: Why, therefore, was it so necessary to postpone the actual decision on this matter, while at the same time permitting the distinguished Senator from Nevada to have the honor of getting his reservation passed? The distinguished Senator from Nevada performed an outstanding service in preserving the Senate's option to debate this point at greater length in the future; yet that debate can only come to the conclusion that the Senator's intent to protect the American taxpayers is impossible to fulfill, given the canal's earning potential and the exorbitant payments which the treaties require us to give to Panama.

1. LIMITATIONS ON FINANCIAL POTENTIAL OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senator from North Carolina has been deeply concerned by the multibillion-dollar costs which will have to be paid by the American taxpayers to implement the Panama Canal treaties. It is claimed that all payments to Panama will come from canal revenues; yet in order to make those payments available to Panama, the American taxpayer must pay huge costs of operation which can never be recovered from tolls. As a result, the Senator from North Carolina made a careful study of the conclusions of experts who have examined canal finances.

The central question is: How high can tolls be raised? All the experts agree that tolls cannot be raised without limit. Every time the tolls are raised, some of the traffic is diverted to other routes. With less traffic, fewer ships are paying tolls. So even with the higher tolls on each ship, the aggregate income might be less than before tolls were raised. At a certain point one reaches the point of diminishing returns as the curve flattens out. Once toll increases pass 40 percent, the net aggregate income remains the same. Even if increases of 100 percent were imposed, the aggregate revenue increase would still hover near 40 percent. Thus there is a practical ceiling on the canal's income.

The Comptroller General, in the same statement quoted by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, went on to demonstrate the impact of interest charges and amortization charges on the canal's deficit. According to his rough estimates for fiscal year 1979, the net tolls income deficiency, after payments to Panama, would be $37 million. But if interest and amortization were included as payments to the U.S. Treasury, the net tolls income deficiency would be $79 million.

Governor Parfitt estimated the necessary toll increase at 19.5 percent, including the bonanza of income from Alaskan oil. To raise $79 million, tolls would have to be increased by 40 percent the first year. Thus in one stroke, the ceiling would be reached. From that point on, the upward spiral of deficits would be paid by the American taxpayer.

However, the picture is even grimmer. According to studies by Mr. W. M. Whitman, former Secretary of the Panama Canal Co., and a consultant in canal finance, the projected statements misstate the actual deficit. And further studies by the Institute for American Relations, projected these deficits for 6 years and discovered that to make all the payments to Panama and to the U.S. Treasury would require increases ranging from 49.8 percent in fiscal year 1979 to 63.3 percent in fiscal year 1984 in aggregate toll revenues. Since it is impossible to increase the aggregate earning capacity of the canal above 40 percent, it is evident that it is simply impossible to repay the American taxpayer for his investment in the assets of the canal.

Those who are interested in more details on the financial earning potential of the canal should consult my presentation to the Senate on April 17, page S. 5641 of the daily RECORD, for detailed analyses and tables. At that time, I proposed a reservation that would have created a balance of equity between Panama and the United States. The reservation would have established priorities of payment, as funds were available: Panama would have been guaranteed $20 million a year from the payment for services and the fixed payment; then, as funds were available, the U.S. Treasury would have been paid for interest and amortization; finally, Panama would have been paid under the 30-cents-a-ton formula to the extent that funds were available. The reservation was defeated on the morning of April 18, tabled by a vote of 56 to 39.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that, if tolls are raised high enough, some return could be made to the U.S. Treasury. Congress should carefully consider that option. Yet any such increase in tolls, will decrease tonnage passing through the canal, and decrease payments to Panama under the 30-cents-a-ton formula. Moreover, it would clearly make it impossible to pay anything under the contingency payment clause. Once more, Panama's expectations are being set aside.

2. PANAMA'S EXPECTATIONS UNDER THE CANNON RESERVATION

The practical realities of canal finance leave Congress with very little choice to exercise under the Cannon reservation. If Congress is to have the option of protecting the U.S. taxpayer, it can only be done at the expense of Panama. The Cannon reservation legitimized the option of including payments to the U.S. Treasury as an operating expense, before any payments to Panama are made. The treaty says that payments to Panama shall be made out of canal operating revenues, but the term "canal operating revenues" is nowhere defined. Article XIII, paragraph (4)(c), as already pointed out, appears to be talking about net operating revenues; but no distinction is made in paragraphs (4) (a) and (b) between net revenues or gross revenues. It is conceivable that Congress, in the implementing legislation, could define operating revenues as meaning net operating revenues, consistent with paragraph (4)(c). That is probably the only way that real meaning could be given to the Cannon reservation; yet it would mean that, if net revenues (after paying the U.S. Treasury) were not available, no payments need be made to Panama.

With this as background, the Foreign Ministry's communique sets forth Panamanian expectations:

Aside from the fact that it is evident that the United States has been amortized bountifully, the knowledge of its revenue-raising capacity to cover the Panama Canal costs according to studies by experts contracted especially by U.S. authorities demonstrates that the policy on revenue and expenditures for the Canal's operations can be established in such a manner that will satisfy the provisions of this reservation and the income which Panama hopes to receive according to Article XIII, Paragraph (4) (b) and (c), without significantly affecting the volume of traffic. Therefore, this reservation does not alter what was agreed upon. To the extent that the United States does not violate the principle of honoring the treaties in good faith, Panama cannot present claims to the United States.

It is not at all evident that the United States has been amortized bountifully. In fact, most of the studies show that the return to the United States has been understated because of the inflation of the dollar since 1903. Moreover, as already demonstrated, Panama is incorrect in stating that the revenue projections indicate that the canal can pay both the U.S. Treasury and Panama out of earnings. In fact, there is no way even a portion of both requirements can be met without decreasing the volume of traffic by excessive tolls, and consequently, decreasing Panama's income under the 30 cents a ton formula.

Therefore, the Cannon reservation is a significant alteration of what was agreed upon. Without the reservation, there would be no grounds whatsoever for Congress to include costs to the Treasury among the costs of operation. Panama appears to be denying to Congress the right to choose an option that might decrease Panama's financial benefits. Panama's discussion of good faith falls down over the assumption that the original treaty provisions cannot be altered by the Senate. But the Senate did alter the treaty provisions by amendment, including the Cannon reservation. Panama must accept the full meaning of the Cannon reservation if she wants the rest of the treaty; and Panama must accept it, in good faith, as an alteration.

F. THE DANFORTH UNDERSTANDING TO THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Danforth understanding was passed by the Senate on April 17, by a voice vote, as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Panama Canal Treaty. The substantive portion reads as follows:

Nothing in subparagraph 4(c) of Article XIII shall be construed to limit the authority of the United States of America through the United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission to make such financial decisions and incur such expenses as are reasonable and necessary for the management, operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal. In addition, toll rates established pursuant to paragraph 2(d) of Article III need not be set at levels designed to produce revenues to cover payment to Panama described in subparagraph 4(c) of Aricles XIII.

This understanding returns once more to the same theme as some of the reservations already discussed; yet it makes even more explicit certain principles which are anathema to Panama.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri, Mr. DANFORTH, sought to nail down the point:

The Commission must be free to make expenditures which it deems are required to insure the same level of Canal operations as existed under the Panama Canal Company. The contingent payment must not in any way act as a constraint on Commission decisions. This understanding makes it clear that the Commission's authority shall not be burdened or limited in any way by considerations of the contingent payment.

The understanding also makes it clear that tolls for users of the Canal need not be set at levels designed to produce sufficient revenues to cover the $10 million contingent payment, or any portion thereof. The wording does allow Congress, if it so desires, to permit tolls to account for this payment. I have noted that the draft implementing legislation proposed by the administration does not allow for this payment in the toll base. But I do not want to bind this or some future Congress in this regard. I do, however, wish to establish the fact that the United States, through the Panama Canal Commission, is under no obligation whatsoever to compel Canal users to bear explicitly this financial burden.

This explicit rebuke to Panama's expectations somehow became almost too much for the Foreign Ministry to bear. Although it merely makes explicit what follows from the logic of the treaty and of other reservations, the Panamanian communique burst out in a long restatement of grievances—a hysterical outburst that calls into question the future cooperation of Panama and its good faith in accepting any of the amendments which the Senate added to the treaties and the resolutions of ratification:

When the text of Article XIII, Paragraph (4) (b) and (c) was agreed to, it was evident from a study of the Canal operations that the Canal produces approximately $18 million annually which comprise the Canal's operating revenues. The negotiators' understanding was that this figure would serve as a base to cover the payment to Panama of the $10 million guaranteed in Article XIII, Paragraph (4)(b) and the additional $10 million agreed to in Article XIII, Paragraph 4(c), these payments being considered as part of the Canal's operating revenues. For this reason we are in agreement that the obligations derived from Article XIII, Paragraph (4) (b) and (c) in favor of Panama can be covered without raising tolls and for this reason we agree with the Senate that it is not imperative to raise tolls to cover these obligations to Panama. By virtue of the principle of good faith which prevails in the observance of the treaties, Panama expects the United States to accommodate its policy on expenditures so that this article can be the means by which Panama receives a fairer retribution for its contribution to the Canal work. To the extent that the Panamanian people are satisfied with the Canal administration due to the products they derive from it, they will continue protecting their Canal. But if a stingy spirit prevails, aggravating the injustice suffered by Panama since 1903, then a circle of friendship will not have been built around the Canal but rather one of hatred, with possible grave consequences if a crisis occurs which the national government would be the first to deplore.

Once again, the Panamanian position is based upon economic fantasy. Even at present toll rates, there has been no surplus of $18 million annually to serve as a base. The reorganization of the canal under the treaty is too complicated to discuss at this point, but there is no simplistic method of arriving at any $18 million figure. Indeed, the canal has run at losses.

Every single financial study of the canal has clearly demonstrated that tolls will have to be raised. The official figure, and minimum figure, is an increase of 19.5 percent, but other studies show double and triple that amount. Thus the notion that payments can be paid to Panama without raising tolls has no relation to reality. When the communique says that "we agree with the Senate that it is not imperative to raise tolls to cover these obligations to Panama," it is agreeing with something the Senate never said. Moreover, if all the true costs are added in, as permitted by the Cannon reservation, the Panamanian statement is nonsense.

Thus the statement that "Panama expects the United States to accommodate its policy on expenditures" to provide the benefits which Panama expects is diametrically opposed to the Danforth understanding, the Cannon reservation, and the Hollings-Heinz-Bellmon reservation. When Panama calls for good faith in implementing the treaties, Panama is insisting on implementing the treaties according to Panama's original expectations. Panama is totally rejecting the concept that the U.S. Senate has any right to alter the treaties in any respect.

When Panama makes such statements, Panama is rejecting its own principle of offer and counter-offer. Panama is demanding that the Senate amendments have no meaning. It is perhaps not surprising that a dictatorship fails to understand the democratic process, and the constitutional requirements which U.S. officials must adhere to. In a dictatorship, one man can approve a treaty draft; but in the United States, the draft accepted by the Chief Executive is only a provisional document, subject to change by the U.S. Senate. For the U.S. Senate itself is acting in good faith when it changes treaty language.

If Panama is to rely upon good faith, therefore, then Panama must accept the changes imposed by the Senate in good faith, and Panama must work to implement those changes in good faith herself. The only alternative is to reject the whole package.

Yet the foreign ministry goes on to raise the spectre of crisis, created by violence among the Panamanian people. Panama's use of threats has been typical of the entire negotiating process. The negotiations began in a Communist-organized riot in 1964. Panamanian government propaganda about the martyrs of 1964—when half the martyrs were looters who were trapped by greed in buildings set on fire by arsonists—has been direct incitement to violence. The multiplicity of statements by government officials—from Omar Torrijos on down—about the inability to control the anger of the people have been direct attempts to stir up the Panamanian people. Deploring such violence is thus the height of hypocrisy.

To once more use the same techniques that are doubtless tried and true—during the period preceding ratification, throws into doubt Panama's willingness to cooperate in any aspects of treaty implementation. It casts into doubt Panama's acceptance of any of the amendments and reservations. It says to the American people that the treaty does not represent a true agreement, a true meeting of minds, but is a transparent device for the rapid and total takeover of the canal. For the President to ratify the treaties under such circumstances would be to break faith with the Senate and the American people.

III. HAS PANAMA ACCEPTED THE TREATIES AND AMENDMENTS?

The foreign ministry communique purports to contain Panama's acceptance of the treaties and amendments. Yet even in the concluding pages of the communique, it is clear that Panama is not yet satisfied. It is clear that Panama's acceptance is only a short-term tactical maneuver. For once Panama regains sovereignty, Panama will be in a strong position to denounce the treaties and demand negotiations. Having already rejected the key reservations by interpreting them as having meanings opposite to what the Senate intended, Panama is ready to reenter the liberation struggle, with all the trappings of Marxist dialectic:

> The achievements obtained in the negotiations are conquests which belong to the Panamanian people. They cannot be destroyed or renounced but can be taken to their ultimate culmination by future generations. Let us strengthen these conquests, the most feasible now, and when better circumstances for struggle exist, we will again undertake the task to improve the terms of the relationship.

This passage makes it plain to all that Panama expects to renew the struggle against the United States. Even though the Panama Canal Treaty is supposed to last for 22 years, and is supposed to phase in Panamanian control and operation of the canal, the struggle will continue. The passage cannot be interpreted as referring to the post-treaty period because it talks about undertaking "to improve the terms of the relationship," when "better circumstances for struggle exist." The better circumstances, of course, will exist when Panama has sovereignty over the canal, and Panamanians are trained to operate the canal. Those better circumstances will be sooner than we think.

Does Panama accept the treaties and the amendments when Panama signs the protocol of ratification? Clearly, only as a tactic:

> The national government has reached the conclusion that the treaties unquestionaby achieve, within a reasonable period of time, the fundamental objectives of the Panamanian nation. Because of this, the national government will consent to the exchange of the instruments of ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties. With the entry into force of the treaties, better instruments of struggle will be placed in the hands of the republic. With them, Panama will continue its efforts so that the national objectives will be realized in a shorter period of time by virtue of opportune and patriotic negotiations that the governments of the future will undertake.

The treaties and sovereign jurisdiction will provide a base for new negotiations—negotiations doubtless based on the same kind of threats exhibited as in the past. Panama's intention to shorten the 22 years of the treaty is boldly expressed. Despite all of Panama's talk about the United States lacking good faith, this remarkable document tells us that Panama is not agreeing in good faith, either to the treaties themselves or to the amendments. Panama is making a farce out of the ratification process, and is treating the Senate with contempt.

Despite the years of negotiations, despite the long months of debate, there is still no meeting of minds on the basic treaty issues. Panama's interpretation of the key amendments is openly opposed to the Senate's intention in passing those amendments. If both nations sign protocols which include the Senate amendments, it does not mean that Panama accepts the amendments with the Senate's intentions intact. It means that Panama accepts the amendments according to her own interpretation—an interpretation that repudiates the Senate's work. Panama has put us on public notice by means of the foreign ministry communique. The President must not ratify the treaties as long as the gulf of meaning opens wide between the two nations.

PANAMANIAN FOREIGN MINISTRY COMMUNIQUE ON CANAL TREATIES

I. INTRODUCTION

When the Senate of the United States gave its advice and consent to President Carter regarding the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, the Foreign Ministry issued two communiques (16 and 27 March) in which it said that the government would not express its judgment on the amendments, understandings, conditions and reservations approved by the Senate until the same body also arrived at its constitutional decision regarding the Panama Canal treaty.

On the 18th of this month the U.S. Senate gave its advice and consent to President Carter regarding the Panama Canal treaty with the reservations and understandings which will be analyzed in this communique.

With the completion of the Senate's proceedings in the United States, the Foreign Ministry, complying with orders from His Excellency President Demetrio B. Lakas and His Excellency Chief of Government Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, now undertakes to fulfill its duty of explaining to the citizenry the juridical scope of the resolutions of the Senate and setting forth its stand concerning the Senate's decision.

II. SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TERMS "AMENDMENTS," "UNDERSTANDINGS" AND "RESERVATIONS"

The above terms are used by the Senate in its resolutions of 17 March and 18 April of the present year. For this reason it is appropriate to express the meaning given to those terms by U.S. jurists.

Amendments

An amendment to a treaty is a formal change in the letter of the text negotiated by the parties.

Reservations

A reservation modifies or limits the substantive effect of one or more of the treaty stipulations. A reservation is a condition which adds something substantial to a treaty or eliminates something substantial from it. A reservation is a notification in the sense that the state making it will not implement the treaty except in accordance with that condition.

Understandings

The term "understanding" is used to describe a declaration which is not made with the intention of modifying or limiting any of the treaty stipulations. An understanding can clarify or interpret one or more of the treaty stipulations or incorporate a declaration of policy or procedure.

Declaration

The terms "declaration" or "communication" are used to express certain matters of policy or principle and in no way abrogate or change the rights or obligations stipulated in the treaty. Frequently those terms are used interchangeably with the word "understanding."

The legal meaning of a Senate declaration, regardless of its designation, depends entirely on its substance. A declaration which modifies, limits or changes the text of the treaty or its meaning is actually a reservation. A declaration which clarifies or explains or deals with a secondary matter does not change the treaty and consequently is not a reservation. Sometimes it can be difficult to distinguish clearly between an understanding and a reservation. One may gradually obscure the other and thus become a question which the two parties may decide for themselves.

The Bienna convention of 1969 on treaty law says in Article 19:

"Article 19. A state may formulate a reservation at the time of signing, ratifying, accepting or approving a treaty or adhering to it. * * * "

That same convention defines the term "reservation" in Article 2(1) D:

"D. 'Reservation' is understood to be a unilateral declaration, regardless of its name or designation, made by a state in signing, ratifying, accepting or approving a treaty or in adhering to it with the purpose of excluding or modifying the legal effects of certain dispositions of the treaty in its application to that state."

In formulating the draft to the convention, the commission of international law explained the word "reservation" in the following terms:

"13. A definition of reservation becomes necessary because the states, in signing, ratifying, accepting, approving a treaty or adhering to it, usually formulate declarations on the matter in which they understand some questions or on their interpretation of certain dispositions. Such a declaration can be a simple clarification of the position of the state or can be a reservation, depending an whether it modifies the application of the clauses of the treaty already approved or excludes it."

(Document of the United Nations, Supplement No 9 A/5209, p 8)

Although this Vienna convention has not entered into force, it is the product of the work of codification of public international law sponsored by the United Nations and reflects the present state of the development of the norms which regulate relations between those subject to international law.

We can assert that, regardless of the term used, what matters is if the condition, reservation, amendment or declaration made by one party to the other modifies or changes what has been agreed to by the plenipotentiaries. If that change has been made, it is unquestionable that the treaty has not been ratified but, rather, that a counteroffer has been made by one party which the other is at liberty to reject, modify or approve. Only if it approves the counteroffer is the consent or perfecting [perfeccionamiento] of the wish of both parties to obligate themselves realized.

III. RATIFICATION BY PLEBISCITE IN PANAMA

In the United States ratification is effected by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate. In Panama, in conformity with Article 274 of the constitution, ratification of the treaties concerning the canal is by plebiscite. The authority to ratify resides exclusively in the people, in each citizen who takes on the responsibility of a conegotiator. The executive branch is not responsible for ratification in Panama. Its role is limited to that of being a mere exponent of the popular will.

The plebiscite required by the constitution has already been carried out in Panama. The people of Panama expressed their desire to ratify, that is, to give their approval to, the government's negotiating effort in the plebiscite held on 23 October 1977.

IV. DOCUMENTS RATIFIED BY THE PANAMANIAN CITIZENRY ON OCTOBER 23, 1977

Under Law 33 of 1977, which summoned the people to a plebiscite, the following were submitted for the consideration of the citizenry: the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal treaty with the minutes [actas], annexes, maps and agreements signed in Washington, D.C., on 7 September 1977. In addition the Panamanian people approved the statement of understanding of 14 October 1977 agreed upon by Panamanian Chief of Government Gen Omar Torrijos Herrera and U.S. President Jimmy Carter. This amendment was personally explained to the citizenry by General Torrijos before 23 October 1977. In other words, the people who supported the Torrijos-Carter treaties in the plebiscite approved the true interpretation given to those instruments by their signatories, that is, by the persons most authorized to interpret them or determine their true scope.

The statement of understanding was as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the neutrality treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to guarantee that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of two countries shall, in accordance with its respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal. This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention by the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the canal remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

"The neutrality treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transit the canal expeditiously This is intended, and it shall so be interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly."

V. THE DE CONCINI RESERVATION AND THE PRINCIPLE OF NONINTERVENTION

The struggle against colonialism has been long and bloody. The best example of a collective effort to break the chain of oppression was given by America when Bolivar liberated the people and gave them the fruits of their own government. Despite this independent, however, new forces alien to our people established spheres of influence and colonial situations which, fortunately, have been almost eliminated. In addition to their fight for their emancipation, the peoples of America have also struggled to eradicate all forms of interference in their domestic affairs.

A clear Latin American contribution to the development of international law has been the formalization of the principle of nonintervention, which was codified for the first time in Article 8 of the conference [as published] on the rights and duties of states approved by the Seventh Pan-American Conference held in Montevideo in 1933. This rule states:

"No state has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another."

President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's position was clearly expressed by the U.S. delegate in these words:

Declaration made by the U.S. commission upon signing the Convention on the Rights and Duties of States in Montevideo in 1933:

"Any observing person must clearly understand now that under the Roosevelt administration the U.S. Government is as opposed as any other government to interference with the liberty, sovereignty or other domestic affairs or processes of the governments of other nations. . . .

"I feel safe in committing myself to the statement that, with our support for the general principle of nonintervention as it has been defined, no government should fear any intervention by the United States under the Roosevelt administration."

This principle or basic norm of international conduct was successfully introduced by Latin American jurists, including our Dr. Ricardo J. Alfaro, into the UN Charter, adopted in 1945, which in Article 2 (4) states:

"All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or politcal independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations."

In April 1948, 30 years ago, the American countries met in Bogota where they clearly and categorically reiterated their support for the principle of nonintervention as follows:

Article 15 of the OAS Charter approved in Bogota in 1948: "No state or group of states has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, regardless of the reason, in the domestic or foreign affairs of another. The foregoing principle prohibits not only action by the armed forces, but any other form of interference or attack on the character of the state and political, cultural and economic elements which constitute it." (Note: This article is identical to Article 18 of the OAS Charter amended by the Buenos Aires protocol in 1967.)

The aforementioned article is included in Chapter 17 of the OAS Charter which is entitled "Rights and Fundamental Duties of States," and Article 11 of this same charter states:

"The fundamental duties of the states are not susceptible to impairment in any manner."

The foregoing signifies that the states have accepted a limitation to their capacity to contract internationally. The state cannot contract the destruction of its character, and there is no pact whatsoever which validly achieve that objective.

In view of the stipulation of the aforementioned Article 11, during the plebiscite period the Foreign Ministry spokesmen explained that Article V of the canal treaty, which establishes the principle of nonintervention as a duty of the United States to abstain from meddling in the domestic affairs of Panama, was unnecessary from the legal viewpoint but that it had been included as a precautionary political measure,

And in view of multilateral rules contained in treaties-laws, as are the UN and OAS charters, conventions which regulate the conduct of Panama, the United States and other countries, there is not the slightest shadow of a doubt that no state, superpower or ministrate, can claim the "right" to intervene in areas which are of the exclusive competence of other states.

But a hardly edifying spectacle was given when some U.S. senators, during the Senate debate on the Torrijos-Carter treaty, rudely used langauge which without a doubt indicated that, in their opinion, the United States has the "right to intervene" in Panama to preserve the neutrality and security of the canal.

This must be made very clear. The "right of intervention" does not exist; everything is to the contrary [todo lo contrario]. Intervention has been proscribed in international legal life. There may be interventions. These cannot be avoided, just as crime cannot be avoided, but such interventions can only be regressively engendered by colonialist and neocolonialist minds which still do not understand that the destiny of man is freedom.

During his speech in the Senate, Senator DeConcini used language which offended the dignity of the Panamanian nation and which is not consonant with the great advancements of humanity. He spoke of so-called rights of intervention which the peoples of the world, organized under the symbol of the United Nations, extinguished once and for all in a collective manner. However, Senator DeConcini also stated:

"This does not mean, nor should it be interpreted as, a right of the United States to interfere in the domestic affairs of Panama."

Any intervention violates the basic rule of self-determination.

Any intervention violates the respect which every state owes to the independence, territorial sovereignty and honor of other states. Therefore, our citizens expressed with righteous firmness their repudiation of Senator DeConcini's words used in explaining his amendment.

Fully identified with the national will, the Panamanian Government made timely efforts before the U.S. Government to insure the Senate would reaffirm the international commitments of the United States contained in the UN and OAS charters. We were successful in that respect. To dispel any doubt, the U.S. Senate in its 18 April resolution stated:

Pursuant to its adherence to the principle of nonintervention, any action taken by the United States of America in the exercise of its rights to assure that the Panama Canal shall remain open, neutral, secure and accessible pursuant to the provisions of the treaty and the neutrality treaty, and the resolutions of advice and consent thereto, shall be only for the purpose of assuring that the canal shall remain open, neutral, secure and accessible, and shall not have as its purpose nor be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama or interference with its political or sovereign integrity.

This Senate resolution renders indefensible the allegation that the Torrijos-Carter treaties grant the United States any right of intervention in Panama.

According to international law, the obligation which all states have of nonintervention in the internal affairs of others is but the corollary of the principles of sovereign equality of states and respect for their political independence. If sovereignty is the right of all peoples to have their own government, to not have any other supreme state power, it is evident that any intervention conflicts with political independence and is repudiated legally by all humanity.

Panama's political independence, territorial integrity and self-determination are guaranteed by the unshakable will of the Panamanian people and the active solidarity of peoples of the world, in accordance with what was solemnly compacted in the UN Charter. On 28 November 1821 Panama declared its will to be free and independent. This decision was reaffirmed on 3 November 1903 and also on 9 January 1964 when the January martyrs who offered their lives pointed out the path of sacrifices as the price of liberation from the colonialist yoke. Therefore, the Republic of Panama rejects, in a united and decisive fashion, any attempt by any country to intervene in its internal affairs. This is not only a matter of international law but of the steadfast will of our people.

Liberty is an inborn right of human beings and people. One is free when liberty takes hold of the soul of a people. That torch exists firmly in the heart of each and every Panamanian, and therefore any attempt to intervene in matters of the exclusive competence of Panamanians will be rejected without any hesitation.

VI. INTERVENTION IS REPUDIATED IN THE U.S. SENATE

The voices of great U.S. leaders were heard clearly as they repudiated any interpretation that an alleged "right" to intervene in Panama could be inferred. Senators Frank Church, Mike Gravel, George McGovern, Jacob Javits, Paul Sarbanes, Edward Kennedy and others stated that the era of intervention is a thing of the past. It is relevant to quote a portion of Senator Kennedy's statements:

"And it is quite fair that the government and people of Panama should aspire to end the foreign military occupation of their own territory, that they should aspire to recover full national control of all their territory almost 100 years after becoming independent."

For his part, Senator Church said:

"The UN Charter, the OAS Charter and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance—our military alliances with our neighbors in this hemisphere—all contain provisions which prohibit intervention in the internal affairs of other nations. Therefore, the interventionist policy of the United States is a thing of the past.

"However, in Latin America memories have not faded. The main unifying force in the foreign policy of the Latin American nations over the last 40 years has been support for the principle of nonintervention. Having committed themselves 40 years ago to a new and more mature relationship with the United States, the Latin American countries are determined to keep it that way."

VII. AMERICA IN A STATE OF ALERT TO KEEP THE DOORS OF INTERVENTION FROM BEING REOPENED

As clear proof of all the American peoples' effective and affective solidarity with Panama in its struggle to free itself of every colonialist presence or vestige of colonialism in its territory, it is worthwhile to note the words of two prominent Latin American leaders.

Venezuelan President Carlos Andres Perez said the following on welcoming the President of the United States in Venezuela on 28 March of this year:

"With all this, Mr. President, the feelings of the Latin American people are interpreted in a fully optimistic manner but without being able to hide the sincere concern felt throughout Latin America in the face of any eventuality.

"Just as we joyously celebrated the U.S. bicentennial, we Latin Americans want to celebrate with the same fraternal rejoicing the ratification of the new treaties, the indication of a new era of friendship and cooperation between Latin America and the United States. This is the symbolic meaning of the new Panama Canal treaties.

"Not only will this be the ratification of a new treaty that is just and respectful of sovereignty, but at the same time, it will ratify forever the eternal friendship between the United States and Latin America."

Colombian President Dr. Alfonso Lopez Michelsen let his eloquent voice be heard in the following terms:

"Let not the foot of a foreign power again be placed on the sacred soil of a Latin American country.

"The Bogota charter, approved by the Pan-American Conference in April 1948, guarantees our right to never suffer intervention by any foreign power."

VIII. GENERAL TORRIJOS SET THE PARAMETERS OF DIGNITY IN ORDER TO MAKE A DECISION

Despite the fact that the Foreign Ministry communiques expressed the government's decision to withhold judgment regarding the reservations introduced into the canal neutrality treaty, it is obvious that General Torrijos' statements to the press and his notes to the chiefs of state of the whole world and to President Carter indicated the government's dissatisfaction and concern regarding the interventionist nature of the so-called DeConcini reservation. Therefore, in his note to the chiefs of state, General Torrijos said:

"Because of the support which your people and government have given to the Panamanian cause and because, according to Article 7 of the neutrality treaty, Panama and the United States will open to the support of all the states of the world the objectives of this treaty, we have believed that is our duty to inform you of this situation about which we have publicly expressed our deep concern."

And in his letter to President Carter, our chief of government said:

"However, I do wish to point out that this study will be based on the following concepts: Panama will consider unacceptable any reservation which offends the national dignity, which distorts or changes the objectives of the treaty or which is designed to prevent the effective exercise by Panama of sovereignty over all its territory, the turnover of the canal and the military withdrawal on 31 December 1999."

IX. ANALYSIS OF THE AMENDMENTS, RESERVATIONS AND UNDERSTANDINGS

The Foreign Ministry now proceeds, methodically, to analyze the amendments, reservations and understandings by which the U.S. Senate gave its advice and consent to the Torrijos-Carter treaties.

I. Amendments

A. At the end of Article IV, insert the following: "A correct and authorized statement of certain rights and duties of the parties under the foregoing is contained in the statement of understanding issued by the Government of the United States of America on 14 October 1977 and by the Government of the Republic of Panama on 18 October 1977, which is hereby incorporated as an integral part of this treaty, as follows:

"Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the neutrality treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal. This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as, a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the canal will remain open, secure and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama."

B. At the end of the first paragraph of Article VI, insert the following:

"In accordance with the statement of understanding mentioned in Article IV above: The neutrality treaty provides that the vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and Panama will be entitled to transmit the canal expeditiously. This is intended, and it shall be so interpreted, to assure the transit of such vessels through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly."

A perusal of these two amendments reveals that they correspond exactly with the statement of understanding agreed upon by General Torrijos and President Carter on 14 October 1977. This declaration contains an authentic interpretation of the treaty of neutrality agreed upon by the signatories. It was released in Panama before the plebiscite and accepted by the citizenry in approving the Torrijos-Carter treaties.

What the above transcribed amendments do is to formalize the statement of understanding because it was not signed. But this fact does not minimize its obligatory power. In international law commitments are also contracted in oral form. The interpretation of the neutrality treaty agreed upon by General Torrijos and President Carter obligates Panama as well as the United States and is part of the treaties even though the document is not signed. It was there that the authentic interpretation of the neutrality treaty was given by the person who in Panama has the constitutional responsibility for directing foreign relations.

II. Reservations:

A. Subject to the condition which will be included in the instrument of ratification of the treaty which will be exchanged with the Republic of Panama, notwithstanding the provisions of Article V or any other provisions of the treaty, if the canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the canal or restore the operations of the canal, as the case may be.

This is what has commonly been called the DeConcini reservation. Obviously its scope departed from the Torrijos-Carter declaration because it eliminated the obligation of the United States not to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama and to respect the political independence and territorial integrity of Panama.

Panama has recognized the U.S. right to act unilaterally in defense of the neutrality of the canal. General Torrijos reaffirmed this to President Carter in the note he sent him on 15 March 1978:

"Subsequently, and by virtue of the confusion created regarding the two articles of the neutrality treaty we proceeded to issue a memorandum of understanding which clearly interpreted the unilateral capacity of each of our countries to preserve the regime of neutrality against threats, attack or closure of the canal, the priority passage of warships in case of emergency and noninterference in the internal affairs of Panama as well as the inviolability of territorial integrity and political independence of my country."

As abominable as the DeConcini reservation were the baseless explanations of the same senator, who seeks to revive U.S. intervention in the internal affairs of Panama. Fortunately, the Senate approved the 18 April resolution, known as the Church amendment, which reaffirms respect for the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of the countries of America, which was reproduced above.

With this last Senate resolution, it is evident that the United States has reaffirmed its international commitments in light of the UN and OAS charters. With it the DeConcini reservation has been rid of its imperialistic and interventionist claws, and the enforcement of the principle of nonintervention has been reestablished. The specter of new interventions at the end of the 20th century, which rightly caused concern to all Panamanians, has been eliminated.

B. Subject to the condition that the instruments of ratification of the treaty shall be exchanged only on the conclusion of a protocol of exchange to be signed by authorized representatives of both governments, which shall constitute an integral part of the treaty documents and which shall include the following:

"Nothing in this treaty shall preclude Panama and the United States from making in accordance with their respective constitutional processes any agreement or arrangement between the two countries to facilitate performance at any time after December 31, 1999, of their responsibilities to maintain the regime of neutrality established in the treaty, including agreements or arrangements for the stationing of any U.S. military forces or maintenance of defense sites after that date in the Republic of Panama, that Panama and the United States may deem necessary or appropriate."

This is what is known as the Nunn reservation. It has been objected to in Panama with the argument that it is contrary to Article V of the neutrality treaty which stipulates:

"After the termination of the Panama Canal treaty, only the Republic of Panama shall operate the canal and maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its national territory."

The Foreign Ministry shares the national sentiment regarding the termination of U.S. military occupation. The Nunn amendment does not oblige Panama to negotiate an agreement on bases, much less to accept a treaty with this purpose. The obligation to negotiate is nonexistent and even if it did exist, the obligation to negotiate does not entail the commitment to sign a treaty. In 1970 Panama rejected the 1967 treaties without detriment to the commitment of the United States and Panama before the OAS to negotiate a treaty which would resolve the causes of conflict.

The straight interpretation of the Nunn reservation is that if the United States resolved to propose to Panama the negotiation of a treaty so that the United States could have military bases in Panama after 1999, the government ruling Panama's destiny at that time will be free to agree or not agree to the negotiations. That will be its responsibility. That government will assess the situation and make its sovereign decision which it will communicate to the United States.

With total emphasis, the Foreign Ministry declares that Article V cited previously has not been changed. All states have the power to negotiate without limitations except those imposed by the U.N. Charter.

C. Before the date of entry into force of the treaty, the two parties shall begin to negotiate for an agreement under which the American Battle Monuments Commission would, upon the date of entry into force of such agreement and thereafter, administer, free of all taxes, without compensation to the Republic of Panama and in accordance with the practices, privileges, and immunities associated with the administration of cemeteries outside the United States by the American Battle Monuments Commission, including the display of the U.S. flag, such part of Corozal Cemetery in the former Canal Zone as encompasses the remains of citizens of the United States.

D. The U.S. flag may be displayed, pursuant to the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article VII of the Panama Canal treaty at such part of Corozal Cemetery in the former Canal Zone as encompasses the remains of citizens of the United States.

E. The President of the United States:

a. Shall have announced, before the date of entry into force of the treaty, his intention to transfer, consistent with an agreement with the Republic of Panama, and before the termination date of the Panama Canal treaty, to the American Battle Monuments Commission the administration of such part of Corozal Cemetery as encompasses the remains of the United States, and

b. Shall have announced immediately after the date of exchange of the instruments of ratification plans to be carried out at the expense of the U.S. Government, for:

i. Removing, before the date of entry into force of the treaty, the remains of citizens of the United States from Mount Hope, Corozal Cemetery as encompasses such remains, except that the remains of any citizen whose next of kin objects in writing to the secretary of the army not later than 3 months after the date of exchange of the instrument of ratification of the treaty shall not be removed; and

ii. Transporting to the United States for reinterment, if the next of kin so requests, not later than 3 months after the date of entry into force of the treaty, any such remains encompassed by Corozal Cemetery and, before the date of entry into force of the treaty and remains removed from Mount Hope Cemetery, pursuant to subclause i.; and

c. Shall have fully advised, before the date of entry into force of the treaty, the next of kin objecting under Clause b. i. of all available options and their implications.

This reservation also does not signify any variation from the Torrijos-Carter treaties. What is contemplated here is the possibility of negotiating an agreement on permanent respect deserved by the dead. No Panamanian objects to this agreement. This is deeply rooted in the soul of each Panamanian in view of the Christian doctrine to venerate their predecessors. The Foreign Ministry envisages no difficulty in reaching an agreement with the United States, following the examples used by other countries on this matter, such as France.

Panama has no objection in conformity with the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article VII of the Panama Canal treaty and once the provisions therein are fulfilled, to the burial of the remains of U.S. citizens under the shadow of their flag in Corozal Cemetery. The funeral rites which any civilized nation holds for those who have offered their lives is worthy of all our respect. This is not a matter of sovereignty or expression of the exercise of juridictional powers. The Panamanian flag will always be flown in a place of honor as unequivocal proof of its sovereignty.

F. To carry out the purpose of Article III of the treaty assuring the security, efficiency and proper maintenance of the Panama Canal, the Republic of Panama and the United States of America during their respective periods of responsibility for canal operation and maintenance shall, unless the amount of the operating revenues of the canal exceeds the amount needed to carry out the purposes of such article, use such revenues of the canal only for purposes consistent with the purposes of Article III.

One of the basic norms of international law is the sanctity of treaties—faithful compliance with its commitments. The purposes of the neutrality treaty expressed in Article III will be carried out with good faith by Panama. Panama will do this as a basic practice of its foreign policy. What the Senate requests here does not deviate from the rules of international law and from what has always been Panama's practice in its foreign relations. Panama will always act in a way that is consistent with its commitments.

III. Understandings:

A. Paragraph 1C. of Article III of the treaty shall be construed as requiring, before any adjustments in tolls for use of the canal, that the effects of any such toll adjustment on the trade patterns of the two parties shall be given full consideration, including consideration of the following factors in a manner consistent with the regime of neutrality:

1. The costs of operating and maintaining the Panama Canal;

2. The competitive position of the use of the canal in relation to other means of transportation;

3. The interests of both parties in maintaining their domestic fleets;

4. The impact of such an adjustment on the various geographical areas of each of the two parties; and

5. The interest of both parties in maximizing their internal commerce.

The Republic of Panama and the United States shall cooperate in exchanging information necessary for the consideration of such factors.

The factors noted in this understanding are reasonable. Any good administrator of the Panama Canal, in trying to make adjustments to the tolls, must necessarily consider those factors and others deemed appropriate. Panama, as sovereign owner and exclusive administrator of the canal, will make those decisions which it considers most appropriate for the proper operation of the canal and its greatest profitability, taking into account the fact that the canal has competitors and that means which compete with it are under development.

B. The agreement "to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this treaty" in Article IV of the treaty means that either of the two parties to the treaty may, in accordance with its constitutional procedures, take unilateral action to defend the Panama Canal against any threat, as determined by the party taking such action.

C. The determination of "need or emergency" for the purpose of any vessels of war or auxiliary vessel of the United States or Panama going to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the Panama Canal rapidly shall be made by the nation operating such vessel.

These agreements are consistent with the Torrijos-Carter statement of 14 October 1977:

D. Nothing in the treaty, in the annexes of the protocol relating to the treaty, or in any other agreement relating to the treaty obligates the United States to provide any economic assistance, military grant assistance, security supporting assistance, foreign military sales credits or international military education and training to the Republic of Panama.

This understanding is correct. The note which Secretary of State Cyrus Vance sent to Ambassador Gabriel Lewis Galindo on 7 September 1977 contains no obligations of economic aid to Panama. That involves measures to be taken at the discretion of the United States independently of the fate of the treaties.

Panama has always understood that the basic economic benefits granted by the treaty are contained in Articles III and XIII.

E. The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understandings, declarations and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the Government of the Republic of Panama.

This understanding is directed toward the President of the United States rather than Panama. Panama has no objection to this understanding.

RESERVATIONS AND UNDERSTANDINGS INTRODUCED BY THE U.S. SENATE INTO THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

A. Reservations: 1. Pursuant to its adherence to the principle of nonintervention, any action taken by the United States of America in the exercise of its rights to assure that the Panama Canal shall remain open, neutral, secure and accessible, pursuant to the provisions of this treaty and the neutrality treaty and the resolutions of advice and consent thereto, shall be only for the purpose of assuring that the canal shall remain open, neutral, secure and accessible, and shall not have as its purpose nor be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama or interference with its political independence or sovereign integrity.

This reservation is extremely important politically. With it the Senate dissipated the fears which had emerged throughout Latin America that the DeConcini amendment had revived gunboat and big stick diplomacy in this hemisphere. The Senate has reaffirmed the U.S. commitment in multilateral pacts that are treaties—laws regulating not only life on the American continent but throughout the world. Intervention is not a right; it is an international crime.

By virtue of the 1928 Kellogg-Briand Treaty the big powers renounced the use of force as a means to settle conflicts. Based on this pact, the United States, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and France took the Nazi war criminals to the scaffold.

The people of the world consecrated their rejection of the use of force in Article 2.3 of the UN charter; the peoples of America did likewise in Article 20 of the OAS Charter. Additionally, Article 2.4 of the UN Charter and Article 18 of the OAS Charter consecrate the respect for the soverign decisions of each state in matters which, as stipulated by international law, are of their sole domestic purview. These are norms that perfect the principle of nonintervention in the legal sense.

Panama experienced moments of patriotic indignation following the introduction of the so-called DeConcini reservation. Via diplomatic channels the national government firmly expressed its rejection of that amendment as something harmful not only to U.S. relations with Panama but its relations with the entire continent. President Carter and the Senate leaders quickly understood this. The Senate then pointed out that a major tenet of U.S. policy is its adherence to the principle of nonintervention. And this adherence also pertains to the neutrality treaty which is of an indefinite duration. It is necessary to stress that the Senate's definition of U.S. policy in this reservation covers both treaties, which are mentioned specifically in the reservation, so that there would not be the slightest doubt that the DeConcini amendment added to the neutrality treaty would not continue in force. [Es necesario remarcar que la expresion de politica que hace el Senado en esta reserva incluye a ambos tratados, los cuales se mencionan especificamente en esta reserva, para no haya la menor sospecha de que la enmienda DeConcini anadida al tratado de neutralidad sigue viva] What continues in force are the legal commitments of the United States to the UN and OAS charters that forbid intervention.

And further, as the instruments drawn up by one or more parties regarding a treaty (Article 31 of the Vienna convention on treaty laws) are very important for the interpretation of treaties in international law, it is deemed pertinent to transcribe the letter that President Carter sent General Torrijos on 18 April:

"Gen. OMAR TORRIJOS HERRERA,
Chief of Government of Panama.

"DEAR GENERAL TORRIJOS: "A few moments ago the U.S. Senate granted its consent to the second of the Panama Canal treaties that you and I signed in Washington in September of last year.

"The ratification of the new treaties opens a new era in U.S. relations not only with Panama but with all the nations of the hemisphere. Working jointly our two nations can set an example and encourage others in the Americas and elsewhere to work toward just and constructive international cooperation in the pursuit of common goals.

"Precisely because these treaties are so important to our two countries, their negotiation has been drawn out and difficult. The debate in our Senate has been the longest ever in the history of the United States over a treaty and as you know the debate has been vigorous. The treaties have brought to the fore in our nation difficult and emotional subjects removed from the canal and our treaties with Panama, just as in your country patriots of good will have had clearly divergent viewpoints as occurs when one wants to make just transactions to reach common goals of greater importance.

"The patience and patriotism of the people of Panama during this lengthy process has been impressive and has earned the respect of the world. In recent months there have been moments when the outcome was uncertain and there were doubts as to whether the two treaties should be ratified. On our part, these doubts has been set aside.

"With its actions today the Senate has reaffirmed what was important in the treaties from the beginning: that the United States, while safeguarding its interest in a secure, open and accessible canal, does not intend to interfere in the domestic affairs of Panama, its government, its policies or its cultural integrity, nor in any way undermine its sovereignty or its political independence.

"These are the principles that we have always cherished as a nation. We have lived up to them in our relations with other American republics since President Roosevelt proclaimed his adherence to the principle of nonintervention in 1933. Those principles are consecrated as international rights in the UN and OAS charters. Therefore, it is appropriate that those principles, particularly the principle that no nation has the right to interfere in the domestic affairs of another, should be incorporated into the treaties and its related documents, including the Senate resolutions. When we meet to exchange the ratification documents we will be able to reiterate that this principle of nonintervention is clearly accepted by our two countries.

"Respect for the sovereignty and dignity of Panama and the United States must be the basis on which to establish the cooperation and mutual respect that will be decisive for the new kind of relationship that we are about to begin. I want to congratulate and thank you, General Torrijos, for the great courage and leadership you gave the people of Panama while our countries were negotiating this new relationship.

"I look toward the future with great hope and confidence. And, on the personal level, I hope and wish to visit Panama to reaffirm our personal friendship and this new relationship between our two countries.

"Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER."

In this letter, President Carter reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to refrain from intervention in Panama's internal affairs.

2. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this treaty, no funds may be drawn from the U.S. Treasury for payments under Article XIII, Paragraph 4, without statutory authorization.

Panama's right to receive the sums stipulated in Article XIII, Paragraph 4, is very clear. Now, if in order to meet its contractual obligations the United States must follow a domestic legislative procedure, Panama has no objection. What is important is for the United States to meet its obligations in Panama's favor. The domestic mechanism provided for in U.S. legislation is of no concern to Panama.

3. Any accumulated unpaid balance under Paragraph 4 C. of Article XIII at the termination of the treaty shall be payable only to the extent of any operating surplus in the last year of the treaty's duration, and that nothing in that paragraph may be construed as obligating the United States of America to pay after the date of the termination of the treaty any such unpaid balance which shall have accrued before such date.

This is a reservation which contains a correct interpretation of the treaty. Panama has always understood, and so explained to the citizenry at the time, that the budget containing revenues from and expenditures for the operation of the canal would be so drafted as to make the canal commission capable of paying to Panama the sum stipulated in Article XIII, Paragraph 4 C. If for unforeseen reasons this sum were not paid in a certain year, Panama understands that the United States will make an effort to cover that sum in subsequent budgets. Paragraph 4 C. is not symbolic or worthless. The two countries, in good faith, must give it practical content.

For this reason, Panama does not foresee the accumulation of unpaid balances in the year 2000. However, if they did exist, the United States would not be obligated to make such payment to Panama. In summary, there is a clear understanding between the U.S. Senate and the Republic of Panama in this area.

4. Exchange of the instruments of ratification shall not be effective earlier than March 31, 1979, and the treaties shall not enter into force prior to October 1, 1979, unless legislation necessary to implement the provisions of the Panama Canal treaty shall have been enacted by the Congress of the United States of America before March 31, 1979.

Article II provides that the canal treaty" . . . shall enter into force . . . 6 calendar months from the date of the exchange of the instruments of ratification." In view of the above-mentioned reservation, the fact that the instruments are exchanged will not make the treaties effective within 6 months as was previously agreed. The significant ceremony in which the chiefs of government of Panama and the United States will exchange the instruments of ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties will soon take place in Panama. However, the exchange will not be effective until 31 March. The Senate made this decision in order to provide enough time for the legislation to be enacted in the United States for the implementation of the treaties. However, the postponement of the date in which the treaties go into effect—notwithstanding the exchange of the instruments of ratification—is not a change, because in international law there is no obligation to proceed to the exchange of the instruments of ratification of the treaties even if the treaties have been ratified. This is a political decision that is properly made by the body which manages foreign relations. In the specific case of the Torrijos-Carter treaties, the governments of Panama and the United States have the power to choose whatever date they consider most convenient for the exchange of ratification instruments. Panama understands that the deadline for the treaties' entry into force is 1 October 1979; however, it may take place before that date if the U.S. Congress completes, before that date (as published) the legislation to implement the treaties.

5. The instruments of ratification to be exchanged by the United States and the Republic of Panama shall each include provisions whereby each party agrees to waive its rights and release the other party from its obligations under Paragraph 2 of Article XII.

Article XII of the Panama Canal treaty refers to the possibility of building a sea-level canal in Panama or adding a third set of locks to the present canal. There is no question that the subject of a sea-level canal was not introduced into the negotiation at Panama's initiative. This subject was given great importance during the stage of the negotiation which led to the draft treaties of 1967. In the negotiations that began in 1971, the subject remained latent for several years and then it suddenly regained prominence in July 1977. The United States made proposals which Panama vigorously rejected. The United States wanted an option in perpetuity to build a sea-level canal in Panama. This was the main issue discussed at the meeting in Bogata of the presidents of Colombia, Venezuela, Costa Rica and Mexico, the prime minister of Jamaica and the chief of government of Panama. It was there that a formula, basically the one established in Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article XII, was developed.

According to Paragraph 1 of Article XII, for the duration of the treaty, Panama and the United States ". . . commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility . . ." of a sea-level canal in Panama. If after this study the two parties agree that this canal is necessary, they may negotiate the terms of a new treaty for its construction. Therefore, there is no obligation here restricting Panama or placing an obligation on its territory.

Paragraph 2 A. Article XII represents a great concession made by Panama to the United States. Panama pledged not to build a canal or to permit a canal to be built in Panama for the duration of the treaty, that is until the year 2000, without the consent of the United States. Here there is a clear obligation on the territory of Panama which the United States cannot negotiate for 22 years.

Paragraph 2 B. of Article XII places a limitation on the United States in its negotiating capacity. According to this article, the United States cannot negotiate for 22 years with third countries of America on the construction of a canal outside Panama, unless Panama frees it from that limitation.

Paragraphs A. and B. referred to the establishment of a legal equilibrium in the counter-claims [contraprestaciones] of the parties. But in the material aspect, it is obvious that Paragraph 2 is balanced against Panama because it is known that the most adequate routes for building a sea-level canal are in Panama. The disproportion of the distance in the routes of Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Colombia compared to Panama is immense. And it is not only the problem of construction costs but also the length of the routes which delays the transit of ships, which practically excludes the possibility of building a new canal outside Panama. The Senate considered that it was too much for a nation as small as Panama to have a veto over its negotiating capacity. It attributed more value to this than to the concession which Panama accepted in Bogota for the sake of reaching an agreement [transaccion].

Now Panama can, if it so desires and finds adequate financing, build a new canal whenever it deems it appropriate without having to consult the United States. At the same time, the United States is free to negotiate with third countries without Panama's veto.

The formula contained in the reservation, previously agreed upon with Panama, does not alter the treaty. What the two parties will do is that, upon exchanging the ratification instruments, each will waive its right and release one another. The treaty is not modified. If there is a waiving and mutual release of the reciprocal duties and rights agreed to in Paragraph 2, it is because this clause remained unchanged. But the presidents of the two countries will expressly waive the right given their countries by the treaty and will release each other from their obligations regarding the sea-level canal.

By order of Article 277 of the constitution, General Torrijos has the power to direct Panama's foreign relations. In the exercise of this power, he will waive any right which does not have practical significance and will accept the U.S. waiver which is of practical significance to Panama. Now we will have the free disposition of the territory which God placed in the hands of Panamanians and which for well-known historical reasons has been in foreign hands. The monopoly of routes granted to the United States is eliminated forever. An appropriate formula was found so as to avoid commitments with the United States regarding the sea-level canal in Panama.

6. After the date of entry into force of the treaty, the Panama Canal Commission shall, unless otherwise provided by legislation enacted by Congress, be obligated to reimburse the Treasury of the United States of America as nearly as possible for the interest cost of the funds or other assets directly invested in the commission by the Government of the United States of America and for the interest cost of the funds or other assets directly invested in the predecessor Panama Canal Company by the government and not reimbursed before the date of entry into force of the treaty. Such reimbursement of such interest costs shall be made at a rate determined by the secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America and at annual intervals to the extent earned, and if not earned, shall be made from subsequent earnings.

For purposes of this reservation, the phrase "funds or other assets directly invested" shall have the same meaning as the phrase "net direct investment" has under Section 62 of Title 2 of the Canal Zone Code.

This is a duty which the Senate has assigned to the Panama Canal Commission. It is part of the right which Panama gave the United States by virtue of Article III. The responsibility for the operation of the canal rests with the United States. Its rights and duties are exercised and fulfilled through the aforementioned commission.

Aside from the fact that it is evident that the United States has been amortized bountifully, the knowledge of its revenue-raising capacity to cover the Panama Canal costs according to studies by experts contracted especially by U.S. authorities demonstrates that the policy on revenue and expenditures for the canal's operations can be established in such a manner that will satisfy the provisions of this reservation and the income which Panama hopes to receive according to Article XIII, Paragraph 4 B. and C., without significantly affecting the volume of traffic. Therefore, this reservation does not alter what was agreed upon. To the extent that the United States does not violate the principle honoring the treaties in good faith, Panama cannot present claims to the United States.

The most significant point in Article XIII is that the canal will revert to Panama on 31 December 1999, free of debts. This remains unchanged and it is this great achievement which fills the hearts of all Panamanians with joy.

B. Understandings:

1. Nothing in Paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of Article IV may be construed to limit either the provisions of Paragraph 1 of Article IV providing that each party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet any threat to the security of the Panama Canal, or the provisions of Paragraph 2 of Article IV providing that the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the canal for the duration of this treaty.

Here the Senate expresses an understanding that can meet no opposition in Panama. Paragraph 1 of Article IV was explained to Panamanian citizens just as it was outlined by the Senate. Paragraph 2 of Article IV grants to the United States ". . . primary responsibility to protect and defend the canal." However, it is evident that, since the canal is on Panamanian soil, we Panamanians have the greatest interest in defending it. For that reason, the wisest course is for there to be close cooperation between the armed forces of the two countries for the protection of a canal that is of interest to them and to the world.

It is also obvious that the armed forces of the two countries must act in conformity with their respective constitutional processes. In Panama only the assembly of representatives can "declare war and authorize the executive to negotiate for peace." (Article 141, Paragraph 2 of the constitution) In the United States war and peace also depend on the popular will as represented by Congress. Each country has constitutional rules which the armed forces should always respect.

2. Before the first date of the 3-year period beginning on the date of entry into force of this treaty and before each 3-year period following thereafter, the two parties shall agree upon the specific levels and quality of services, as are referred to in Article III, Paragraph 5 of the treaty, to be provided during the following 3-year period and, except for the first 3-year period, on the reimbursement to be made for the costs of such services, such services to be limited to such as are essential to the effective functioning of such canal operating areas and such housing areas referred to in Article III, Paragraph 5 of the treaty. If payments made under Article III, Paragraph 5 of the treaty for the preceding 3-year period, including the initial 3-year period, exceed or are less than the actual costs to the Republic of Panama for supplying, during such period, the specific levels and quality of services agreed upon, then the commission shall deduct from or add to the payment required to be made to the Republic of Panama for each of the following 3 years one-third of such excess or deficit, as the case may be. There shall be an independent and binding audit, conducted by an auditor mutually selected by both parties, of any costs of services disputed by the two parties pursuant to the reexamination of such costs provided for in this understanding.

When the sum that the United States should pay to Panama for police services, fire protection, street maintenance, public lighting, street cleaning, traffic control and garbage collection was set at $10 million, it was believed that this sum represented the real expenses that would be incurred by Panama in providing those services to the areas agreed upon without additional costs to the treasury of Panama, since said services to be assumed by Panama would have originated solely from the existence of the canal and therefore should be considered a canal operating cost. It was not an arbitrary figure, but one duly substantiated by the Panamanian negotiating mission to the U.S. negotiators. It was not a subterfuge to obtain a donation from the United States, but rather an act of justice because of the real expenses which Panama would incur upon reassuming jurisdiction over its territory called the Canal Zone. For this reason, the following adjustment clause was included in Article III:

It is agreed that every 3 years from the date that this treaty enters into force, the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services.

The understanding proposed by the Senate is acceptable. The mechanism of adjustment was established so that Panama will always receive what it spends in providing those services.

3. Nothing in Subparagraph 4C. of Article XIII shall be construed to limit the authority of the United States of America through the United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission to make such financial decisions and incur such expenses as are reasonable and necessary for the management, operation and maintenance of the Panama Canal. In addition, toll rates established pursuant to Paragraph 2D. of Article III need not be set at levels designed to produce revenues to cover the payments to Panama described in Subparagraph 4C. of Article XIII.

This understanding is consistent with the treaty. During the debate which preceded the plebiscite, it was clearly explained that the United States would control the administration of the canal for 22 years by reason of its majority position on the Canal Commission. Article III, Paragraph 2 D. gives the United States the power to "establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment." The two parties agreed, in Article III, Paragraph 1 A. of the Neutrality Treaty that the tolls would be ". . . just, equitable and reasonable, and limited to those necessary for safe navigation and efficient, sanitary operation of the canal."

When the text of Article XIII, Paragraph 4 B. and C. was agreed to, it was evident from a study of the canal operations that the canal produces approximately $16 million annually which comprise the canal's operating revenues [costo de operacion]. The negotiators' understanding was that this figure would serve as a base to cover the payment to Panama of the $10 million guaranteed in Article XIII, Paragraph 4 B. and the additional $10 million agreed to in Article XIII, Paragraph 4 B. and C. these payments being considered as part of the canal's operating revenues. For this reason we are in agreement that the obligations derived from Article XIII, Paragraph 4 B. and C. in favor of Panama can be covered without raising tolls and for this reason we agree with the Senate that it is not imperative to raise tolls to cover these obligations to Panama. By virtue of the principle of good faith which prevails in the observance of the treaties, Panama expects the United States to accommodate its policy on expenditures so that this article can be the means by which Panama receives a fairer retribution for its contribution to the canal work. To the extent that the Panamanian people are satisfied with the canal administration due to the products they derive from it, they will continue protecting their canal. But if a stingy spirit prevails, aggravating the injustice suffered by Panama since 1903, then a circle of friendship will not have been built around the canal but rather one of hatred, with possible grave consequences if a crisis occurs which the national government would be the first to deplore.

4. Any agreement concluded pursuant to Article IX, Paragraph 11, with respect to the transfer of prisoners shall be concluded in accordance with the constitutional processes of both parties.

It is evident that the treatment contemplated in Article IX, Paragraph 11, with respect to the exchange of prisoners will have to be adjusted to the constitutional processes of each country so that it may be effective. There can be no opposition to this understanding.

5. Nothing in the treaty, the annex or agreed minutes relating to the treaty, or in any other agreement relating to the treaty obligates the United States to provide any economic assistance, military aid assistance, security supporting assistance, foreign military sales credits or international military education and training to the Republic of Panama.

This is the correct interpretation. Panama has always understood that there is no provision in the Panama Canal Treaty that obliges the United States to provide Panama with economic assistance or to give it donations.

It is impossible to conceive of obligatory assistance. Solidarity cannot be imposed by decree or by treaties.

6. The President shall include all amendments, reservations, understandings, declarations, and other statements incorporated by the Senate in its resolution of ratification respecting this treaty in the instrument of ratification exchanged with the government of the Republic of Panama.

This is a Senate understanding addressed to the President of the United States. Panama, according to the statements expressed in this document, has accepted the amendments, reservations and understandings which the Senate of the United States attached to the Torrijos-Carter treaties.

Foreign Ministry Conclusions: The previous exposition permits the Foreign Ministry to declare that the Torrijos-Carter treaties with the Senate resolutions:

1. Do not offend the nation's dignity.—The unquestionable fact that the United States must leave the Isthmus of Panama at the latest by 31 December 1999 completes our process of independence and places in our hands the exclusive control of the canal for use as an effective lever for our economic and social development. Also, all prospects of an alleged and obsolete "right" of intervention have been dispelled since the Senate of the United States has reaffirmed in the Church amendment the contents of the Torrijos-Carter declaration, that is, that any action taken by the United States in connection with the Panama Canal "* * * shall not have as its purpose nor be interpreted as a right of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama or interference with its political independence or sovereign integrity."

Nothing can reaffirm our national dignity more than the knowledge that there will be an end to the military occupation of the fatherland almost 100 years after the establishment of the republic.

2. The objectives of the treaty have not been distorted or changed.—The fundamental objective of the liberating negotiations was to agree in the treaty to a clear and categorical program for our liberation. For this reason it was a fundamental objective to agree to a definite date or deadline for the new treaty. What has been the ideal of all Panamanians was realized in Article II, Paragraph 2, of the canal treaty:

"2. This treaty will expire at noon, Panama time, on 31 December 1999."

Greater conciseness and precision cannot be conceived.

Nothing has occurred after the plebiscite which weakens or alters this clause.

Another fundamental objective of the treaty was to obtain the reversion of the canal to Panama free of debts. This was agreed to in Article XIII, Paragraph 1, of the Panama Canal treaty which says:

"Upon termination of this treaty, the Republic of Panama shall assume total responsibility for the management, operation, and maintenance of the Panama Canal, which shall be turned over in operating condition and free of liens and debts, except as the two parties may otherwise agree."

What was stated here and which our people understood certainly as a great achievement in the path of our liberation has not been distorted or diminished.

Other fundamental achievements of the negotiatons are the abrogation of the 1903 treaty and its amendments (Article I) and the resumption by Panama of its exclusive jurisdiction throughout all national territory (Article XI). The amendments contained in the Senate resolutions have not tarnished these definitive achievements of our people.

3. Nothing will prevent Panama from effective exercise of its sovereignty throughout all its territory.—The position of the U.S. Government during the Senate debates was that the United States has no sovereignty in the Canal Zone. Carter has spoken firmly in defense of Panama's traditional thesis. This position has cleared this legal problem in the minds of the American people. In keeping with this position, Article XI establishes that Panama will resume total jurisdiction in the Canal Zone when the treaty enters into force. U.S. jurisdictional rights, the only thing it possessed in Panama, will end on that date. The Senate debate and the firm position of the Senate majority have reaffirmed Panamanian sovereignty, which will be exercised effectively by Panama when the treaty goes into effect, because this treaty eliminates the so-called Canal Zone government. The anachronism of two governments in a single territory, as was stressed with patriotic zeal by President Demetrio Basilio Lakas in a meeting with President Nixon in 1971, has been brought to an end.

4. Great national objectives have been achieved.—By virtue of the generational alpinism spoken of very properly so by the chief of government, all generations of isthmians have contributed their ideas, efforts and sacrifices. Each Panamanian has been a volunteer soldier in the common task of liberation. Beginning with the note by Jose Domingo de Obaloia and Eusebio A. Morales in 1904, which best expresses our legal arguments, up to the tragic event of the January martyrs—22 Panamanian heroes offered their lives and gave an everlasting cry of Panama's wish to be sovereign and free—it can be said that Panama has sought to:

A. Abrogate the 1903 treaty;

B. Recover the patrimony constituted by Panama's geographic position and its isthmian configuration to exploit the most important natural resource given to it by God, that is, to exploit to its maximum transit operations of the canal, the railroad and ports under its exclusive control and administration;

C. Reincorporate the Canal Zone into the rest of the fatherland's territory;

D. End the U.S. civilian and military presence;

E. Place the canal under a system which will guarantee the transit of ships of all flags on equal conditions and isolate the canal from any public controversy; and

F. Train qualified personnel in technical matters to assume responsibility for the canal's administration to the fullest extent possible.

The Foreign Ministry can state with satisfaction that the fundamental objectives which were imbedded in the national soul have basically been achieved. Unfortunately, all of these objectives will not be achieved immediately. It involves a liberation program that will be completed in 22 years, because the treaty is the product of negotiations in which reciprocal concessions were made. All Panamanians would like this term to be shorter, but we were able to achieve only that which is established in the treaties, despite the titanic and persistent efforts of our negotiator.

As always, Bolivar's ideals are timely here: "Let us seek a medium between those extremes which could lead us to the same obstacles, to unhappiness, to dishonor. I dare to give the results of my thoughts about the future fate of America: not the best fate, but the most feasible."

Simon Bolivar Reply from a South American to a Gentleman of This Island, Henry Cullen.

The achievements obtained in the negotiations are conquests which belong to the Panamanian people. They cannot be destroyed or renounced but can be taken to their ultimate culmination by future generations. Let us strengthen these conquests, the most feasible now and, when better circumstances for struggle exist, we will again undertake the task to improve the terms of the relationship. Let us think always of generational alpinism, of the contribution of each generation to the nation, to its progress and sustained growth. The forebears have bequeathed us a fatherland. Let us work for it each day.

The national government has reached the conclusion that the treaties unquestionably achieve, within a reasonable period of time, the fundamental objectives of the Panamanian nation. Because of this, the national government will consent to the exchange of the instruments of ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties. With the entry into force of the treaties, better instruments of struggle will be placed in the hands of the republic. With them, Panama will continue its efforts so that the national objectives will be realized in a shorter period of time by virtue of opportune and patriotic negotiations that the governments of the future will undertake.

The Foreign Ministry has faith in the capacity for struggle of the Panamanians. It also has faith that with time the U.S. public will better understand Panama's reasons for insisting on an improvement in the terms of its contractual relationship with the United States. This will facilitate the future decisions of the U.S. Government in its relations with Panama. The North American people are a just people. Some of their leaders have shown courage, patriotism and a clear sense of history. The Torrijos-Carter treaties are evident achievements in our liberation struggle, but they are not the final phase.

Upon agreeing to the terms of the protocol of the instruments of ratification of each treaty, Panama will reaffirm its right to self-determination, respect for its territorial integrity and political independence and its rejection of all forms of intervention in its internal affairs and will ask the United States to reaffirm its commitments in accordance with the UN and OAS charters.

Let us view the future with optimism because each Panamanian is struggling to hasten the liberation process. The rulers and those who are ruled should utilize to the maximum the favorable opportunities which present themselves to promote the common good. Panama opportunely utilized the process of decolonization and made itself part of it with reciprocal solidarity. We went to the Third World and the nonalined countries and we obtained the necessary support so that the whole world could understand Panama's liberation cause. Thanks to the persistent work of the Foreign Ministry, we concluded the negotiation with the treaties. No one can deny that the Torrijos-Carter treaties contain great and positive advances for Panama in the poltical and economic spheres. We have reached levels in our liberation process that place us very near the summit.

We are sure that we will climb the summit of perfecting our independence on 31 December 1999 without bringing anguish or mourning to the hearts of Panamanian mothers.

We Panamanians have followed with great interest the debates in the U.S. Senate. The Spanish version of the debates reached our homes by radio. All of us were able to perceive the intense opposition against the treaties in the Senate. At no time was it certain that the treaties would be approved with or without amendments. It is evident that no one in Panama or the United States can predict that the next Senate will be better than the current one. The Panamanian citizenry ratified the treaties on 23 October 1977 and it will again ratify them with the national jubilation that will reign when President Carter and General Torrijos sign in Panama the protocols of exchange of the ratification instruments.

We assume full responsibility for the acceptance of the treaties with the conviction, firmness and encouragement that patriotism and the dedication to the cause of Panama's liberation give us.

Panama and the United States have wanted and sought a friendly and peaceful solution. This was achieved after 14 years of intense negotiations in which Panamanian nationalism saw the flowering of its best ideas. It is now up to all Panamanians, architects and beneficiaries of the treaties, to enjoy these benefits in a climate of peace and national unity.

Panama, 25 April 1978, Foreign Ministry.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUMPERS). There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, June 7, beginning at 4:30 p.m. to hold confirmation hearings on the judicial nomination for the U.S. District of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NUCLEAR TEST BAN: ANOTHER TREATY BLUNDER?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Carter administration's efforts to conclude a 5-year total ban on nuclear weapons testing raises a number of serious questions about the advisability of rushing into an accord of this type at this particular time.

In the wake of serious controversy and doubts about the administration's judgment in the Panama Canal and SALT Treaty negotiations, one is inclined to ask: Are we about to blunder into another treaty fiasco, without the proper reflection and precautions? The Panama Canal Treaty passed the Senate with one vote to spare. With the SALT Treaty debate near at hand, chances for approval appear slim at this time. Most of the major doubts surrounding both of these treaties centered on negotiating concessions by the administration, and the absence of effective guarantees to safeguard national security interests.

Perhaps, therefore, the President would be well advised to reflect at length upon these aspects before plunging forward into yet another treaty of questionable value and uncertain equitability. Columnist George F. Will, in a commentary appearing in the Washington Post on June 4, suggests that "Government today has a parching thirst for the appearance of achievement that will dispel doubts, including self-doubts about its competence." If this is, in fact, the case, then the track record for this administration thus far has not been good.

If initial indications are accurate, the proposed total test ban on all nuclear weapons may have an even more difficult route to ratification. Its implications for U.S. national security are alarming. As Will notes, "The proposal is unverifiable and asymmetrical in its consequences." He suggests that this administration may believe that "unequal restraints on the United States are valuable because U.S. weapons are a threat, and perhaps the principal threat, to peace."

To conclude such an accord at this time, particularly in the midst of continuing concern about the SALT II negotiations, could be a serious mistake for our country, and for this administration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of George Will's column "The Test-Ban Quest," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 4, 1978]

THE TEST-BAN QUEST

Government today has a parching thirst for the appearance of achievement that will dispel doubts, including self-doubts, about its competence. That thirst probably explains, in part, the Carter administration's decision to ask the Soviet Union to agree to a five-year ban on testing nuclear weapons. Another explanation is that the administration is untroubled by asymmetrical consequences of cosmetically symmetrical agreements.

A full test ban would be unverifiable; it would prevent the United States from conducting appropriate tests to confirm the continued reliability of nuclear-weapons stockpiles; and it would jeopardize the U.S. ability to maintain its competence in nuclear-weapons technology.

Testing in the atmosphere has been banned for 15 years. In 1974, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to a 150-kiloton limit on underground tests. There would be little opposition to lowering the threshold drastically perhaps to 5 kilotons.

But at approximately that point a limit becomes unverifiable. The threshold of detection depends, in part, on whether testing takes place in rock or porous soil. But significant tests can involve blasts too small or muffled to distinguish from earthquakes and other seismic events that produce "background noise" in the earth. And a single test is normally enough to confirm a new weapon design or the reliability of old weapons.

When fighting for confirmation as arms negotiator, Paul Warnke said he believed that "an agreement which is not verifiable is worse than no agreement." Of course, the Soviets will agree to on-site inspection of a minimal, face-saving sort—sufficient, that is, to save face for U.S. negotiators.

But it is inconceivable that the Soviets will accept thorough, rigorous inspection and mechanical verification measures of the sort that would be necessary to prevent the administration's proposal from being "worse than no agreement." The Soviet Union has not thoroughly transformed its traditional attitudes about inspection. So, a depressing aspect of the test-ban debate in the United States will be the administration's unavailing struggle to maintain its intellectual integrity while arguing for its own proposal.

A complete test ban would be imprudent because it would prevent not only U.S. testing for new developments, but also "proof testing" of the sort needed to maintain confidence in the reliability of the deterrent. Nuclear weapons are extraordinarily complex and are composed of materials subject to deterioration. Unpredictable things go wrong. Checks of some U.S. weapons have revealed problems that have required significant corrective work, including final "proof tests."

Were a complete test ban verifiable by U.S. technical means, or were the Soviet Union an open society in which cheating by the government might be leaked to an alert and independent press, the end of "proof testing" might be acceptable, and even advantageous to the United States. The mutual degradation of nuclear stockpiles over several decades might enhance deterrence because it would inhibit planning for an aggressive war.

But the Soviet Union is not an open society, and it is not fastidious about adhering to international agreements. So an unverifiable ban on testing would be asymmetrical, and detrimental to the United States.

It also would involve another unacceptable asymmetry: It would complicate—but only for the United States—the conservation of scientific skills important to national security. It would make nuclear-weapons development an uninteresting profession, and U.S. scientists and laboratories would increasingly confine themselves to other tasks. But the Soviet government can order scientists around, as it does other conscript labor.

It is said that a United States-Soviet agreement not to test would discourage nuclear proliferation because non-nuclear nations would feel inhibited in testing and hence, in development. But many of the nations that could choose to develop nuclear weapons—South Africa, South Korea, Taiwan, Israel, Pakistan, Iran—have hitherto considered their security closely linked to U.S. policy. For such nations, the strongest incentive to develop nuclear weapons—much stronger than the hypothetical, inhibiting power of a United States-Soviet test ban—is doubt about the reliability of the United States. Such doubt is intensified by U.S. proposals as imprudent as the administration's test-ban proposal.

Given that the proposal is unverifiable and asymmetrical in its consequences, the most plausible explanation of it is that the administration believes unequal restraints on the United States are valuable because U.S. weapons are a threat, and perhaps the principal threat, to peace. And the administration probably believes that reducing the 150-kiloton threshold by "only" 145 kilotons would contaminate its "achievement." This parched administration's method of quenching its thirst for achievement only deepens doubt about its judgment.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the International Wheat Agreement, to which the United States is a signatory, expires this summer. The International Wheat Council has been meeting to negotiate a new agreement to replace the current one, but to date the meetings have not produced anything which would be acceptable to all sides.

The chief difference stems from the fact that the European Community wants a wheat agreement including maximum and minimum prices and insists also on a coarse grains agreement, as well as some "understanding" on dairy products and meat. The U.S. position has been that it could not support such a wheat agreement since it would not work. Also, the United States would not participate in a coarse grains agreement for the same reason and because it would be trade restrictive. Both these positions had been recommended by the advisory committees created to provide counsel to the U.S. negotiators. The other members of the Council supported the U.S. position, and the European Community appeared to be virtually alone.

The U.S. position was sound, since our experience with fixed wheat price agreements has proved the United States is always the loser. There is really no good economic reason why the United States should be a participant in an international wheat agreement with maximum and minimum prices. It is a loser.

The United States is by far the dominant supplier of coarse grains to the world. There are fewer countries which import coarse grains than there are countries which import wheat. The U.S. farmer does not need nor does he want to have an international organization telling him when and under what conditions he may export his grain.

It is not difficult to understand why the European Community's position would not be easily acceptable to the rest of the world. During periods of world shortages it was not the restrictive practices of the European Community which served world needs but the free marketing system of the United States. Anything which restricts the U.S. ability to determine its own export policy would not be in the best interests of all the world grain importers.

Lately there are, nevertheless, strong indications that the United States has backed away from its position and appears ready to accede to the European Community on virtually all the points on which the Community has insisted and which the United States had indicated were unacceptable. The administration appears, furthermore, to be pursuing this course without even having informed the advisory committees in advance that it was changing its position. If this is so, it is irresponsible behavior, since the advisory committees were foreseen in the Trade Act legislated by Congress as the means by which the administration might receive the technical advice of the involved and interested industry. We understand that the administration appears to be somewhat disturbed about the lack of support from the industry for its position. This is shocking, for it suggests that they are not being guided by the expressed interests of the industry but rather would like to have the industry accept quietly what it is the administration wants.

There is, furthermore, no indication that the U.S. negotiators would receive anything in return which would be of benefit to the U.S. farmers or the rest of the U.S. economy. The vague suggestions of what the European Community might be willing to offer in return by way of increased access to the European Community for U.S. grains are too nebulous and, even if they were to be realized, would be almost completely insignificant. There is no indication that the European Community would or even could permit greater access for U.S. grains into the Community. There is no indication that the Community would discontinue its very disruptive trade practices, such as its highly subsidizing flour exports, a practice which has made it impossible for U.S. flour millers to compete in the world flour markets. This has cost U.S. farmers and U.S. flour millers millions of dollars in lost export opportunities.

The U.S. farmer deserves better than national prices, with all the trappings of maximum and minimum levels.

I find it odd, furthermore, that although the administration continues to pay lipservice to expanding agricultural exports, it concentrates in areas where it has long since reached the point of diminishing returns. The United States should be looking into new areas into which to expand exports, and yet the administration continues policies which are trade restrictive in the areas which offer the greatest growth potential. There are bills now before the Congress, with strong bipartisan support, designed to expand U.S. agricultural exports, particularly into the Eastern Bloc countries. The administration has, however, not seen fit to support this effort. Instead the administration appears to have chosen to sacrifice the U.S. farmer's sovereignty over the marketing of his grains merely in order to be able to state that it was able to conclude a negotiation with the European Community, which offers nothing in exchange. What the European Community is proposing is obviously in the interests of the Community farmers, rather than those of the U.S. farmers.

We can understand that the Office of the Special Trade Representative would like to be able to come back from Geneva suggesting that they had successfully completed the round of trade negotiations. We can also understand that it would be a little easier for the administration to meet the demands of protesting farmers by responding that they must adhere to the provisions of an international agreement.

I recall all too well the experience in 1967, when the U.S. negotiators returned from Geneva with the now infamous International Grains Agreement as the only thing which the United States had obtained in the negotiations. It was touted as being very good for the U.S. farmers, but even those who strongly backed it then denounced it promptly after they left Government, calling it a very poor agreement for the United States. It cost the U.S. farmers a great deal in lost wheat exports, permitting other exporting countries to make inroads into the markets the United States had worked for years to obtain. It cost the U.S. citizen millions of dollars in lost revenue from imports. I would not like to see that happen again. It would be irresponsible to support any action which could restrict our exports, depriving the farmers of the right to obtain their income through the export markets and depriving the U.S. citizen of the necessary foreign exchange and the support for the declining value of the U.S. dollar.

I suggest that before the U.S. negotiators agree to any proposals that the Congress and the farmers be advised what it is the administration is negotiating. Otherwise we could find ourselves in the position of having to reject a proposed treaty which is contrary to the interest of U.S. agriculture. I will propose that we invite Mr. Strauss to give him the opportunity to explain to the Congress what it is they are negotiating, what it is they expect to get in return, and if it is indeed what the trade advisory committees have recommended. If not, why not?

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

(Routine morning business transacted and additional statements submitted are printed later in today's RECORD.)

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

If not, morning business is closed.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUMPERS). Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, H.R. 8410, which will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 8410) to amend the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen the remedies and expedite the procedures under such act.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been very concerned with some of the aspects of this particular bill, as everyone knows. I thought this afternoon I should list some facts against labor law reform and especially with regard to the economic impact against small business and frankly against the country as a whole.

All of our surveying to date demonstrates that the impact of passage of labor law legislation will be disastrous to the economy.

Pierre Rinfret's recently released economic study highlights specific impact on inflation, wages, and small business.

Each increase of 10 percent in unionization would bring with it a 3-percent hike in the rate of inflation. It is clear that the proposed legislation would tend to dramatically increase the general inflationary trend of the United States which now appears to be about 7 percent, with wholesale and consumer price increase rates currently close to double digit levels.

The major economic burden of this legislation would be borne by small business. Taking 250 or less workers as a definition—and that may be too few—small business accounts for 66 percent of total U.S. employment. In addition, the "make whole" provision of the proposed legislation would have a particularly adverse impact on small business. Compensation in such cases would be based on wage and benefit scales negotiated with establishments of 5,000 or more employees.

Of the 12 States studied, each shows the same damaging impact on both inflation and small business.

Dr. Rinfret's study is, we think, a unique study and probably the first really effective economic impact analysis of legislation in the United States.

Jack Carlson, chief economist of the Chamber of Commerce, has done a State-by-State analysis which proves the economic consequences on passage of this bill.

If enacted, the bill would add to cost-push inflation.

The higher labor cost would cause consumer price levels to increase at least 3.6 percent by 1985, and mean higher inflationary rates causing a great loss of purchasing power for an average family of four.

Dr. Carlson goes on further and states that labor costs for small businesses could increase more rapidly because they are less unionized now, because of small business failures and mergers and, thus, less competition.

Dr. Carlson indicates that each State could be hurt as Carlson has shown in analyzing each State's impact.

Cost of implementing the legislation is exorbitant as revealed by the Irving study.

A recent study produced by the NLRB general counsel, John Irving, indicates that a minimum of an additional $30 million is needed to support the implementation of this bill during the first year alone. The money is needed to handle management, enforcement litigation, and administrative cost.

That is only part of it, because the President has indicated that he wants an additional $12 million on top of the $33 million for a total of $45 million, which is 51 percent more than the budget of last year for one of the most efficient agencies in Government which has been very capable in handling its work primarily because of voluntary compliance between management and labor leading to the effective settlement of almost all of the matters brought before the Board.

Should this bill be passed no one has indicated just what economic impact would ensue as a result of the lack of voluntary compliance which heretofore we have taken for granted and which will become as a matter of fact in the future.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield.

YEAS AND NAYS ORDERED ON AMENDMENT NO. 2254

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this same NLRB study said unions can be expected to intensify organizational efforts in plants and industries which are now unorganized. The cost impact analysis directly refutes the claims of S. 2467 proponents that the bill is in keeping with regulatory reform.

Therefore, I think it is important to point out to everyone concerned that the economic impact of this bill has only been partially examined and the bill is found wanting even on those partial examinations.

If you start to figure in the actual costs of the lack of voluntary compliance, which will inevitably ensue as a result of the enactment of this bill, you are talking about billions of dollars, a clogging of the Board, even if you do add the two extra members, which are not needed at this time under the present law, which is very fair to both sides, and you are asking about delays that the poor unfortunate employees have never had before.

Perhaps the offsetting balance would be the intimidation effect on business management throughout our country, because when they are faced with losing their businesses as a result of Federal contract debarment, the blacklisting by the Federal Government, and putting men and women out of work as a result of just one of the more heinous aspects of this bill, with the accompanying possibility of losing their businesses, they may very well have to capitulate, which seems to me to be one of the problems of this bill—forced capitulation in the marketplace rather than free and open competition which, of course, has been the hallmark of our society.

With regard to public opinion, the analysis of every major public opinion poll shows antiunion attitudes. I think that is unfortunate. I hate to see antiunion attitudes throughout the country, because I do not think that that is proper.

Having been raised in the union movement myself, having earned my journeyman's certificate, having worked in the building trades for 10 years as a member of the AFL–CIO, and having studied the growth of unionization in America and the importance of that growth, I think it is unfortunate that there is an antiunion attitude throughout the country, even among union people.

But I submit that antiunion attitude has been caused by Washingtonian labor union leaders and their repetitive demands for excessive legislation, which leads to more inflation, higher costs, more domination of our society by a bureaucracy created by them, an inordinate special interest control over the Presidency, the Congress, and the bureaucracy.

I believe without the union movement we would have a rich class and a poor class in America, just those two classes. We would not have the great advent and rise of the middle class. So I compliment those early union leaders who fought so hard to develop the union system so that people would have an opportunity of organizing together to stand against what was at that time an almost impenetrable management.

I think, however, that no one who is listening here today or who will read this hereafter would disagree with the statement, except the most adamant union leaders, that the pendulum has swung too far, that the balance, the incredibly important balance, between management and labor has now swung as a result of governmental domination here in Washington by the Washingtonian labor union leaders to the special interest side of big labor here in Washington.

Now, with regard to public opinion, although I disagree that the public should have an antiunion attitude, the polls indicate that they do, and I submit that the reason they do is, because of the approaches by big labor, not the least of which is the bill before us today, which is almost an unconscionable call for power—not call, demand for power—by our Washingtonian labor union leaders who, I think, very seldom really think of what is best for the men and women who work in America, including those who do not belong to labor unions, and what bothers me is that they promulgated this bill under the guise that they really are trying to give the working men and women of America a right to choose which, incidentally, they have right now, and which works very well right now, and which has worked well for 43 years under the National Labor Relations Act, which would be turned upside down by this bill.

PUBLIC OPINION

The polls reviewed include U.S. News & World Report, Opinion Research Corp. (ORC), Gallup, Harris, Roper, Yankelovich, and the Cambridge Research report. The polls show little support for Federal legislation which would make it easier for unions to organize nonunion workers.

The ORC poll shows very little support (22 percent) exists among the general public for passage of such Federal legislation.

State polls have been completed by ORC for some 12 States. Each reveals a uniformity in opposition to the bill.

The U.S. News poll shows that a minority of household heads are in favor of making it easier for unions to organize (only 24 percent); 59 percent of the public do not think the Federal Government should make it easier for unions to organize workers. Fifty-eight percent disagree with the proposition that if a company has a union, all new workers should be required to join the union to keep their jobs. In fact, the proposal to make it easier for unions to organize fails to win a majority support from current union members. In general, the public favors the enactment of laws that might curb union power and protect employees' rights in unionization and collective bargaining practices.

What about the press against labor law "reform?"

To date we have over 1,000 editorials from across the country expressing opposition to enactment of labor law reform legislation. A compendium of over 600 editorials was distributed just prior to spring recess. The second volume is planned for distribution in mid-May. We have welcomed the support of the National Newspapers Association, the American Newspaper Publishers Association, and the National Association of Broadcasters.

People know that these organizations very seldom come out against any type of legislation unless it is so bad that they have to, and that is why they have come out against this legislation, even though at the present time we are being sold a bill of goods that this is just a modest bill, it does not do very much. To put it in the words of former great Senator Richard Russell, he said that he was always concerned about these "itty-bitty bills that don't help nobody and don't hurt nobody." That is what they are trying to foist on America today.

With regard to the National Labor Relations Board, I would just like to say that it is a highly efficient organization. It hardly needs an additional two members, and it hardly needs the aspect of this bill to give it even more trouble than it has had in the past. It has been able to handle its business.

NLRB HIGHLY EFFICIENT

An analysis of the NLRB report on its operations disclosed that the agency is run efficiently, quickly resolves disputes, and focuses the majority of attention on small business.

NLRB cut its backlog by a thousand cases last year—52,943 cases in 1977; the Board closed 53,908 cases, which is pretty interesting.

The median time at regional offices in cases from the time of charge to the issuance of complaint was 48 days. This compares with 55 days in 1976. Over 85 percent of all unfair labor practice cases are disposed of prior to the issuance of a complaint and 94.5 percent of all such cases were closed prior to any hearing. Unions won 46 percent of the 9,484 certification and decertification elections, management, 54 percent. If the truth is known that is the real reason for the bill, or at least one of the major reasons for the bill.

The focus of the NLRB is small business. Approximately 75 percent of all representation elections involved 59 or fewer employees. About 85 percent involved less than 100 employees and 94 percent less than 200 employees.

On that particular point labor has made and promulgated the half-truth that 78 percent of all business is not covered by this bill, the fact of the matter is the businesses that are not covered by this bill are either sole proprietorships, businesses owned by one person, who is his own employee, which cannot be organized anyway, or businesses that have such a small employee unit that the unions would not make any effort to organize them under the law.

So the fact of the matter is that that half-truth ignores the full truth which is that although sole proprietorships and businesses which are too small to be organized will not be covered by this bill, which any reasonable person would expect, 76 to 80 percent of all employees in this society are covered by this bill, and that is the significant telling statistic that I think everybody knows.

That, I think, is what is wrong with the amendment pending, because the amendment basically does not change what has heretofore been the law pursuant to the rule of the National Labor Relations Board. It just perpetuates the law which was going to perpetuate it anyway and not change it.

In analyzing S. 2467, Edward B. Miller, former Chairman of the NLRB, in an administrative appraisal of the NLRB, concluded that the efficient operations of NLRB will be slowed down, with litigation increasing and hearing schedules clogged. Thus, he concluded, both representation and unfair labor practice cases "would be substantially delayed."

I am going to talk a little bit later about the rulemaking power which this bill would give to the Board, which could cause a tremendous loss in the voluntary compliance which has been the hallmark of the efficient operation of the National Labor Relations Board, to the detriment of every employee, every union, and every business in America, and yet they continue to ignore that fact.

The General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, John Irving, has said, and said it very clearly, that if this bill is passed, there will be almost immediately a huge increase in cases, a huge increase in elections, a huge increase in contested litigation before the Board, and a huge increase in contested unfair labor practice litigation, and that the voluntary compliance upon which they have relied for years and years would not work in the future.

Mr. President, on Wednesday, May 24, 1978, in an editorial published in the Tarrytowns and Irvington Daily News entitled "Workers Resist Union," written by Marge Leahy, a staff writer, she states:

Teamsters Local 458 is picketing the Able II Mix Concrete Corp. in Irvington in an effort to unionize the company's four workers who are resisting unionization.

Union pickets are blocking deliveries, thus forcing the business at 24 N. Astor St., to shut down, reported Mitch Feinglass, president of the three-year-old non-union company.

Pickets, seated in cars because of rain, refused to comment today on their actions and directed inquiries to the Elmsford headquarters. Arthur Revellese, local secretary-treasurer and union spokesman, could not be reached for comment.

Signs attached to cars read: "Drivers working for Able Concrete do not receive wages and other conditions established as good as those by Teamsters 496."

"I have no hope of survival," Feinglass said, if the union action continues. "I'm a small business. I have no hope against a multi-million dollar union."

Union drivers of supply trucks will not cross picket lines, Feinglass said, and he has not been able to deliver concrete to his jobs since mid-Tuesday because of a lack of materials.

He said he had no objection to his men joining the union, if that were their choice, but "Im not going to force my men to sign up for the union." He believes his men should have the option to decide.

I might interpolate here that there are a lot of employers who do not feel the same way as Mr. Feinglass, who would just deliver their employees over to the union—that happens every day—rather than lose their businesses.

One Able Mix employee, driver Robert Williams of Wilton, Conn., said, "I think they are trying to do me out of a job. We go union. We go to the bottom of the list. They'll be working and I'll be out of a job."

Williams said that union members do not work for any one firm, but work as needed on a number of jobs which are handed out on a seniority basis.

Another worker, Frank Kavanah of Elmsford, said, "I'm guaranteed work all year. If we were union, no work, no pay." On rainy days, they wouldn't be working, he said, noting that Feinglass provides work on off-days.

Robert Aluisio, of Hastings, said, "We were happy with things the way they were." A fourth driver was absent.

While each is listed as drivers, they agreed they did other tasks, helping each other as necessary with loading or other tasks. Union drivers, they claimed, do not perform other tasks or even polish their trucks.

The picketing came as a surprise to Feinglass on Monday. He said he immediately went to the union headquarters to determine the reason for the picketing.

Feinglass said he was given no options other than unionizing and was told by Revellese that the union cared about providing jobs for its members, not about Feinglass's employees.

The drivers also felt that the high wages a union worker is paid would necessitate their working less time. Feinglass was uncertain of exactly what the increase would be if unionized.

Feinglass does not yet know what his next step will be or whether he will ever be able to compensate for the lost business.

In a followup article published the next day, Ms. Leahy reports:

The Able II Mix Concrete Corp. in Irvington, shut down by pickets from Teamsters Local 456, filed a complaint Wednesday with the National Labor Relations Board protesting union action in trying to organize the company's drivers.

The complaint also seeks to provide the chance for the four employees—who said they oppose unionizing—to vote on joining the Teamsters, according to Donald Hulnick, company attorney. Such a vote, under NLRB supervision, could occur within 10 days, Hulnick said.

The effect of the picketing has been to close the plant because trucks bringing supplies Able II needs are not crossing pickets. As a result, the company has been shut down since mid-Tuesday when supplies on hand ran out.

The company's complaint is over the effect of the Teamster pickets. If the pickets are there just to point out the difference between union and company wages and not to seek union members, the company said there is no reason for the Teamsters to interfere with company operations.

The company said, however, unionizing is the issue. The company claimed it is paying fair and adequate wages which satisfy their employees.

Signs carried by the pickets indicate that the wages paid by the concrete mix company are not prevailing union wages and do not mention unionization efforts.

However, the pickets were said to have told the four Able drivers in general terms that union membership would mean higher wages and larger benefits.

The first contact that the Elmsford union made with the company or its drivers about the proposal was on Monday when the Teamsters showed up with pickets, according to the company's owners, Mitch Feinglas and Robert Neublatt. Neublatt further said that the workers said they had not been contacted at all previously about joining the union.

Feinglas, upon seeing the pickets, immediately went to the union hall to determine the reason for picketing. He said he spoke with Arthur Revellese, secretary-treasurer and union spokesman, who showed him a contract for union membership to sign, but was not permitted to take the document from the Elmsford hall to show to his lawyer. Feinglas did not sign it, and then left.

Revellese has not returned phone calls inquiring about the issue.

Meanwhile, Able II drivers criticized the tactics used. "I don't think this is the way to go about it," complained Aluisio, stating they could not perform their job. "Union representatives should have first come in to talk with us."

He did say the pickets have acted in a gentlemanly manner.

Co-worker Frank Kavanah agreed although he said that the union picketing was a practical way for the Teamsters to force the issue. Two other drivers were absent early this morning.

All the drivers had discussed union membership, Kavanah said. "Sure, we'd like to make more money, but it wouldn't be practical for us. On rainy days, I'd just be sitting." No work could be guaranteed on off-days and therefore no pay, he said, adding that at Able II there was job security knowing he could work year-round.

Mr. President, I am delighted to yield to the majority leader, without losing my right to the floor and without any subsequent remarks being considered a second speech under the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Utah.

INTENTION TO FILE CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I shall send to the desk later today a cloture motion, and I ask unanmious consent that the 1 hour under the cloture rule begin running on Wednesday at 4 o'clock p.m., notwithstanding the fact that the Senate, if this request is agreed to and if a subsequent request concerning the cloture motion is agreed to, will not be in session tomorrow.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, the arrangement that the distinguished majority leader is now propounding has been discussed with me, and I believe it is the best arrangement we could make, especially in view of the desire unanimously held on both sides to omit a session of the Senate tomorrow in respect for our late colleague, Senator ALLEN. So there will be no objection to setting a time at 5 o'clock on Wednesday—that is, an hour after 4 o'clock, to comply with the rules—for the first cloture vote.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May I say that the vote itself would occur, as the distinguished minority leader knows, after the establishment of a quorum, for which the clerk would begin to call the roll at 5 o'clock.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be authorized to offer a second cloture motion today, and that it be voted on on Thursday of this week, at a time which will later be agreed upon, notwithstanding the fact that if this request were consented to, there will be no session tomorrow during which I could offer the cloture motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, once again I will not object. This also is to accommodate the Senate in respect to the funeral ceremonies for Senator ALLEN. As I understand, then, under the rules, if we can agree on a time to vote on Thursday, it will be 1 hour after we have convened or after the establishment of the presence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I will say to the distinguished majority leader that I would hope that we can agree on a time for a vote on Thursday in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished minority leader, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. The majority leader is certainly welcome. I am delighted to yield to him.

At this point, I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Idaho is recognized.

THE EVILS OF DEBARMENT

Mr. MCCLURE. We debate today the issue of amending the National Labor Relations Act. Proponents of such an amendment process indicate that these amendments are not radical changes from present law, but rather simply fine tuning which will allow for a better running of our industrial-labor relations in this country. In all due respect to these reformers I cannot accept this fatuous line of argument. This bill, Senate bill 2467, drastically affects the balance of power between labor and management. Furthermore, it infringes upon an independent employee's right to either accept or reject union representation. This bill is not an attempt to reform as much as it is an abortion of our previous understanding of the function of Government in labor relations. A particular provision of this bill is illustrative of how far the proponents of this bill wish the Government to go in order to intimidate all employers from questioning any policies or demands that a union may make. The language of the debarment provision from the House's version of the so-called labor reform bill is as follows:

To amend the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, to strengthen the remedial provisions of the act against repeated or flagrant transgressors.

(n) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in a willful and flagrant unfair labor practice, and/or has engaged in or is engaging in a pattern or practice, of unfair labor practices designed to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7; and, whenever the general counsel has reasonable cause to believe that such charge is true, he shall include the allegation in the complaint issued pursuant to section 10(b): Provided, That no allegation of a pattern or practice of unfair labor practices shall be based on any unfair labor practice occurring more than three years prior to the filing of the charge with the board. If it is determined, upon completion of the procedures available in section 10 (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), and (g), that a person has engaged in a willful or flagrant unfair labor practice and/or a pattern or practice of unfair labor practices designed to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 7, the Labor Board shall certify the identity of the person to the Comptroller General who shall distribute a list to all agencies of the United States containing the names of persons found by the Labor Board to have engaged in willful and flagrant unfair labor practices and /or a pattern or practice of unfair labor practices. No contracts shall be awarded to such person, or to any firm, corporation, partnership, or association in which such person has a controlling interest, until three years have elapsed from the date of the Labor Board certification; unless, the agency of the United States concerned, after notice and opportunity for hearing to all interested parties, certifies to the Labor Board that there is no other source for the material or services furnished by the person affected by the Labor Board order."

The effect of debarment is even more severe. The Secretary of Labor is given the authority to impose and cancel these harsh debarment penalties and it is dangerous to leave such sweeping authority in the control of one Government official. Furthermore, the Senate version of this reform bill has evolved a blacklisting concept that is particularly extreme and excessive. The debarment provision in the Senate bill is broader than the House-passed bill because the Senate bill does not restrict this crude debarment order to the particular facility where the violation occurs. In other words, a companywide debarment order is the likely result. The ramifications for such an extreme penalty is ignored by these queer and curious labor reformers. No consideration is given for the employees who would inevitably lose their jobs as a result of a debarment order. This lack of thought and analysis by these pseudo reformers does not provide me nor any Senator here with the proper foundation in approving such a heinous section of this bill. In the remarks that follow, I will restrict my comments to this debarment provision of the bill. By magnifying the problems with debarment and labor relations in this country, it can be illustrated fully that this approach and radical shift in governmental administration in the labor area is incorrect. My duty is to speak for I do not wish to be an accomplice to undermining the balance between organized labor and management in this country. The truth must be heard. As the French novelist Emile Zola wrote in J'Accuse. L'Aurore:

When the truth is buried underground it grows, it chokes, it gathers such an explosive force that on the day it bursts out, it blows up everything with it.

This Senate needs to avoid an explosion which could cause irreparable harm to the U.S. economy. People's lives and livelihoods are too precious to sacrifice to the abstract of pseudo reform.

The alleged reason for this debarment provision is to strengthen the remedial provisions of the National Labor Relations Act against repeated or flagrant transgressors. In essence the bill provides that if "any person has engaged in a willful and flagrant unfair labor practice and/or a pattern or practice of unfair labor practices designed to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise" of their section 7 rights, the Board shall certify that finding to the Comptroller General. The Comptroller will then inform all other agencies of the U.S. Government of the finding, and no Government contracts will be awarded to the person or business entity for a period of 3 years from the date of the Board's certification. The only exceptions are those persons or business entities which a governmental agency, after a hearing, certifies to the NLRB as being the sole source for the material or services involved.

There are several serious deficiencies both in the concept of debarment and the wording of this particular proposed legislation. First, it is obvious that the debarment penalty exceeds remedying the particular unfair labor practice found. Instead, debarment would prevent employers who meet the law's criteria from obtaining Federal contracts for a 3-year period. Under this legislation, even after particular unfair labor practices have been remedied, debarment would be mandated without any further inquiry into the sufficiency of the traditional NLRB remedy or the necessity of the use of debarment against the particular employer.

It would then take an extraordinary action by the Secretary of Labor to reverse this debarment decision. Thus, once the Comptroller certifies that the employer should be debarred, no simple procedure exists to permit this decision to be reversed. Thus, a debarment action could be based on a "pattern" of NLRB findings some of which might be reversed upon court review. In this regard it is important for all Senators to know that only about 70 percent of NLRB orders which were appealed in the last 6 years were enforced in full by the courts. In light of this shaky track record, it is unfair to impose such a harsh penalty if further findings indicate that such a penalty is unwarranted. In essence, we are electrocuting business concerns and in the event that the entity is found innocent, we can do nothing but apologize to the corporate corpse. Or perhaps the foolhardy reformers in the name of equity would want the Government to award debarment pay similar to backpay since we would be obliged to even up the equities of the matter. Of course, it may be hard to estimate how much restitution is needed to pay an individual for the ruin of his business by the Government's ridiculous debarment procedure.

(Senator HODGES assumed the chair).

Mr. McCLURE. A proper reassessment of the debarment is missing from this bill. To give the same Government official who imposes the debarment the right to lift the penalty is a naive and foolhardy approach. How many people who make serious, grave decisions that severely effect others reverse their decisions later upon review? The political nature of the office of Secretary of Labor also is a serious factor when one considers placing all this decisionmaking power concerning debarment provisions. Will a change in administration affect who does and who does not get debarred? Is it, in fact, hard to imagine this debarment provision being used as a sword to punish businesses that wish to test legally the convictions that they are treating their employees properly? Can we actually deny due process with the threat of economic ruin? The debarment provision before us makes the risk of believing in your thoughts too expensive. Debarment is being used supposedly to have employers comply with the existent labor law. It is far too harsh a remedy to use. If we continue such a policy, we are saying that sledge hammers must be used to drive thumbtacks into a surface. Somehow, clearer minds must understand the stupidity of such a course of action.

Previous Board and court cases have demonstrated that remedies which exceed neutralizing particular unfair labor practices have traditionally been struck down by the courts as punitive and outside the scope of the Board's remedial power. A review of this philosophy through case law is important in order to appreciate how unorthodox and unrealistic debarment is to labor relations in this country.

The Supreme Court has explained that the affirmative remedial power of the Board "is merely incidental to the primary purpose of Congress to stop and prevent unfair labor practices." For this reason, the Board must closely restrict its remedies to undoing the effects of the unfair labor practices committed. In other words, its orders may not be punitive or confiscatory.

Conceptually, this remedial-punitive distinction is perhaps more troublesome than the requirement that the Board relief must not conflict with the policies of the act because, in a sense, each order directing a violator to take affirmative action contains an element of punishment, at least in the subjective judgment of the party required to comply with the Board's order.

At the outset, it should be noted that the terminology employed by the court in describing nonremedial orders as "punitive" is unfortunate in that it implicitly introduces considerations which are not relevant to the issue. The Supreme Court itself, in NLRB against 7-Up Bottling Co., referred to the remedial-punitive debate as a "bog of logomachy" into which it preferred not to enter. The punitive label is actually shorthand for the concept that a Board order is invalid where it is shown to be a "patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the act."

The Supreme Court first defined the limits of the Board's remedial jurisdiction in Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc. against NLRB, stating:

> The power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive, and is to be exercised in aid of the Board's authority to restrain violations and as a means of removing or avoiding the consequences of violation where those consequences are of a kind to thwart the purposes of the act.

Although the application of this formula has undergone minor modifications through the ensuing years, as the circumstances of particular cases have dictated, the general principles stated therein have retained their validity.

For example, the Supreme Court has often upheld Board decisions which have the legitimate purpose of removing or avoiding the effects of an unfair labor practice. Thus, the Court has approved remedies which purport to restore the status quo as a means of depriving the violator of the advantage gained by the unfair labor practice, or returning the parties to the position which would have existed, but for the illegal conduct. Alternatively, the Board's relief may be justified on the grounds that it prevents the consequences of a violation from thwarting the purposes of the act. Thus, the Court has held that a lesser order would be ineffective, or that the relief is necessary to prevent future enjoyment of the fruits of an unfair labor practice.

Conversely, the court, in Local 60, Carpenters against NLRB, declared that where "no 'consequences of violation' are removed . . .; and no 'dissipation' of the effects of the prohibited action is achieved, . . . (the order . . . becomes punitive and beyond the power of the board."

In Republic Steel Corp. against NLRB, the Supreme Court held that a Board order which directed the employer to pay to appropriate governmental agencies an amount of money equal to that which had been earned by discriminatorily discharged employees on "work relief projects" and to credit that amount of money to a backpay award, was beyond the Board's remedial authority. Such payments, the Court claimed, had neither the effect of making employees whole nor of assuring them to their right to bargain collectively. Hence, the remedy served no statutory purpose. Indeed, the Court felt that such payments were in the nature of an exaction, since the "work relief" payments constituted consideration for valuable services which the Government received.

Significantly, in Republic Steel, the Court also rejected the Board's argument that the remedy was permissible since it would have the effect of deterring others from violating the act. Although a remedy may incidentally act as a deterrent, the Court felt that if the NLRB were permitted to impose remedies solely on the basis of acting as a deterrent, the Board would be free to set up any system of penalties which it could deem adequate to that end. The Court's holding reflects the principle that the rational relationship between unlawful conduct and the relief which is granted is not satisfied when the remedy purports to achieve ends other than those contemplated by the statute.

The logic of the Supreme Court clearly indicates that the debarment provision before us must severely be questioned on constitutional as well as on commonsense grounds. It is my hope that the commonsense in this Chamber is plentiful enough to avoid this constitutional consideration and possible economic ruin. Thus, the brief review of the Board's remedial and not punitive power should cause us all to pursue and question the worth of appropriateness of debarment provisions of this bill.

Let us look squarely at this debarment provision. The debarment penalty is clearly punitive. Since the proposed penalty would give congressional sanction to a remedial method never before adopted by Congress, the courts, or the Board, the "legal and policy considerations bearing on its applicability" should be carefully considered.

The bill lacks standards for defining a "willful or flagrant unfair labor practice and/or a pattern or practice of unfair labor practices." Nothing in the bill helps distinguish an egregious (that is, flagrant) violation from a "pattern" of violations which might have a minimal impact on the employees in a unit involved. The bill does not define "flagrant" violation in terms of the type or seriousness of the violation. Furthermore, the word "pattern" does not suggest the number of violations necessary, or determine whether the violations must be of the same type, before the sanction would be applied. A "practice" or unfair labor practices conceivably could range from a widespread attempt to undermine a union campaign to a few section 8(A)(1) violations which would not have appreciable effect on a large unit of employees.

For example, an owner of a small plant who responds to a unionization campaign with contumacious conduct such as illegal discharges, threats to close his plant, and widespread interrogation of his employees is not distinguished from an employer who merely undertakes a "pattern" of questioning a few employees out of several hundred about their knowledge of the union. Quite clearly, there would be no reason to bar the latter employer from Federal contracts, but the bill does not provide for graduated penalties. In short we are giving license to an omnipotent penalty without knowing the parameters of that penalty. The debarment provision does not require the Board to consider the size of the unit involved or the impact of the violations on the employees therein. Therefore, the bill offends the well-established principle that the imposition of NLRB remedies intended to have a broad impact must be based on a consideration of the nature and seriousness of the unfair labor practices found, the complete labor relations history of the offender, and the probability of the practices recurring.

Furthermore, the debarment penalty would have a detrimental effect on the fairness of NLRB litigation. Previously, the Board and courts have held consistently that even in those instances where a flagrant violation has occurred, extraordinary remedies such as payment of attorneys' fees will not be assessed unless the violator also advances a "frivolous" and "nondebatable" defense. Thus, the tribunals which regularly deal in NLRB cases have indicated a strong lack of "desire to take action which could become the basis of chilling the assertion of rights reasonably held in good faith by virtue of imposing a penalty because of failure to prevail in the litigation." This potentially chilling effect is more pronounced in Senate bill 2467 than in any of the other remedies in labor law history. With enactment of this bill, the employer who litigates a charge alleging that he has engaged in a "pattern" of unfair labor practices does not only face the loss of litigation expenses if his defense should prove frivolous, rather, the vague standards and definitions of the bill confront the employer with the possible loss of the Government contract portion of his business for at least 3 years, plus the time necessary to regain his lost contracts. This severe penalty would tend to encourage an employer with a debatable defense to settle an unfair labor practice charge because of the uncertainty and seriousness of the penalty. So in the name of labor reform we silence employers who wish to speak their mind in a court of law.

In addition, as mentioned previously this debarment provision is not restricted to the particular unit where the unfair labor practices occurred. Rather, debarment would apply to "such person, or to any firm, corporation, partnership, or association in which such person has a controlling interest . . ." No showing would be required, as in the usual broad order situation, that the employer had instituted a systemwide, centrally directed, and coordinated policy to commit unfair labor practices throughout his entire operation. From this language, it could be easily argued that a flagrant violation at one Chevrolet plant would deprive the entire General Motors Corp. of its Federal contracts.

The bill clearly would force the enforcement of all divisions of one employer, even if each division had a distinct labor relations policy. Obviously, the overly broad language of this bill fails to consider the labor relations structure of the employer involved, or the impact of the unfair labor practices on the employees in units where no violation occurred.

The devastating impact of debarment on the employees of the affected employer seems to have been overlooked in favor of a vaguely defined notion of the impact of unfair labor practices. It is easy to conceive that the loss of jobs to employees whose employer has been debarred from Federal contracts could be more serious than the effect of the unfair labor practices. Such mitigating factors, however, are not considered in the application of the debarment penalty. Similarly, the impact on the public is not considered. Once debarment is found appropriate, the only instance in which it would not be effectuated is when an agency certifies to the NLRB that there is "no other source for the material or services furnished." Nothing would prevent debarment, however, even if other available sources are more expensive, or provide inferior quality goods or services. Indeed, the concept of Federal debarment would necessarily entail increased costs to the public since Federal regulations require that the contracts be awarded to the lowest qualified bidder.

In sum, the debarment provision is an ill-defined, vague, and overly broad statute. Moreover, the concept of debarment in any form is unacceptable because it provides a penalty which far exceeds the particular unfair labor practice found, improperly discourages respondents from participating in litigation, could easily result in the loss of jobs for employees in the unit and may increase the cost of supplies purchased by the Federal Government.

A number of nonpartisan organizations have called for the elimination of this debarment provision.

Recently the Administrative Conference of the United States recommended that the Office of Federal Contract Compliance drop its debarment sanction. The Conference stated that "contract cancellation is in many cases too severe or impracticable as the primary sanction for noncompliance with equal employment opportunity regulations."

It pointed out that a broad debarment penalty fails to take into account the special circumstances of major employment categories, and recommended that the Department of Labor develop a system of graduated sanctions for breach of EEO obligations. The conference's recommendations were printed in the July 2, 1975, Federal Register. Similar logic dictates that debarment sanctions are not appropriate remedies for regulatory agencies like the NLRB. It would be imprudent of this body to adopt this crude debarment provision in the light of all this evidence.

Proponents of this debarment provision ignore the interest that is to be protected with our labor relations law. The first function of labor law is protect the employee. This function is followed by a need to protect employees and in a greater context contributing to a sense of fairness to the general society. If a debarment sanction is imposed upon an employer, the most direct result will be loss of jobs. While it is certain that the employer will suffer economic damage, his employee must also share in this economic deprivation. An employee without a job is not helping the employment problem in this country. A debarment provision which breeds unemployment in a small town will have a crippling effect on an entire community. It can play havoc with the local economy of an area. Is this Senate prepared to accept such consequences of a debarment sanction?

Further, the proponents of this debarment provision have likened the punishment of a 3-year bar against Government contracts to the imprisoning of a burglar. Both forms of punishment, they say, deprive the violator of his livelihood and both sentences prevent the alleged wrongdoer from supporting his or her families. This ridiculous analogy is so attenuated and strained as to be ludicrous, but in the interest of truth and clear thinking, I will elucidate the weaknesses of this absurd comparison.

To begin, the actions of an employer whose goal is ultimately production, economic gain, a contribution to employment and our entire economic system is certainly more meaningful and reputable than the ways and wiles of a common thief. The thief's actual motive is deprivation of property and infringement of a person's safety. The thief is violating the criminal law. The focus of our criminal law is to protect the general society and this is why the thief must be isolated. There is a genuine concern that this thief may strike again and a mere fine will not alter his conduct. Conversely the employer who commits an unfair labor practice can be fined and this will alter this unlawful conduct. At the same time, it is unnecessary for the Government to interfere with the industrial production of this employer because that action not only harms the employer but also severely affects his innocent employees and the general society. If debarment becomes the norm, untold economic damage will be the result to many innocent parties. Furthermore, our Government may be forced to look to alternative sources of supplies and this can drastically increase the cost to our Government. This increased cost translates to the general populace, the people we represent, bearing this increased cost. The public is damned by this debarment provision and even they are punished by this proposed sanction. Our common thief is operating at a level where only he benefits and it is only he and his dependents that suffer by his punishment. Such is not the case with the employer punished by debarment. His level of operation is on a higher plateau and the effects of his punishment are far reaching to those who are truly innocent but who will suffer nonetheless. The creators of this trite analogy do not understand that apples and oranges cannot be mixed in a fruit cocktail of legal thought. Labor law and criminal law serve different interests and to cross these legal lines produces a syllogism that is as incorrect as it is absurd. I would hope that members of the Senate will not subscribe to this pedantic and self-serving logic.

Thus, I conclude my remarks by reminding this body that a sanction like debarment has no place in the labor legislation of the United States. It is an excess that can cause great wounds in our economic system and can further persecute the innocent worker who is often a pawn between organized labor and management. The hungry reformers who ask for passage for this debarment measure are people who listen not to reason, nor care for justice, nor bent by any prayer. Their only cause is revenge and punishment and this does not contribute or fit into the U.S. labor-management relations policy. My respected colleagues, rise above this petty request and vote against such a destructive provision.

HISTORY AND POLICIES OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS LAW

Mr. President, the bill which is currently before the Senate is perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation introduced in this session. An informed decision upon the merits of this bill requires close scrutiny of the historical development of labor relations law of the United States.

The National Labor Relations Act is the principal body of Federal law which governs labor-management relations in private industry. The National Labor Relations Act has developed through three statutes enacted by Congress. Each of these three statutes embodied a major cycle in labor-management relations. These three statutes are: The National Labor Relations Act, also known as the Wagner Act, enacted by Congress in 1935; the Labor Management Relations Act, also known as the Taft-Hartley Act, enacted by Congress in 1947; and the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, also known as the Landrum-Griffin Act, enacted by Congress in 1959.

Notwithstanding the many amendments enacted by the Taft-Hartley and the Landrum-Griffin Acts, the policy statement as originally enacted by Congress in 1935 has remained unchanged. This policy statement is found in section 1 of the act, and reads as follows:

Section 1 . . . it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection.

Mr. President, the essence of the act is the protection of employees in their freedom to act in free concert in dealing with their employers, and the protection of employees while they select representatives of their own choosing. The essence, Mr. President, is the promotion of employee free choice.

The balance which exists in the labor law at its current state has been carefully planned and established by our distinguished and eminent predecessors. To tilt the scale in favor of either side, that is, to favor the side of either labor or management would dangerously contravene the express policy of the law of labor-management relations, that of the protection of the opportunity for employees to make an informed choice of whether or not they want to be represented by a labor organization.

Mr. President, the Labor Law Reform Act of 1978, as reported by the Senate Human Resources Committee dangerously upsets that balance so carefully implemented by our predecessors in the Congress. As a matter of fact, the bill before us now would drastically alter the 43-year-old National Labor Relations Act from a remedial to a punitive statute. I respectfully submit that the distortion occasioned by the passage of this bill would render the policy statement which I quoted earlier a complete nullity.

In order for my fellow Senators and I to exercise informed judgment in deciding upon the merits of this legislation, the expansive scope of the National Labor Relations Act's coverage needs to be addressed.

EMPLOYEES COVERED

The employee coverage of the National Labor Relations Act, in terms of both the breadth and meaning of the coverage, is one of the most important features of the act. While the meaning of the coverage can be understood only after analysis of virtually all of the substantive features of the act, the scope or breadth of the coverage can be understood for most practical purposes by consideration of one section of the act—section 2(3), which defines the term "employee."

Section 2(3) of the NLRA, as amended, defines the term "employee" as follows:

The term "employee" shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the act explicitly states otherwise, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice, and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment, but shall not include any individual employed as an agricultural laborer, or in the domestic service of any family or person at his home, or any individual employed by his parent or spouse, or any individual having the status of an independent contractor, or any individual employed as a supervisor, or any individual employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or by any other person who is not an employer as herein defined.

Initial decision as to whether or not a particular worker or group of workers comes within the act's definition of "employee" is made by the National Labor Relations Board. In representation cases, the Board's decision is usually not subject to review by the courts. In unfair labor practice cases, the act provides that the Board's findings of fact are binding on the reviewing courts if they are supported by "substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." The Supreme Court holds that reviewing courts are required to consider all the facts and circumstances in deciding whether or not the Board's rulings on employee status are based on substantial evidence.

EMPLOYEE STATUS AND ITS MEANING

Employee status under the NLRA may be considered from two points of view. It may be approached in terms of its "causes"—that is, the facts that make a person an "employee" within the meaning of the act; and it may be approached in terms of its consequences—that is, the legal significance of a person's being an "employee" within the meaning of the act.

As to the first of these approaches, it may be said that virtually all persons commonly understood to be employees are "employees" within the meaning of the act. Of course, section 2(3), defining the term "employee," expressly exempts certain persons. In addition, the National Labor Relations Board generally takes the view that persons in high positions who perform essential managerial functions will not ordinarily be considered "employees." It should be noted, finally, that persons must be employed in business whose activities affect interstate commerce before the act can apply to them. Once these qualifications have been made, however, it may be said with a high degree of certainty that the act applies to all employees, as that term is commonly understood.

Furthermore, temporary severance of the employment relationship, as in cases of strikes, sick leaves, layoffs, shutdowns, or seasonal lulls, does not terminate employee status.

One who has employee status under the NLRA becomes entitled to all the rights, privileges, and protection of the act. He has the right to form and join labor unions and to engage in collective bargaining and other concerted activities; he also has the right to refrain from any and all such activities. Even more important, the act protects those rights against interference, influence, or coercion—by either employers or unions.

Employee status ordinarily means, moreover, that the employee is eligible to vote in all the types of elections provided for in the act. Whether the election be held in order to select a representative or to reject one, or in order to rescind a union's authority to bargain for the union shop, each person who has employee status in the appropriate bargaining unit is entitled to vote in the election. Subject to certain qualifications, persons who have employee status are entitled to vote even where their employment has temporarily ceased. The general rule is that employees not currently employed are entitled to vote whenever there is a reasonable expectation that they will be reemployed, since they may be affected by the presence or absence of a bargaining representative.

CLASSES OF EMPLOYED COVERED

Subject to certain stated exemptions in favor of supervisors, independent contractors, and others, the NLRA covers practically all groups of employees.

Moreover, certain provisions of the NLRA, such as the ban against strikes for boycott purposes and other unlawful objectives, applies even to persons otherwise exempted from the act's "employee" definition. The NLRA provides, in section 2(3), that the term "employee" includes "any employee and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer." Of course, the "employee," in order to be covered, must be working for an employer whose activity affects interstate commerce. But, apart from this qualification, it may accurately be stated that the act applies to virtually every conceivable type of employee who, in the common understanding, sells his services for a wage or salary and undertakes to perform a given function with or without supervision.

Thus, the act applies without question to all the common employee groups—machinists, tool-and-die makers, carpenters, typesetters, elevator operators, common laborers, white-collar workers—in businesses whose activities affect interstate commerce. It applies, moreover, to agents employed by a labor union and to such relatively distinctive groups, as plant guards, attorneys, chemists, engineers, architects, nurses, and doctors. Where the persons in those positions are employed by a company engaged in commerce or in activities affecting interstate commerce.

The act covers not only regular full-time workers, but also part-time, seasonal, and day-to-day workers, and even applicants from employment and discharged workers waiting to receive their final paychecks. Such persons are held entitled to all the rights granted by the act—the rights to form, join, and participate in unions free from employer interference, coercion or discrimination. However, the act does not cover students whose work is part of their training, such as hospital interns and residents, or of only secondary interest to their studies, such as students on work-study programs.

Especially noteworthy in the definition of the term "employee" is the fact that it is not restricted to the employees of a particular employer. Such provision was thought necessary because, in many cases, employees organize along craft or industrial lines, forming unions which extend beyond the limits of single-employer units. Those unions often bargain collectively with a number of employers, with the result that workers are sometimes brought into an economic relationship with employers other than their own.

The bill before us now will also substantially change the representation rights of plant guards. In order to fully understand the severe implications of the changes in the proposed bill, the current status of plant guards under the current National Labor Relations Act is necessary.

While plant guards have employee status under the act, their representation rights are somewhat restricted. Section 9(b)(3) of the act provides that the Board may not decide that a unit is appropriate for bargaining purposes if it—

. . . includes, together with other employees, any individual employed as a guard to enforce against employees and other persons rules to protect property of the employer or to protect the safety of persons on the employer's premises; but no labor organization shall be certified as the representative of employees in a bargaining unit of guards if such organization admits to membership, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership, employees other than guards.

The net effect of section 9(b)(3) is that plant guards may seek Board certification only if their union neither admits other employees to membership nor is affiliated, directly or indirectly, with a union which admits other employees to membership. However, a nonguard union, although not certified, may act as bargaining representative of guards and its contract will bar an election petition by a rival union. The statute bars such a union only from NLRB certification. A union ineligible to be certified as a representative of guards may nevertheless be placed on the ballot in an NLRB election if employees are notified of its ineligibility and a union qualified for certification also appears on the ballot.

One of the duties of the Board, therefore, is to decide whether or not various types of employees are guards. In performance of this duty, the Board must look to the wording of section 9(b)(3); it must decide whether employees "enforce against employees and other persons rules to protect property of the employer or * * * protect the safety of persons on the employer's premises."

In determining whether or not an employee is a guard within the meaning of section 9(b)(3), the NLRB considers, as principal factors, the authority of the employee to enforce the employer's plant rules, or to control the admission of persons to, or their conduct upon, the employer's property. The NLRB considers the nature of an employee's duties as the controlling factor, rather than the percentage of working time spent at guard duties. Thus, employees spending most of their working time as janitors, firemen, boiler tenders, or even at production work, are guards if they regularly perform duties as guards on a part-time basis, such as weekends and holidays. Even an employee who substituted for a guard only two or three times during the period of a year was held to be a guard. In another case, however, the NLRB held that infrequent and irregular performance guard duty did not make employees guards.

Although the term "guard" is usually associated with persons who wear uniforms and carry firearms, watchmen who are neither in uniform nor armed are guards where they have control over admission of persons to plant premises. Even ushers are guards where they have the authority to deny entry of persons to the employer's premises without payment of a fee. Unarmed couriers who drive vans transporting nonnegotiable instruments and bank correspondence are also guards.

Plant protection employees of firms which furnish guard service to other firms are guards, even though they do not guard the property of their immediate employer. Plant protection employees working as such for their immediate employer are guards if their duties include active participation in guard operations.

However, where such employers do not actively enforce plant rules or must call upon a guard for such enforcement they are not guards.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER).

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it carries me back quite a few years to stand on this floor and talk about labor problems and labor legislation, because when I first came to the Senate back in 1953 the great Senator Taft was still alive, and he prevailed on me to take an appointment to the then so-called Labor Committee. I told him at that time that I had no real background that would be valuable, but he felt because of my experience in corporation work that I would have at least some value to it, so I took it more for the honor of serving under Bob Taft and learning from him.

Unfortunately, of course, that time was cut short by his untimely passing. I said I had no background, although I was president of a corporation. We never had a union, although I told the unions every time they approached me that I would recognize any vote my employees cast, but they would have to do their politicking on their own time and not mine. Consequently, I am very proud and happy to say that the unions were never able to organize my business.

Mr. President, I happen to be a union member, and I do not think there are many Members of the Senate who are dues-paying union members. I belong to AFTRA, and am an honorary member of two other unions. So I do not approach this subject from the standpoint of criticism, because I have always maintained that if I worked at a trade that had a union I would join the union, but I wanted it perfectly understood that I would never join a union where compulsion was the force.

If there is anything wrong with the union movement in the United States today, in my opinion it is compulsion, the fact that in many trades, many industries, many skills, a man has to be a member of the union before he can even get a job or he has to join the union immediately after going to work for the company the union represents.

I say I think it is one of the problems because as we look around this world the picture has not changed much since the years when I served on the Labor Committee and, by the way, I served 12 years on the committee and was the ranking Republican member when I took that inadvertent sabbatical leave in 1964.

Where union membership is voluntary we find very, very high membership amongst the workers. For example, in the Scandinavian countries it runs over 90 percent.

Unions in those countries and other countries where it is voluntary are more, I would like to say, like a fraternity than the unions we have in this country; in other words, you do not join a union in those other countries until they ask you to join. It is a social badge.

We used to have it that way in the American railway unions. Ever since they changed it they have been going downhill. It is instinctively and basically against an American to be forced to do anything. I have always said if you want to get an American to do something tell him he cannot do it and, by golly, he will find a way to do it.

So what we find in the United States today is a union membership of around 20 percent of the total workers, and we now have over 90 million people working. Yet union membership in other countries where free unionism is practiced runs, as I say, over 90 percent.

Mr. President, just a brief thumbnail history of what we are talking about in this legislation. In 1934 I do not think anyone would have argued that management had the better side of the bargaining table. There were really no laws that protected the worker. Everything was in management's hands.

I think it was perfectly proper at that time that the so-called Wagner Act was passed, which tried to give equal strength to both sides of the bargaining table. I think the original Wagner Act accomplished much of that objective.

However, it did not take very long when through the judgments of quasi-judicial bodies, such as the National Labor Relations Board, before the Wagner Act's purpose began to be bent a bit, until we found in the late forties that amendments would have to be made to the Wagner Act to make it palatable as far as fairness goes between the unions and management, and that was when the Taft-Hartley amendment to the Wagner Act was passed.

Now, since that time, through a continuation of judgments by quasi-judical bodies like the National Labor Relations Board and decisions of courts at all levels, the original intent of Taft-Hartley has practically disappeared from our labor law.

I remember the advice that Senator Taft used to give the committee, that it was a very precarious field that we were operating in, and our constant efforts had to be toward absolute fairness. And I subscribe to that. I do not think management should have an upper hand any more than I think the union side of the table should have an upper hand.

During all those years I served on that committee, I had the expert advice of Mr. Michael Bernstein, now retired, who I think did more concerning the drafting of Taft-Hartley than probably any other man.

Now we are confronted with a bill that I would like to discuss, not at too great length but at some length, S. 2467, which in my opinion has as its major objectionable feature—although it is very cleverly put and worded—a method whereby workers in this country could be forced to join unions.

I happen to come from a so-called right-to-work State. I have never thought "right to work" was exactly the correct nomenclature for that portion of Taft-Hartley, section 14(b). "Liberty to work," I thought, would have been better, because nobody has a right to work; he has the liberty to seek employment, and if he can find employment, fine; if he cannot, he has to do something about it.

I note from other States—19 have so-called right-to-work laws—Senators from those States have experienced, I believe, the same thing I went through during the time last year when they were attempting to legalize common situs picketing, or secondary boycotts. I never figured out the exact percentage, but I daresay close to 50 percent, a little less than 50 percent of the mail that I had on this subject came from people that had the courage to say, "I am a member of such and such a local. I do not want to lose my job through secondary boycotting," or common situs, as it is properly called.

These complaints came mostly from the building industry. As we all know, the building industry is enjoying right now one of its greatest moments, and the pay of a good craftsman is very high.

I have had words with one of our big employers in Arizona, a very forward looking organization called Motorola. I just want to pass on to my colleagues what they feel about this act. I think it is proper to relate the feelings of the other side of the table, namely, management.

They have one particular concern; namely, the enactment of the so-called make-whole provisions of the bill, which they fear will substantially accelerate exportation of United States jobs offshore, particularly in those industries such as the semiconductor industry already besieged by imports from low-wage foreign countries.

Already 3,100 Motorola employees in the Phoenix area have been laid off due to increased imports of semiconductor devices, principally from the Far East. More recently, 150 more Motorolans nearly lost their jobs when eroding prices caused by Far Eastern competitors' dumping caused our U.S. unit labor cost to be higher than the average unit sales price.

"Make-whole" will aggravate that trend for the necessary effect of postulating a dollars-and-cents remedy for refusal to bargain in good faith for a first union contract will be to make that dollars-and-cents formula the floor for any negotiated settlement. Then, having once achieved their formula increase, the union will be obliged to keep getting at least the formula in subsequent contracts, or lose the support of its constituency. Other unions will be similarly pressured by their memberships to obtain no less than the formula increase, and nonunion companies like Motorola will clearly have to grant their employees the formula increase in order to attract and retain the qualified employees that Motorola has to have.

In short, the formula will become the floor for wage and benefit adjustments generally in both union and nonunion companies.

Add to that the fact that the formula the bill uses is undoubtedly the most inflationary formula there is, and you will understand the dilemma of the Motorola Co. Their spokesman asks, "How can I keep providing jobs when the U.S. Government tells me that to continue to do business in this country I must make wage and benefit adjustments that price me out of the market."

That is the feeling of one of the major businesses in my State, which is also the world's largest manufacturer of semiconductors.

I do not know if anyone has expressed the feeling of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, but I am sure all my colleagues received correspondence from them in which they say that S. 2467 would give unwarranted and inequitable power to labor unions during organizational campaigns, deprive employers of important rights of free speech, deprive employees of an opportunity to make their own decisions whether or not to be represented by labor organizations, unfairly penalize many employers for technical and esoteric violations of labor law, and foster the very litigation and delay which the authors of the bill wish to remedy.

On this latter point, the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board estimates that his office alone would need an additional $28 million and 900 more staffers to handle the surge in litigation the legislation would cause.

In subsequent correspondence they have taken an even stronger position:

We take this position quite simply, because the bill is blatantly unfair and totally one-sided in its approach to management, from its packing of the National Labor Relations Board, to its quickie elections, to its equal access, to its enormously punitive sanctions. The bill is clearly an injustice designed by its writers to accomplish one goal: to halt the downward slide of union membership.

Mr. President, I have to subscribe to that. I cannot think of any other reason why, at this time in our history, particularly union history, we have to have all the pressure on to pass this bill which, I do not care how you read it, study it, or look at it, is one designed to reverse the downward slide of union membership.

As I said earlier, I do not think that compulsion is the way to end the problems of the unions. I think it would be a very interesting experiment for the unions to not return to, but go forward to the European and other countries' ideas of a union being an organization that it is a privilege to belong to—an organization that has social advantages and business advantages, but these advantages are not to be just blatantly passed out to everybody who is looking for or who has a job.

I think that is the meat of the problem. Frankly, I do not think the passage of this bill is going to help the unions out of the dilemma they are in now.

I would like to make it perfectly clear at this point in my remarks that I think the strike is the only weapon that a working man has. We should never do anything at the Federal level or at State levels to prevent striking unless striking places an unnecessary burden on other members of our society. I am thinking particularly of striking by firefighters. There has not been a strike in the post office. though the Lord knows the service is bad enough now without finding ourselves in the situation of a strike.

I think we can pass legislation which will outline what this body feels are strikes which would cause unnecessary hardships on people.

I am reminded of the airlines strike a number of years ago that put hundreds of thousands of people in this country at an uncomfortable disadvantage in their efforts to travel back and forth to see their families at holiday time. That kind of a strike is what I am talking about.

Generally, I think we ought to respect the idea or the fact that a strike is the only weapon a working man has.

To continue with my conclusions on this particular bill:

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

As drafted and reported out of the Senate Human Resources Committee, S. 2467 will upset the balance of labor relations at the expense of individual worker's freedom of choice. And, to that extent, stability in labor relations will be seriously undermined for union and nonunion employees alike. Since industrial strife and labor unrest will likely result if this bill is enacted, this legislation profoundly contradicts the avowed goals of its sponsors.

Many of the difficulties surrounding S. 2467 stem from a failure by its sponsors to remedy the weaknesses they perceive in current labor laws with precise and carefully drawn legislation. The preeminent concern, of course, is to obtain legislation that is fair and workable. In our view, however, the proposed bill satisfies none of these criteria. In its present form. this bill simply turns the clock back to the days of the Wagner Act of 1935 which resulted in abuses by labor organizations, and ultimately was amended in 1947, by the Taft-Hartley Act. As presently constituted, if S. 2467 is enacted, employees will suffer, employers will suffer and, above all, the public will suffer.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, employees achieved substantial gains. While that legislation attempted to create an equitable balance between employers and labor organizations, employee rights remained the paramount concern. This bill, however, does little for the protection of employee rights and, in fact, would result in an undermining of an employee's right to refrain from engaging in union activity.

The significance of an employee's informed choice in selecting a union to be a bargaining agent should be at the forefront of this legislation. However, the bill completely skirts this issue and would have exactly the opposite effect. Employee free choice is not something that should be sacrificed in the name of expediency.

One of the key problems with this legislation is that there are numerous sections of this bill wholly unrelated to the stated purposes. It is self-evident that the real purpose of these provisions is to provide union organizers with greater advantages over employers during representation campaigns. This conclusion is borne out by figures published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics indicating that organized labor lost 800,000 dues-paying members between 1974 and 1976. Similarly, according to the Board's annual report, in 54 percent of the elections conducted in fiscal 1977, workers rejected union representation. These statistics reveal the eroding position of organized labor and the genesis of the demands voiced by officials of international labor unions in seeking congressional assistance to help stem the tide of declining membership.

In sum, in contrast to prior labor legislation, this bill does not provide an appropriate balance between the rights of labor and management. While much has been made of the assertion that the bill is intended to equalize the positions of labor and management, even a cursory analysis shows this claim to be specious.

I. REPRESENTATION CASE PROPOSALS

A. TIMING OF THE ELECTION

1. TIMING OF THE ELECTION—CURRENT LAW

There are no mandated deadlines for the direction and holding of elections.

2. TIMING OF THE ELECTION—PROPOSED CHANGES UNDER S. 2467

Section 6 of this bill amends section 9(c) of the act by establishing mandatory time periods for the holding of elections. These time periods can be summarized as follows: An election must be directed within 13 days after filing a petition in an appropriate bargaining units supported by a majority of the employees, and the elections must then be held in not less than 21 days and no more than 30 days from the filing of the petition. When the petition seeks a unit not established by rule or is supported by less than a majority, but at least 30 percent of the employees, a 45-day time limit is imposed. Finally, a 75-day period is allowed for issues which present questions of exceptional novelty or complexity.

3. TIMING OF THE ELECTION—SUGGESTED CHANGES

Due to the enormous difficulties with respect to the proposed changes concerning mandatory time periods set out below, a simple approach would be to establish a time limit of 60 days for an election from the date that the bargaining unit has been determined.

4. TIMING OF THE ELECTION—CRITIQUE

In the representation area, S. 2467 is aimed at expediting the Board's representational process. The basic premise of the proponents of this legislation is that the NLRB's election machinery is too slow. Upon close analysis, however, the facts do not support the claims made in support of the delays in the voting process. Moreover, one must first carefully weigh the desirability of speeding up Board elections.

Perhaps the chief problem with respect to the committee's treatment of the subject of delays in the representation process is that adequate attention has never been focused upon the real causes of delay. While an indepth study of this subject should be undertaken prior to serious consideration of legislation, there are, however, two obvious factors causing significant delays. First, is the inability of the regional offices to schedule consecutive day hearings. This results in prolonged and cumbersome proceedings stretched out over an extensive period of time. Second, is the temerity of many regional directors not to decide representation issues themselves but transfer these issues to the Board for decision. Since transferring the case to the Board is an unnecessary and time-consuming task, regional directors should not be permitted to avoid initially ruling on unit issues.

The voting process whereby an employee casts a ballot for or against a union raises significant issues. Majority rule bears with it the consequence of having to adhere by union rule and to a contract which someone else negotiated. The safety valve built into the current law was described by the Supreme Court in J. I. Case v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 332, 339 (1944) as follows:

> The workman is free, if he values his own bargaining position more than that of the group, to vote against representation: but the majority rules, and if it collectivizes the employment bargain, individual advantages or favors will generally in practice go in as a contribution to the collective result.

(Mr. FORD assumed the chair.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Proponents of arbitrary time limits on representation elections proceed on the basis that speed is the preeminent concern in effectuating employee desires. Yet, if one assesses the impact that collective bargaining has on individual rights, it can hardly be asserted that speed in conducting elections necessarily serves the interests of employees.

Union election campaigns, like any other campaign, provide voters with an opportunity to consider the arguments, pro and con, and decide on a course of action. The potential shift from individual freedom of contract to aggregate freedom of contract is an extremely important issue in any campaign. From our perspective, that issue and the consequences which flow out of establishing a bargaining relationship cannot be reduced by imposing mandatory time periods for holding elections.

Mr. President, Congress itself has recognized the substantial impact collective bargaining occasions on individual rights. In 1959, the Senate Labor Subcommittee, considering governmental regulation of internal union affairs, noted:[1]

> Under the National Labor Relations and Railway Labor Acts the union which is the bargaining representative has power, in conjunction with the employer, to fix a man's wages, hours, and conditions of employment. The individual employee may not lawfully negotiate with his employer. He is bound by the union contract. In practice, the union also has a significant role in enforcing the grievance procedure where a man's contract rights are enforced. The Government which gives unions this power has an obligation to insure that the officials who wield it are responsive to the desires of the men and women whom they represent.

One should think that the same concerns would motivate affording employees the maximum, not the minimum, time to make an informed decision on whether a union should be chosen to represent their interests.

In the same vein, the time periods prescribed by the bill are totally unrealistic. First, the time periods run from the date a petition has been received and not from the date that the bargaining unit has been established. Since the key issue in the representational process is defining the pool of voters, the main inquiry is what unit the Board will direct an election in, not what unit the union asserts is appropriate in its petition. Unit decisions, including, under this bill, the issue of whether a rule applies, are not arrived at for at least some period of time. Yet, the clock starts running once the petition is received, even though the parties might not know who will vote for several weeks thereafter. Thus, the period of time to actually campaign in the deferred unit is far shorter than even the 21- to 30-day period.

Mr. President, the use of mandated time periods is also faulty in that it presumes that where a union receives a majority of signed authorization cards, an election should be conducted in a shorter period of time. This is totally at odds with the notion of providing employees a meaningful opportunity to make an informed choice. It has been repeatedly recognized that employee signatures on authorization cards are not a reliable indicia of employee support for a union.

According to the study conducted by Professors Goldberg, Getman, and Herman, "Union Representation Elections: Law and Reality," at 135 (1976), which was relied on by the Senate Human Resources Committee in proposing the equal access provision, 18 percent of the employees who signed authorization cards stated either that they did not want union representation when they signed or were uncertain of their desires in this regard. Moreover, this study revealed that only 72 percent of card signers actually voted for union representation in a Board election.

As a practical matter, the signing of an authorization card only allows a union to get on the ballot. As characteristic of any political election, it is often maintained that everyone has the right to have his name on the ballot and, therefore, have any eligible voter sign his petition. It does not, of course, suggest that the employee who signs an authorization card will, in fact, vote for the union at the time of the election. Furthermore, if an employee only hears one side of a story, it is not difficult to sign a card, particularly where the consequences of signing are not told to the employee.

B. RULEMAKING POWER

In the current law, the Board has rulemaking authority, but has chosen not to use this authority due to the complexities involved in this area. But let us take a look at the proposed change.

Section 4 of the bill, which amends section 6 of the act, authorizes the Board to promulgate rules concerning equal access, resolution of disputes concerning eligibility of voters, and holding of elections in cases in which an appeal to the Board has not been decided prior to the date of the election. The Board is also charged with promulgating rules to determine whether certain units are appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining.

We have some suggested changes. The Board has chosen not to use its rulemaking powers in determining bargaining units because it is a cumbersome process and units are too varied and complex to become subject to inflexible rules. As a result, this provision should be amended to read:

The Board should establish the criteria or standards to be established in unit cases without making specific unit determinations.

If Congress retains the rulemaking provision, the following provision should be added after page 5, line 24, of the bill:

(D) To establish, to the extent practicable, standards which shall apply uniformly to employer and labor organization conduct during representational campaigns.

(E) To define, to the extent practicable, what conduct on the part of either an employer or labor organization constitutes an unfair labor practice under section 8.

4. RULEMAKING POWER—CRITIQUE

Establishing bargaining units through rulemaking is an untried concept in the private sector. Two public sector jurisdictions, Florida and Massachusetts, have utilized the rulemaking process in establishing bargaining units for State employees. Having participated in the Florida proceedings, we are familiar with the benefits and problems posed in determining bargaining units through rulemaking. Before considering the potential benefits and problems, however, it is first relevant to note the Labor Board's attitude toward rulemaking.

The Labor Board has traditionally evidenced a hostility toward the use of rulemaking. See, for example, F. McCulloch, "Procedures Employed by the NLRB for Determining Policy," 1964 Proceedings, "ABA Section of Administrative Law"; Bernstein, "The NLRB's Adjudication Rule Making Dilemma Under the Administrative Procedure Act" (79 Yale L.J. 571 (1970)). Indeed, former Chairman McCulloch considered rulemaking to be a "cumbersome process * * * that necessarily impedes the law's ability to respond quickly and accurately to changing industrial practices."

While the drafters of S. 2467 believe that rulemaking should be used in representational cases, the Labor Board has previously rejected such an approach. In 1971, the American Association of University Professors filed a petition requesting that the Board issue rules "to guide the determination of issues in representation cases involving faculty members in colleges and universities." Denying the petition for rulemaking, the Board stated:

The Board considers that the Petition properly points out that the Board's unit determinations in this area should take into account certain practices and organizational structures which do not parallel the traditional practices and organizational structures in private industry. The Board's information to date, however, suggests that there is also a great variety in this regard within the academic community, and also that the practices and structures in universities and colleges are undergoing a period of change and experimentation. The Board believes that to adopt inflexible rules for units of teaching employees at this time might well introduce too great an element of rigidity and prevent the Board from adapting its approach to a highly pluralistic and fluid set of conditions. Accordingly, the Board shall deny the Petition.[2]

The reasons advanced for rejecting rulemaking in the academic community in 1971 are equally relevant today. Moreover, a review of rulemaking in the public sector illustrates limited utility for its use in private sector representational cases.

Rulemaking in Massachusetts and Florida resulted from the fact that the parties and agencies involved agreed that the establishment of bargaining units at the outset of a new legislative scheme would best be achieved in one proceeding rather than case-by-case adjudication. The procedures employed in those States can best be analogized to a consolidated representational case. Indeed, in Florida, for example, the pending representation cases involving State employees were essentially folded into the rulemaking proceeding.

From a logistical point of view, it is a very difficult and time-consuming task to establish bargaining units through rulemaking. While general criteria can and have already been developed, the application of that criteria will vary depending on the facts of a particular case. For example, the Board has long exercised its rulemaking authority concerning voting eligibility of employees on layoff or leave of absence with a reasonable expectation of return to work. Despite the rules, however, litigation has not been avoided, and it is likely that codification of bargaining units will have the same result.

The value of rulemaking is in establishing a framework which can be applied on a uniform basis. Bargaining unit determinations, however, have never been susceptible to such a standard. According to an extensive study conducted on behalf of the industrial research unit of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, it was concluded that—

[T]he vacillating trends and inconsistent results in many of the unit cases provide substantial evidence of the severity of this problem. An analysis of these same cases will reveal that much of the confusion in the area of unit determinations is attributable to the Board itself.[3]

Another example of the highly tenuous basis for proponents of this section is revealed in a statement contained in the Senate report (p. 20) that [e]xamples of such plainly appropriate units approved as a matter of course by the Board are single plant units * * *." However, a careful review of the case law on this subject reveals extensive litigation concerning the single plant vis-a-vis the multiplant unit, particularly where there is a high degree of functional integration of the employer's operations. As an indication of the disparity of thinking by Board members as to the proper unit configuration with respect to the single plant versus multiplant unit, member Leedom, in a dissenting opinion in S.D. Warren Co., 144 N.L.R.B. 204 (1963), aff'd. on the other grounds, 353 F.2d 494 (1st Cir. 1965), asserted that his colleagues' decision represented "an arbitrary grouping with no rational foundation."

[2] NLRB Order denying Petition for Proceedings for Rule Making, July 16, 1971.

[3] John Abodeely, The NLRB and the Appropriate Bargaining Unit at 6 (1971).

Mr. President, the problem with S. 2467 is that it assumes that the Labor Board is capable of establishing hard and fast unit structures by rulemaking. We must, as the Labor Board did in rejecting the AAUP rulemaking petition, seriously question such a capability. The adoption of bargaining unit rulemaking could well have a negative impact on existing collective bargaining arrangements, in cases where longstanding bargaining units would not coincide with newly created Board unit rules. The negative impact on labor relations stability of such a scenario would be very significant.

C. EQUAL ACCESS

1. EQUAL ACCESS—CURRENT LAW

Under the current law, unions have several campaign advantages not accorded to employers. Some of these advantages include the following: Union officials are allowed to carry the campaign to the employees' homes; [4] union officials can campaign without notification to the employer; union officials may speak to a small group of employees in close quarters; [5] and, union officials may make promises to employees as part of their campaign propaganda. Furthermore, employee organizers may solicit union support on company premises during nonworking hours and may distribute union literature in nonworking areas.

2. EQUAL ACCESS—PROPOSED CHANGES

Section 4 of the bill, which amends section 6 of the act, provides that the Board must issue regulations allowing employees an "equal opportunity to obtain in an equivalent manner" campaign information from a labor organization during a period of time the employees are seeking representation by a labor organization. In addition, after the union has given written notice to the employer that employees have demonstrated an interest in representation by that union, the union is entitled to an "equal opportunity to present information in a manner equivalent to the employer."

3. EQUAL ACCESS—SUGGESTED CHANGES

Due to the many advantages accorded to unions under the present election campaign procedures, this provision should be deleted in its entirety and the present law codified in this area.

If the concept of equal access is retained, and we strongly urge that it not be, it should be limited to cases where the Board or a Federal court has determined that on the basis of a complete evidentiary record, equal access is needed and alternate communication channels are lacking. This could be done in cases where an election had been set aside because of employer misconduct. The Board could then petition the Federal court for such relief.

In addition, section 6(b)(1)(A) of the act could be amended to provide the following changes:

(1) At page 5, line 16, after the word "organization," the following language should be added: "which has filed a timely petition with the National Labor Relations Board and prior to the conduct of an election pursuant to section 9 of the Act."

As a result, page 5, lines 16 to 19, should be deleted after the word "organization." This provision would, therefore, tie the equal access provision to the period between the filing of a petition and conduct of an election:

(2) At page 5, line 19, after the word "manner," the following language should be added: "provided that the labor organization shall compensate the employees at the applicable rate for the time spent at such a meeting if the employees were compensated by the employer."

4. EQUAL ACCESS—CRITIQUE

Section 4 of the most arbitrary and unfair provisions of the proposed bill. Most importantly, this provision is wholly unnecessary, because unions already have a vast array of communication avenues that employers are prohibited from using. This provision, together with the prohibitively short election time limits, insures that voters will not be given an adequate opportunity to fully weigh the merits of unionization. Indeed, upon careful review it is manifestly clear that this provision will do little to realize, and may, in fact, subvert the very purposes it seeks to accomplish.

The Board has, over a period of 42 years, developed various procedures and safeguards necessary to insure the fair and free choice by employees of their bargaining representative. The equal access rule contradicts the Board's lengthy experience in carefully balancing the rights of labor and management, notwithstanding the rule's total disregard with respect to an employer's property rights. The Board, however, has never held as a general rule that equal access for labor organizations in election campaigns is necessary. This is because labor organizations already have a large number of advantages under the current law, as set out above. Despite this background, this legislation gives unions an even greater advantage and, therefore, will destroy the former balance in organizational campaigns between labor and management.

As indicated in the Senate report, this provision is directed at "captive audience" speeches conducted by the employer during the campaign. It is based largely on a study conducted by Prof. Stephen Goldberg concerning the Board's election process.[6] According to Goldberg, "the employer has a substantial advantage in communicating with employees about union representation" resulting from company meetings during working hours.

Without addressing the issue regarding the accuracy of the Goldberg study or the proper weight it should be accorded, the question remains as to whether this provision achieves its objectives. First, there is a substantial question as to what constitutes the "required showing of interest" on the part of employees for the purpose of qualifying for the access rule. According to the Senate report (p. 26) "10 percent of the employees in the proposed unit, or a minimum of three employees in small units," constitutes a sufficient showing of interest. It is obvious that this definition is woefully inadequate because the ingredients constituting the proper showing of interest are never defined. For example, are the employees required to sign a petition to be given to the employer, or must the employer rely solely on the representations of the union organizers as to the number of supporters? These problems are exacerbated by the Senate report's additional statement (p. 26) in the nature of a disclaimer that "(t)his test is to be used as a rule of thumb only." If the test is not 10 percent of the employees or a minimum of three employees, is 8 or 5 percent or a minimum of one employee sufficient?

Second, as currently drafted, this provision would apply anytime an employer talks with his employees concerning unionization, even though no petition for an election has been filed by a union with the Board. As a result, it is likely that union organizers will notify employers that they have obtained several organizational cards and insist that they should have access to the company premises every time the company mentions unions. This process is particularly troublesome, because a union can simply continue notifying the employer that it has obtained organizational cards without a corresponding duty to file a petition to an election. Consequently, it is advisable to establish a rule whereby union organizers would be precluded from having equal access to the company's premises if they did not file a petition upon notifying the employer of union support within any 12-month period.[7]

Third, this provision is extremely vague with respect to its scope of coverage. Significantly, it appears that it would apply to such situations as a small group meeting conducted by an employer in which the subject of unionization is discussed, despite the fact that it is only one of numerous subjects covered. Hence, anytime an employer touches upon the subject of unions, however so briefly, a union might have the right to go through the lengthy and cumbersome ordeal of coming onto the employer's premises and addressing the employees, at the employer's expense and with a resulting loss of production.

Fourth, the breadth of this provision far surpasses its stated purpose of equalizing campaign opportunity. Thus, while the sponsors of the equal access provision maintained that it was aimed at an employer's "captive audience" speeches, as currently drafted and as described in the Senate report, this provision would apply to any communication, oral or written, by the employer during working hours on company premises. It is, of course, difficult to understand the necessity for expanding the coverage of this provision.

Fifth, there is an additional problem concerning the number of union officials who should be permitted on the company premises. Union campaigns usually entail the efforts of significant numbers of organizers who will surely want to spread their propaganda. However, the thought of a parade of organizers canvassing company premises should not be tolerated and, therefore, a maximum number of two officials should be set out in this provision.

Interestingly, the Goldberg study contains a factual account concerning the representation process which weighs strongly against the equal access and mandatory time periods for holding an election provision. As part of this study, 18 elections were evaluated to determine the proportion of authorization cards signed before the employer became aware of the organizational drive. According to the report, in 10 of the elections, all cards were signed before the employer became aware of the drive; and in four elections, 50 to 75 percent of the cards were signed before the employer became aware of the drive. As a result of this information, Professor Goldberg concludes that—

[I]t appears, then, that in most elections the employer does not know about the card-signing drive in time to respond before a majority of the cards have been signed.[8]

This study, thus, reveals the lack of employer knowledge concerning organizational attempts in most instances, a premise widely disputed by the sponsors of this bill. Since the employer must normally learn of union drives upon receipt of the petition for an election, it is certainly unfair and inequitable to afford union organizers with even greater advantages by allowing these persons to carry their campaign on company premises. Furthermore, the committee's refusal to consider this finding by Professor Goldberg when it gave carte blanche approval of his other findings which support different sections of the bill, is yet another indication of the obvious one-sided nature of this legislation to a degree which can only be characterized as egregious.

In light of the fervent push by organized labor to get this bill through Congress, it is not surprising that there is no duty placed upon unions to pay the employer's costs when production is curtailed due to a union organizer's speech on company premises. The notion that unions are unable to pay such costs is totally specious. Since the average number of employees in a bargaining unit is less than 50 and if you assume that the average wage rate is $5 per hour, then the union will be required to pay only a limited amount of money for a 1-hour speech or two half-hour speeches. Under no circumstances, therefore, should unions be permitted to avoid these costs.

Aside from these considerations, under current law there are two situations where the Board has been invested with discretion to expand a union's communication opportunities. On the one hand, there is a line of cases revealing unique circumstances so that the opportunities between the union and the employer are grossly disparate, regardless of either party's conduct. For example, in NLRB v. S & H Grossinger's Inc., 372 F.2d 26, 29 (2d Cir. 1967), the second circuit held that nonemployee organizers should be permitted access to employees on the employer's premises where "(n)o effective alternatives are available to the union in its organizational efforts." On the other hand, there is another line of cases indicating that where there may be no circumstantial disparity and opportunity, but the employer's conduct in intimidating employees from exercising existing communication opportunities, the Board is required not only to clear up those avenues, but also to provide the union with others. See exempli gratia, NLRB v. J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., 563 F.2d 8 (2d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 46 U.S.L.W. 3526 (1978).

D. FREE SPEECH

1. FREE SPEECH—CURRENT LAW

Under section 8(c) of the act, the often referred to "free speech" provision, the Board has a wide degree of discretion in establishing various rules and procedures for regulating an employer's and union's speeches during elections.

2. FREE SPEECH—PROPOSED CHANGES

Under section 6 of the bill,[9] the Board is authorized to issue and enforce rules applicable to campaigning during the 48-hour period preceding an election.

3. FREE SPEECH—SUGGESTED CHANGES

Section 8(c) of the act should be amended to provide:

(c) The expressing of any views, argument, opinion, or the making of any statement (including expressions intended to influence the outcome of an organizing campaign or the dissemination thereof), whether in written, printed, graphic, visual or auditory form, shall not (i) constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act, or (ii) constitute grounds for, or evidence justifying, setting aside the results of any election conducted under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

In addition, there is a need to define what type of activity occasions the implementation of this rule.

4. FREE SPEECH—CRITIQUE

While the free speech provision in the bill does not represent a serious encroachment on the current law, the Senate report places recent Board cases on this subject in jeopardy. According to the Senate report (p. 27), the Board would be given "the power to police such tactics as last minute material misrepresentations and captive audience speeches to the extent that the agency deems necessary."

Case law on this subject, however, substantially conflicts with the position that the Board would take under the Senate report. Under a new standard formulated in Shopping Kart Food Market, Inc., 228 N.L.R.B. 190 (1977), the Board no longer will police the truthfulness of noncoercive campaign rhetoric. This position is an outgrowth of the difficulties the Board encountered in making determinations regarding the materiality of particular misrepresentations under the former Hollywood Ceramics Co., Inc., 140 N.L.R.B. 221 (1962) test. Since the Board was unable to reach uniform and consistent results, it abandoned its former standards.

As perceived by numerous Federal circuit courts of appeals in ruling on Board decisions in this area, one of the difficulties under the former standard was the Board's abuse of its discretion in its treatment of campaign misrepresentations to favor unions over employers.[10] The courts, therefore, felt compelled to caution the Board that—[i]t should hardly need saying that this [the Hollywood Ceramics standard] no less applies to material misrepresentation by a union than by an employer. NLRB v. Lord Baltimore Press, Inc., 370 F.2d 397, 401–02 (8th Cir. 1966).

In any event, the Board has chosen to reduce its role in policing free speech. To the extent that the current position of the Board would be changed, as outlined by the Senate report, extensive and unnecessary litigation is anticipated.

Finally, there is no justification for limiting free speech during the 48-hour period. In light of the restrictive time period accorded to employers to conduct their campaigns, the 48-hour limitation constitutes an unwarranted infringement of the employer's freedom of expression.

II. DETERRENTS

The provisions under this bill providing new remedies for violators constitute extreme and oppressive sanctions. These proposals clearly reflect the viewpoints of those, like Secretary of Labor Marshall, who think that the only unremedied abuses are against unions. The provisions are totally antithetical to the remedial nature of the NLRA because they are designed for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is punishment. Such relief contradicts the Supreme Court decisions interpreting the Board's remedial authority which prohibited several Board orders that were [8] Goldberg, Getman and Herman, Union Representation Elections: Law and Reality 135 (1976).

[9] There is no counterpart provision contained in H.R. 8410.

[10] For an excellent discussion of this subject, see Williams, Janus, Huhn, NLRB Regulation of Election Conduct, 57–58 (1974) and the cases cited therein.

punitive or confiscatory (Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 7, 10–11 (1940);[11] NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 349 (1953)); or where "a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the act." Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540 (1943).

As characteristic of the result-oriented approach taken by the committee with respect to the representation process, an examination of the provisions containing deterrents in S. 2467 reveals the identical problem concerning an inadequate study of the problem or the solutions. According to the Board's 42d annual report, an inordinately high number of violations are committed by small businesses. However, a list of these violators will bear little, if any, correlation with a list of companies with meaningful Government contracts. Moreover, as in the example of a noted textile manufacturer, Government contracts only constitute approximately $5 million in comparison to a figure of $800,000,000 in sales in a recent fiscal year. Obviously, Government contracts are not a significant part of its business. One wonders, therefore, how effective a remedy will debarment be for most violators of the act.

For these same reasons, it is likely that other remedies under S. 2467 will not accomplish the goals of this legislation. Since some of these remedies—debarment, time and one-half and make-whole—are largely ineffectual, they should be deleted from the bill. As a substitute, another provision should be drafted along the following lines. At the moment it becomes clear that a series of employer violations have been committed or that the individual violation is not inadvertent or committed by a low level supervisor off on a frolic of his own, then it becomes appropriate for the Board to consider threatening the individuals who direct the company policy with meaningful sanctions that will cause them to change their behavior. Among these meaningful sanctions are the threat of imprisonment for contempt and steep fines.

(Mr. DECONCINI assumed the Chair.)

A. BACKPAY REMEDY

1. BACKPAY REMEDY—CURRENT LAW

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under the current law, there is a provision for backpay which is computed according to employee's wage rate. An employee's interim earnings are deducted from the total salary he would have received absent the employer's unfair labor practice. However, unless an employee makes a good faith effort to find interim employment, he wlil not be eligible to receive a backpay award.[12]

2. BACKPAY REMEDY—PROPOSED CHANGES

Under section 9 of the bill, which amends section (10c) of the act, employees who lose their jobs as a result of the company's unfair labor practices may receive a 150-percent backpay remedy less any wages actually earned by the employee. This remedy would apply in the following situations: Where employees are seeking representation by a labor organization, in a decertification or deauthorization election and prior to the signing of an initial collective-bargaining agreement.

3. BACKPAY REMEDY—SUGGESTED CHANGES

This provision is wholly unnecessary. However, if Congress believes this provision should remain in the bill, it should be rewritten to specifically impose a duty of mitigation.

4. BACKPAY REMEDY—CRITIQUE

For the reasons outlined above, the backpay scheme under the bill will probably not constitute an effective remedy, with the exception that in certain small businesses it will have a disastrous effect. Most importantly, since no duty of mitigation is imposed upon the employee, providing for mitigation serves no real purpose. The necessity for imposing a duty to mitigate is based upon the commonsense principle that an employee should make a bona fide attempt to reduce the amount of damages by the employer by seeking comparable employment.[13] Thus, the employee may not remain idle; he must seek other comparable employment and, if there are no other jobs available, he must remain in the labor market.[14]

B. DEBARMENT

1. DEBARMENT—CURRENT LAW

Under the current law under the National Labor Relations Act, there is no provision for debarment.

2. DEBARMENT—PROPOSED CHANGE

Under section 9 of this bill, which amends section 10(c) of the act, companies or labor organizations found to be in willful violation of a Board or court order may be debarred. This debarment procedure is initiated by the Board which makes a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor. While a 3-year period is the designated time interval for debarment, this provision gives the Secretary of Labor discretion in determining the debarment period.

3. DEBARMENT—SUGGESTED CHANGES

Assuming that Congress believes that debarment is a necessary sanction, enforcement should be left in the Federal district courts as characteristic of Board procedure with respect to contempt matters. Since the Board has been successful in enforcing contempt charges before the Federal district courts, there is no reason to assume that it will not be equally successful in bringing debarment charges in that forum. The Federal district courts assure there is no institutional bias or other personal or political considerations taken into account.

4. DEBARMENT—CRITIQUE

There can be no question that debarment is fundamentally punitive. Chief among the problems resulting from this new remedy is the fact that debarment would be profoundly counterproductive to the goal of S. 2467 to protect workers' rights, because of the simple fact that debarment would, in many cases, mean the loss of jobs for those employees who would be working on the contract. It obviously makes little sense to punish the worker for the employer's acts, even in cases where unfair labor practices by recalcitrant employers are willful and repeated.

The experience of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs (OFCCP) illustrates why debarment should not be implemented, or at the very least, why debarment should not be implemented at this time. The difficulties within the OFCCP became so severe that a special task force was assembled to develop constructive suggestions leading to a more workable program. The task force has just recently issued a report in September 1977, on its findings entitled "Preliminary Report on the Revitalization of the Federal Contract Compliance Program." The report is less than complimentary. In referring to the lack of standards or guidelines within the OFCCP, the report acknowledges that—

> Until such time as OFCCP codifies and demonstrates its ability to require rigid adherence by contract officers to reasonably definitive and objective standards for compliance decisions the fears of contractors will remain somewhat justified. (Emphasis added.)

The debarment provision is also without any qualifying language as to its application. As presently constructed, an entire corporation may be barred from receiving Government contracts even though only one of its affiliates or divisions is found guilty of a willful violation. Such a result is an overkill and is directly contrary to Board precedent which has developed several tests in analyzing whether two or more companies can be considered a "single employer." These tests include an analysis as to whether there is interdependence of operations, common ownership and control, and common direction of labor relations policies.[15] These tests could serve as a useful guide rather than following the current "shotgun" approach.

Mr. President, to sum up:

It also appears that the sponsors of debarment contemplate that the Board will cease having contempt power. Under the current law, the Board may seek a contempt order in the Federal district court compelling the respondent to comply with a former Board ruling. Under this section, however, the Board is imbued with the authority to seek debarment after determining that the respondent has willfully violated a final order. The difficulty with this scheme is the lengthy 6-month period of time it usually takes for an administrative law judge to reach a decision together with the additional 6-month period of time it usually takes the Board to reach a decision on appeal. The end result may, perhaps, be stated more graphically by the suggestion that, by providing relief according to the administrative law judge route as a substitute for contempt power, you might increase delays on the order of 1,000 percent. Moreover, Federal district courts are much speedier than administrative law judge proceedings and are empowered to give much greater relief in terms of possible sentences, fines, and the like, than an administrative law judge.

Supporters of debarment also fail to consider the Board's success in bringing contempt charges against violators of the act. Throughout its history, the Board's record of bringing contempt charges against repeated or willful violators of a Board order is impeccable. By the same token, there are a number of extraordinary remedies available to the Board in dealing with the very small percentage of persistent offenders.

In sum, debarment represents a complete and unwarranted change in the philosophy of the act. Since there is a very real possibility that it will result in idling workers, it profoundly contradicts the avowed goal of S. 2467 to protect workers' rights. Nor surprisingly, labor spokesmen have expressed much concern on this problem and the American Conference of the United States recommended that this sanction be deleted.

Mr. President, that constitutes about half of what I want to say in criticism, and in some cases support, of the bill before us. I will withold further comments until a proper time.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in continuation of my speech this morning, I should like to read a letter into the RECORD from the National Toll, Die, & Precision Machining Association at 9300 Livingston Road, Washington, D.C., 20022.

DEAR SENATOR HATCH: As elected president of the above association—comprised of more than 2400 companies in the U.S. tooling and machining industry—I'd like to bring to your attention what I feel to be some very serious (if not calamitous) inequities in the so-called Labor Law Reform Bill presently under consideration in the Senate. Although ours is a $6.5-billion-a-year industry, it is comprised exclusively of small businesses—many from your state—and it is these companies, and other small businesses like them, which would be most severely impacted by passage of S. 2467 and/or H.R. 8410.

It is our contention that these bills represent perhaps the most blatant and damaging affront to the small business community in its relations with organized labor since that relationship began.

While I know you are familiar with the basics of the legislation, two recently-released documents relative to S. 2467 have not received overwhelmingly wide distribution, and I would like to bring them to your attention since they are vital to the issue.

The first is a report prepared by the Office of Advocacy of the SBA but withheld by supporters of the labor bill in the Administration until pressure from some Senators brought about disclosure of the report. The SBA report indicates that changes proposed in the labor bill would "trip the delicate balance which exists between small business and labor in favor of the latter." To quote further from the SBA report: "The Labor Reform Bill will give unions an unfair advantage over small businesses who have neither the time nor expertise (including resources to acquire the expertise) to walk the very same compliance line proposed by the bills. Since the penalties for non-compliance are so severe, most small businesses confronted with a union organization drive will likely give up in advance rather than risk any action which might be construed later to have been illegal. This will result in unnecessarily increased costs which small businesses are least able to pass on to consumers. Projected further, this means many more small businesses going out of business."

The second document I would like to bring to your attention is a poll recently conducted by Patrick Caddell, perhaps best known as the pollster for President Carter. Although conducted for the American Retail Federation, the poll is quite revealing in terms of the public's conception of needed labor law "reform."

Based on 1500 interviews, the Caddell survey has revealed that "the largest single 'reform' desired by most respondents was a reduction of labor union power."

The poll also showed that the American public by a 41 to 33 margin does not want to "make it easier for unions to recruit new members." By a very impressive 48 to 22 margin, the poll also indicated that the public objects to easing the "rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees."

Senator, I urge you to take these two documents under heavy consideration in weighing the effects that the labor bill will have upon the small businesses which make up the backbone of commerce in the United States.

In recent committee reports, the Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives has described the tooling and machining industry as being a prototype of small businesses in the United States. In this light, you may be interested to know that this association's board of trustees has voted unanimously to oppose unequivocably S. 2467 and H.R. 8410.

Accordingly, we respectfully urge you to oppose any measures which would assure passage of this legislation, including efforts to invoke cloture against the extended debate being carried on in the U.S. Senate by the bill's opponents.

Sincerely,

JACK. B. SHERMAN,
President.

(Mr. MATSUNAGA assumed the chair.)

Mr. HATCH. Once again, I find it necessary to respond to a "Special Report" published by the AFL–CIO Task Force on Labor Law Reform which is replete with mistruths. This report, entitled "The Problem Is the Caseload," cites several statistics from the recently issued Forty-Second Annual Report of the National Labor Relations Board which the task force claims shows the Board to be an agency unable to process its cases in a timely manner. The figures, according to the report, contain a dire warning—"more cases for the Board and more delays for ordinary workers."

The first set of statistics shows the growth of NLRB decisions in unfair labor practice cases. The report states that in 1947 the Board decided 115 cases whereas 30 years later decisions were handed down in 1,127 cases. The conclusion, set in bold type, reads, "That Means Delay." We would have to agree that many things have changed in 30 years. However, a threshold question might be whether S. 2647 would enable the Board to process its cases more quickly. According to NLRB General Counsel John Irving, over 90 percent of the unfair labor practice cases coming before the NLRB in 1977 were disposed of in a median time of 42 days without the necessity of formal litigation by the Board. Equally important, of the 37,828 unfair labor practice cases taken in by the Board during fiscal 1977, the agency was able to close out 32,196 of these before issuance of a complaint, a healthy development due primarily to the fact that present law contains strong incentives for parties before the Board to settle their differences privately. However, an earlier analysis of H.R. 8410 compiled by the Boards' General Counsel predicts that if the labor law reform legislation were enacted, there would be a 3-percent drop in unfair labor practice settlements and 2,570 new unfair labor practice cases. Thus, if the AFL–CIO task force is concerned about delays that might occur from the growth in the Board's caseload, then it must be quite disturbed over the sharp increase in new cases that will be generated by passage of S. 2467.

The special report goes on to claim that "backpay awards alone show the need for reform." The report states that in 1976, 6,822 workers were awarded $11.2 million in backpay whereas in 1977, 7,220 workers were awarded $15.8 million, a 40-percent increase in 1 year. If one accepts organized labor's premise that all employers are inherently evil, then it would seem rather clear from these figures that the Board is doing a better job each year remedying past wrongs. Although it is difficult to decipher the point being made by the special report, if the task force is concerned about the dramatic increase in the amount of backpay won by workers, then it would seem that it would have great difficulty supporting provisions in H.R. 8410 and S. 2467 that would increase backpay awards by an additional 50 to 100 percent.

The third point made by the special report is that "employers are increasingly breaking the labor law." The report states that in 1977 the NLRB issued 4,834 complaints compared with 1,945 in 1967, a 40-percent increase in 10 years. The task force tells us that these figures indicate "the epidemic of business lawlessness." What the special report does not state is that complaints issued by the NLRB against unions also rose 40 percent during the same period, from 251 to 623. If labor-management relations in this country is awash in a sea of lawlessness, then it is puzzling why the "reform" legislation only addresses alleged employer wrongs.

The special report further states that "the administrative law judges need help." The basis for this claim is that during 1977, the Board received 37,828 unfair labor practice charges as compared with 17,040 in 1970. The task force, however, declines to state further that administrative law judges do not handle charges, rather they hold hearings on complaints that are not settled before the dispute reaches the hearing stage. Moreover, the Board's annual report states that 32,196 (or 85.6 percent) of the charges filed with the agency during fiscal 1977 were closed before issuance of a complaint. The annual report also states that the General Counsel was able to settle a substantial number of these remaining charges to such an extent that in 1977, administrative law judges were required to conduct hearings on initial unfair labor practice cases in only 1,381 instances. Interestingly, the same figure for 1967 was 1,024, not the sort of increase that one would think sounds the death knell for worker rights.

With regard to delays, I might also add that each administrative law judge hears only about 10 cases a year, as I analyze it. Yet this bill would give each of them an attorney to back him or her up.

What it amounts to is that, again, we are providing a good retirement for lawyers through this type of legislation, which, incidentally, is not unusual for the Congress of the United States. But I think the people of this country are getting tired of it. I think we have such a litigious and such a lawyer-prone society today that there is very little call for continuing the type of legislation that continues to accentuate the need for lawyers in our society.

That is in spite of the fact that I am a lawyer and appreciate and respect the practice of law very much.

DELAYS IN REPRESENTATION CASES

One of the more interesting aspects of the task force report is the short shrift given to delays in representation cases since one of the principal intentions of S. 2467/H.R. 8410 is the speeding up of the election process.

I was just confronted by a number of AFL-CIO union members outside on the Senate steps.

I have a lot of respect for those men for lobbying here in Washington, trying to express their particular points of view. But, on the other hand, their point was that they felt that they have been held up in their election process and that this is a flagrant situation.

The strict expedited election requirements of S. 2467/H.R. 8410 are premised on the theory that the NLRB moves too slowly in holding elections to determine whether employees wish to become union members and in resolving legal questions that materially affect the outcome of such elections. The labor reform bills, therefore, would impose a series of inflexible deadlines for holding these elections and require legal questions surrounding the voting to be resolved after the election. This is the so-called famous vote-and-impound situation.

However, according to the annual report, during fiscal 1977 the Board received a record 14,358 representation cases while closing 15,436 such cases. A key factor in this excellent record was that 82 percent of the cases were processed without the necessity of a formal Board hearing. Of the 9,795 representation elections actually held during the year, 7,986 or 81.5 percent were conducted under voluntary agreement by the parties. Most important, the Board itself was required to direct an election in only 64 instances. This figure represents about one-half of 1 percent of these cases.

If the labor law reform legislation were to be enacted, according to NLRB General Counsel Irving there would be a 47 percent drop in such voluntary agreements, which would require hearings and regional director or Board decisions in more than 4,000 additional cases (24 daily labor report G-1, 3 (1978)). Existing Board procedures would be crippled by such a dramatic decline in voluntary agreements as substantial delays in case handling would be the inevitable result.

In other words, these men and women who confronted me on the steps of the Capitol today would not be helped at all. They claim that they have been barred, that they voted for a union in their particular business 4 months ago, and that they have been barred for that long, by company action or inaction, from forcing the union upon the company.

The fact is that if this bill is passed, we will have even more delays than they have had now, assuming that there is no valid reason for the delays they have undergone. That may be an assumption which we should not make at this particular time.

I am sure that, in their eyes, any action by the employer would be invalid. But in this free country, employers do have rights, and there are many actions they can take which are valid under the rules, albeit at some future time the NLRB may come down against them or the courts may come down against them.

In any event, what we have just pointed out is that there would be a 47-percent drop in voluntary compliance and voluntary agreements between the parties, which would add 4,000 additional cases to the caseload of the Board, which would be inordinate and would cause even more difficulties for the employees if this bill is enacted.

This bill is not an employer bill. It is a Washington labor-leader bill, and it adds more power to this special interest group, which is too powerful, in the eyes of most people in the country today, in Washington.

Further evidence of the expeditious manner in which the Board now operates is found in the median time required from the filing of a petition by a union requesting an election to the issuance of a direction to hold the election. The time for such actions during fiscal 1977 was 43 days, down from 47 days during the previous year. One would think that a Federal agency should be commended, not condemned, for concluding a hearing process and resolving complex legal issues within a median time of 6 weeks. Under the labor reform bills, however, proponents point out that the Board would no longer have sufficient time for such questions to be answered until after the election has been concluded. Rather, the fixed election times would effectively require employees to vote on union representation before a determination of their legal rights had been made. The legislation trades away the resolution of significant preelection issues in return for holding elections a week or two sooner than is now the case.

As Secretary of Labor Marshall stated during a Washington Star interview earlier this year while discussing the expedited election procedures in S. 2467:

> If there are legitimate legal problems, they ought to be taken up after the election, not before.

I think these are important things to note, but something else is important.

When I appeared on the Advocates program, I made the comment, with regard to one of my arguments, that there is little or no justification for expanding the Board from five to seven members, except for the desire of certain persons and certain special interest groups to pack the Board even more than it is today; that the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board has stated that they work only 4 hours a day deciding cases, which is the principal reason for the Board's existence, to begin with.

I did not mean to imply by that that the only thing they do is work 4 hours a day. But the Chairman took from that program the attitude that that is what I said; that what I said was that they work only 4 hours a day deciding cases. I did not say that.

I confronted the Chairman with this. I said, "No; what I said was that the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board said that they work only 4 hours a day deciding cases, which is the principal reason for the existence of the Board, to begin with," which had a natural implication that they did other things than decide cases, the principal reasons for their existence.

The Chairman, Mr. Fanning, then said, "Oh, that's different." The next day he wrote me a letter and demanded that I retract that comment, and I could not, because I heard it from his own lips, and we knew he had made the statement on other occasions. He became kind of upset about it and demanded that I retract. I would not retract, because he did say it.

So I wrote a letter to him, under the Freedom of Information Act, asking him how much time Board members did spend out of the office during the last couple of years. I think it might be interesting to know.

I do not mean to be critical at this time. I think that the particular duties they have may be necessary—some of them—and that there is more to being a Board member than deciding cases, although that is the principal reason for being a Board member. I think it will be interesting to note some of the responses I receive.

With regard to the National Labor Relations Board members travel statistics, one of the two principal aims of the labor reform legislation is to "expedite the procedures" of the National Labor Relations Act.

NLRB BOARD MEMBERS' TRAVEL STATISTICS

One of the two principal aims of the labor reform legislation is to "expedite the procedures" of the National Labor Relations Act. Proponents of the legislation paint a bleak picture of the board's ability to absorb its ever-increasing caseload, despite the facts I have cited to the contrary. The Senate report, for example, suggests that it is:

[I]mpossible for the Board to keep pace with the continuing increase in the number of meritorious unfair labor practice charges alleging interference with employee rights without additional statutory amendments. For, in the past 10 years, while organizing activity has stayed at the same level, litigation in this category has doubled from 1585 cases in 1976 to 3345 cases in 1976.

As the Board's 42d annual report indicates, this trend continued into fiscal 1977 with 37,828 unfair labor practice charges being filed.

Proponents of labor "reform" suggest that one way of addressing the Board's caseload problem is to expand the number of Board members from five to seven. Again in the words of the Senate report:

There is a limit to the capacity of a Board member to absorb material in any given period of time . . . [and] an increase in Board membership from 5 to 7 . . . will enable the Board to handle more cases and reduce the time it presently takes to dispose of cases at that level.

This picture of five Board members hopelessly adrift in a sea of paperwork is simply a myth which does not do justice to the Board's ability to manage its caseload. It is a myth which is not borne out by the statistics. In fiscal 1977, for example, the Board absorbed a record 52,943 cases and closed 53,908 cases thereby reducing its backlog by nearly 1,000 cases. In addition, the five-member Board issued a record 1,848 formal decisions.

Nor do the statistics portray a Board restricted to their offices on Pennsylvania Avenue by an avalanche of cases. Indeed, figures supplied to me by the current members of the Board indicate that they regularly find time to mingle with their public constituency at conventions, seminars, and other events. The information supplied encompasses travel and speaking engagements for 1976 and 1977 by Chairman Fanning and members Jenkins, Penello, and Murphy, and early 1978 figures for members Jenkins, Murphy, and Truesdale. In view of the August 1977, resignation of member Walther—a frequent public critic of Board policies such as its Midwest Piping and Weingarten doctrines—statistics relating to his travel and speaking engagements have not been received. According to the information supplied, in calendar year 1976 four Board members made 82 separate trips and 71 speeches affecting approximately 141 working days either in whole or in part. The cost to the taxpayers for such trips amounted to nearly $24,000. In 1977, 47 speeches were made in the course of 57 trips affecting 117 working days. The cost was nearly $22,000.

It should be emphasized that there is absolutely nothing inherently wrong with such travel. Indeed, it frequently results in a healthy exchange of information and ideas between the Board members and the public. However, these figures quite clearly do not support the claim that the current Board members are so deluged with cases that they have little or no time for anything except making decisions. To the contrary, during 1977 when the Board members were in the process of issuing a record number of decisions, they nevertheless found time to take an average of 14 trips and deliver 11 speeches each. And remember we are not counting all the Board members, only the majority of them.

It is important to point out that these figures reflect only the tip of the iceberg because they do not include the numerous hours devoted to speech preparation. With the exception of the executive assistant to the Chairman who performs some speechwriting, none of the Board members are assigned speechwriters. Instead, either they must prepare the speeches themselves or members of their staff must be assigned to this task. Thus, significant amounts of staff time are frequently diverted from case processing to speechwriting.

Yes, the Board has a heavy workload. Yes, the position of Board members can, at times, be demanding. But no, the current Board members are not at the point of exhaustion. And no, the answer to expediting Board procedures is not to increase the size of the Board from five to seven Board members. The appointment of two additional Board members—in addition to making it more difficult to achieve a concensus and issue decisions expeditiously—will merely subject the American taxpayers to a 20-percent increase in Board member trips and speeches. I, for one, can think of far preferable ways to spend my tax dollar, and I think the vast majority of all Americans can think of preferable ways themselves.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a table containing the summary of travel for the NLRB members for fiscal years 1976, 1977, and 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana reserves the right to object.

Mr. MELCHER. And I shall not object, but I think it would serve the purpose of the Senator from Utah and the purpose of the Senate better if the source of the information was cited at this time.

Mr. HATCH. I did cite the source. It came from the Board members themselves.

Mr. MELCHER. I understand then that this is a résumé?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, this is a résumé which we have compiled from the Board members.

Mr. MELCHER. From the individual Board members?

Mr. HATCH. From the individual Board members' own information.

Mr. MELCHER. I see. This compiles all that information?

Mr. HATCH. Yes; I believe it compiles it accurately.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] The information submitted suggests that this figure may not include all travel days.

[2] Statistics unknown.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that none of my speeches thus far be considered a first or second speech in this matter in violation of the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I yield the floor to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as we rapidly approach the first of what may be many cloture votes on this labor law reform bill, the Senator from Kansas would like to address one of the most hotly debated subjects that this legislation has created. As I have said each time I have addressed the Senate on this particular bill, both the proponents and opponents of this legislation have a genuine concern about its potential impact on small businesses of America. I repeat that I doubt that the legislation is as bad as the Chamber of Commerce suggests nor as good as the AFL–CIO or other groups might suggest. We are all in agreement that small businesses are in a significantly different position relative to union powers and larger concerns. We are all agreed that small businesses should not have to bear the same burdens and penalties that may be justified for other businesses. Our divergence of opinion occurs when the proper solution to these perceived problems is addressed.

EXPEDITED ELECTIONS

Under the present law, there are no mandated deadlines for the direction and holding of elections. The National Labor Relations Board has the flexibility to arrive at a fair determination in each case. Section 6 of this bill would establish mandatory time periods for the holding of elections. These time periods can be summarized as follows: An election must be directed within 13 days after filing a petition supported by a majority of the employees and the election must be held in not less than 21 days and no more than 30 days from the filing of the petition. When the petition seeks a unit not established by rule or is supported by less than a majority of the employees, a 45-day time limit is imposed.

This particular proposal would have its most severe impact on small businesses. As has been well documented during this debate, plants of 100 or fewer employees have become the primary target for recent organizational efforts of labor organizations. Plants of this size usually have managers who perform several jobs and the owner may operate in this position. Few of these employers and managers are specialists in any sense when it comes to labor law or the legal limitations and requirements placed upon them or their businesses, if a union organizer makes contact with their employees. With constant inflation and ever-increasing Government induced paperwork, these small businesses are kept busy just trying to keep their head above water and operate at a profit. They simply do not have the time to become knowledgeable about representation elections.

On the other hand, the labor organizer is a specialist. That is what he does. He does it day after day. He is a specialist in his single area of concern which is organizing unorganized workers. No one quarrels with that. That is a fact.

Many times, these organizers keep a low profile and this organizing activity does not come to the employer's attention until enough cards have been secured to petition for an election. Therefore, the small businessman's first notice that an organizational effort is being mounted could be when he is served with an election petition. He could have as little as 3 weeks' notice before the election is actually held.

To understand the full impact of this new rule, the efforts that unions commonly make in organizational campaigns must be reviewed. For example, unions are permitted by law to make promises to employees which do not have to be kept. They might be classed with some promises made by those in politics.

Employers on the other hand are forbidden from making any promises during an organizational drive. Because of court interpretations of constitutionally protected free speech, unions can give out information that may be incorrect. A small businessman would have little opportunity to refute or even check the accuracy of union claims. If our concern is to insure that employees make a reasoned, unpressured decision, it would appear these time limits are inappropriate.

Mr. President, since 80 percent of all elections are currently being held within 45 days, the proposed amendments are questionable as to their necessity. The use of mandated time periods is also faulty in that it presumes that where a union receives a majority of signed authorization cards, an election should be conducted in a shorter period of time. It has been repeatedly recognized that employees' signatures on authorization cards are not a reliable indication of employee support for a union. A recent study relied on by the Human Resources Committee revealed that only 72 percent of card signers actually voted for union representation in the subsequent election. If an employee only hears one side of a story, it is not difficult to sign a card, particularly where the consequences of signing are not told to the employee.

It is much like signing a petition to Congress. Most anyone will sign a petition, most anyone will sign a card, particularly where you have only been exposed to one side of the argument. Many times when you hear both sides, as you should, you might have a different view. But if you only hear one side it is not difficult to sign up, particularly where the consequences of signing are not told to the employee. All of these problems are intensified in a small business election campaign. Fewer employees must be contacted to convince a majority to sign. A small businessman is also less able to discuss the advantages of nonunion status and the disadvantages of union membership with his employees. The result will be forcing employees into an uninformed decision.

UNEQUAL ACCESS

Mr. President, at other points in this debate the Senator from Kansas has discussed the conceptual problems involved in the so-called equal access section of this bill. I have previously noted that a serious constitutional challenge could be mounted to this provision in addition to the practical problems which would be created. However, this provision also has potential for seriously impacting the conduct of small business labor relations.

Section 4 of H.R. 8410 provides that whenever an employer speaks to his employees concerning union representation, the labor organization must be provided an equal opportunity to submit campaign information in an equivalent manner. As has been repeatedly pointed out, there is no equality in such a proposal.

Under the current law, unions have several campaign alternatives not accorded to employers. Some of these measures include the following: Union officials are allowed to carry the campaign to the employees home whereas employers can only address groups of employees at the workplace. Union officials can campaign without notification to the employer for any length of time. Union officials may make promises to employees as part of their campaign efforts, but employers may not make any promises. Also, employee organizers may solicit union support on company premises during nonworking hours and may distribute union literature in nonworking areas.

Each of these advantages is an even greater tool in a small business organization campaign. There are fewer employees to contact at their homes, and the inherent pressure of a personal request to sign an authorization card is increased.

As drafted, this provision appears to apply to such situations as a small group meeting conducted by an employer in which the subject of unionization is discussed, despite the fact that it is only one of numerous subjects covered. When a small businessman has daily, repeated contacts with his employees, casual conversation concerning unions is much more likely to occur. The Senator from Kansas doubts whether the employees would be benefited from requiring an equal opportunity for unions in such a situation. This section would also apply whenever a union has obtained any organization cards even though no petition for an election has been filed. Therefore, it is possible that a union could effectively prohibit a small businessman from discussing union efforts with his employees at any time by the simple expedient of keeping a few organization cards on file.

If the communication concerning unions by the employer occurs during working hours in working areas, the problems are multiplied. A possible interpretation of this section would require the employer to pay the wages of his employees while the union spoke with the employees. Both the additional cost and the nonproductive time would be more difficult for a small business to absorb.

DEBARMENT

Mr. President, the current National Labor Relations Act has no provision for debarment from Government contracts for those companies who have violated the act. Nevertheless, section 9 would debar those companies or labor organizations found to be in willful violation of Board or court order. This debarment procedure would last for 3 years in normal cases. The major problems with this new remedy revolve around the fact that debarment would be counterproductive to the goal of protecting workers' rights. This is because of the simple fact that debarment would, in many cases, mean the loss of jobs for those employees who would be working on the contract. It obviously makes little sense to punish the worker for the employers' acts.

According to the National Labor Relation Board's 42d annual report, an inordinantly high number of violations are committed by small businesses. I refuse to believe that this is the result of any malice on the part of small businessmen. Rather, I am certain that it is the result of a lack of understanding of the complex rules and regulations that have developed through more than 40 years of cases and rulings by the Board.

The Senator from Kansas believes that debarment represents a complete and unwarranted change in philosophy of the act. Since there is a very real possibility that it will result in idling more workers and forcing small businessmen to close their businesses, it profoundly contradicts the avowed goal of this bill which is to protect workers' rights.

MAKE-WHOLE REMEDIES

Mr. President, under current law, there is no provision for a make-whole remedy. Section 9 of the bill again is a departure from past practice. Under this section, the Board may award compensation to union employees for a delay in entering the first contract if that delay is caused by an unfair labor practice of the employer.

The amount would be measured by the difference between the wages actually received and the wages the employees were receiving at the time of the unfair labor practice multiplied by an inflator. That inflator would be the percentage of change in wages and other benefits in the Bureau of Labor Statistic's quarter report for major collective bargaining settlements.

While this make-whole remedy represents a fundamental shift in Board policy concerning collective bargaining, it would also make an unwarranted penalty for small businesses. It is difficult to understand why the average wage and benefit settlements index is an appropriate standard. This index penalizes employers whose wage rates may be less than the index. An analysis of the companies comprising this index shows such industries as telephone, steel, automobile, aluminum, and rubber industries. All of these industries are oligopolies, they are all capital intensive, and they are all industries in which the unions have had a historic stronghold. Thus, by definition, these settlements will be significantly greater than the normal first contracts for a small employer.

A case in point is the recently negotiated coal contract. The contract was front-loaded, which entails a greater salary increase during the first years than in the final year. Therefore, the first year's salary increase may be as high as 15 or 16 percent. Similarly, in a report recently released by the Department of Labor, agreements covering 5,000 or more workers had increases in total compensation of 14.6 percent. This percentage exceeds even the unbelievably high rate of inflation which has recently been reported. At the time when our country is experiencing the worst inflation in many years, and there appears to be no end to this inflationary spiral in sight, this bill would build in a guarantee of further inflation in wage settlements. This type of disregard for the American public is unacceptable to the Senator from Kansas.

LITIGATION

Mr. President, while the small businessman is at a disadvantage in any of his dealings with a union, that disadvantage is never more prevalent than in the litigation context. The union is represented by experienced, very capable counsel who have dealt with hundreds or thousands of similar cases. On the other hand, the small businessman is unable to afford atorneys of equal caliber. The NLRB General Counsel has himself predicted that this legislation will substantially increase litigation before the NLRB and Federal courts.

Some of the areas in which litigation is likely to increase are easily perceived. The expedited election provision will result in fewer elections being agreed to by the parties in light of the arbitrary time period. Without a proper time period for the employer to present his views on unionization, litigation will be forced on those issues which otherwise would have been consented to prior to the election. The committee also extends the Board's injunctive authority to section 8(a)(3) discharge cases. Under this provision, the Board would be required to seek injunctive relief to have a discharged employee reinstated during an organizational campaign if the Board believes there is "reasonable cause" to issue a complaint. Mr. Irving also predicted this provision will result in a dramatic increase in petitions because respondents litigating these controversial cases will be less inclined to settle the underlying unfair labor practice charges.

EXEMPTION AMENDMENTS

Mr. President, the proponents of this legislation have announced that they will bring up an amendment to address the concerns that the Senator from Kansas and others have expressed about small businesses. The pending amendment introduced by the distinguished majority leader would preserve the existing jurisdictional standards developed by the National Labor Relations Board with respect to small businesses. In effect, that amendment provides that the Board "shall not assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute over which it would decline jurisdictions" under the standards in force on May 1, 1978. I accept this amendment as a good-faith attempt to allay the concerns of certain Senators about this legislation. Unfortunately, this amendment will not solve any of the problems that would be created by passage of this legislation. This failure arises from two primary considerations.

First, this amendment would not prevent the adverse application of the new provisions in this bill to any business which currently meets the NLRB's jurisdictional standards. More than 75 percent of all employees work for employers who are covered by the National Labor Relations Act. The infringement that this bill would make on their rights is not affected by the proposed amendment. This amendment does not address the problems created by the make-whole remedy, the 150-percent pay remedy, the debarment provisions, or any other section of the bill which has been criticized for its impact on small businesses.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator may recall, either from being present or reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that this point was discussed by the Senator from Utah, who said that those small businesses that were not covered under the standards as set by the Board, might come under the jurisdiction of the Board, because those standards might be changed at any time at the discretion of the Board.

In view of that, would not the Senator from Kansas agree with me that the amendment clearly tells small businesses where they stand concerning the jurisdiction of the board over their particular business?

Mr. DOLE. I would only say I was not present when this matter was discussed earlier by the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. GARN), but as I understand the analysis that I have set forth, it is supported by the small business community itself.

It is my understanding that the small business community and their representatives said that this amendment does not address their underlying concerns. We are trying to make certain that we are protecting the rights of small business, but as I look at the amendment we have not reached that point. Maybe there will be some effort to clarify that.

It would seem to me that those small businesses which have been targets of union organizational activity would still be targets of that effort, whether or not this amendment was adopted.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I only make this one point: That the amendment addresses a point that was discussed rather thoroughly here on the floor, as to whether or not at some future time the Board, under its own discretion, its own decision, could decide to extend its jurisdiction. As to that question, the amendment clarifies the point of what small businesses are under the Board's jurisdiction.

Since the case of retail businesses, or restaurant businesses or hotel, or motel businesses, many of them are not under the jurisdiction of the NLRB, this amendment clarifies it and makes it simple for them. You do not have to do as the Senator mentioned earlier, hire an attorney to find out what the law is or what your rights are on that particular point.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. As a practical matter, the amendment was designed to deal with narrowing the universe which was in controversy. Our feeling was that many small businessmen were alarmed and induced to protest to their Senators, et cetera, on the ground that, well, the National Labor Relations Board can always change its mind. So by incorporating this particular amendment in the law, making it statutory and mandatory, we feel that we have taken out 75 percent, certainly, of the people who felt that they had a gripe and a complaint, and a right to express it. We feel that is narrowing the area of controversy, and I might tell the Senator this: I hope very much that the opposition will express itself on such an amendment; I think the yeas and nays are fine. I think we ought to have a yea and nay vote on this amendment and the Ford amendment, to which it is attached. I think we will then be dealing with what should be legitimate opposition.

I personally think to create an illusory opposition simply fortifies the position of people like myself that the small businessman is being used rather than being served.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. First, let me say I appreciate the comments of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from New York. I do not have any quarrel with efforts to narrow the issues in the debate. Certainly, we will pursue our responsibility to be fair and objective. I am voicing the concerns expressed to me by the very people who are supposed to be saved by the amendment. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HATCH. I think it should be pointed out, since the colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Montana and myself, that what the issue was is that prior to this Byrd amendment, which has been amended by the Ford amendment, by board ruling there are certain jurisdictional amounts which are set which labor has argued excludes 78 percent of the businesses in our society, at least small businesses, from the effect of invocation of the National Labor Relations Act. What they have failed to say is that it does not exclude 76 to 80 percent of the workers in the society. All it excludes are, basically, sole proprietorships or individual businesses which are owned by individual proprietors who work for themselves, or units which are so small that the unions would not organize them anyway.

That is by rule.

What this amendment does is it would preserve by statute that present state of the law, which is still not doing very much one way or the other for small businesses other than preserving the present state of the law, which would be a step in the right direction, perhaps, in the eyes of some people. But it looks as though, according to the small business associations that I have been chatting with, this is just a ploy to keep the present law rather than really do something for small business and yet bring the vast majority of all small businesses and their employees under the aegis of this particular "reform" bill.

The point that was made was that although the present rules have existed for quite a while, the jurisdictional rules, John Fanning, the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, recently gave a speech saying he would like to expand that jurisdiction to go beyond the rules. The fact of the matter is I think he would have a very difficult time in doing that under the present Board status, or in any other way. The rules are very unlikely to be changed whether or not we make them statutorily defined.

What it really comes down to is that this amendment does not do much for anybody. It does not change anything. It does not really change the present state of the law. It does not benefit small business in any way, shape or form, other than to have a statute rather than a rule.

As a practical matter the unions are not allowed to organize sole proprietorships, nor will they take the time to organize businesses which are so small, that have units which are so small, that it does not pay to organize them.

So as a practical consequence, nothing is being done for small business here, at least in my viewpoint and in the viewpoint of, I think, most small businessmen who are presently under attack by the labor movement, or who may be in the future.

I think that might help the distinguished Senator from Kansas to know about what the distinguished Senator from Montana and myself related to in our prior colloquy.

So this amendment really does not do anything. It does not hurt anybody or help anybody. It really is a little bitty amendment that does not help anybody and does not hurt anybody. On the other hand, there is a feeling among the small business community that like so many amendments like this, these little bitty amendments, it needs to be fought because they are afraid that somebody will think maybe this amendment does help them when it really does not help them. It does not solve the small business problems with this bill, nor does it solve the small business problems raised by the Rinfret report, nor does it help the small business problems raised by the Small Business Administration's Office of Advocacy report, nor the problems emphasized in the polls showing that the vast majority of all people in this country yes, would like labor reform, but in another way. They would like to see labor reformed and not given more power.

That, frankly, is what this bill is all about. It is giving labor more power, this special interest group, which the vast majority of people feel is too vast already.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield for 1 minute?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The difficulty with the point which I have just heard made is that it is not the workers who are complaining. The people complaining are the entrepreneurs. When you speak of all the small business community, you are not talking about workers. You are talking about owners. We say that under the statute if you let us pass this amendment, we are ready to vote, we will take out 75 percent of the people complaining and the people who feel this is unjust, that it is rough on them. Maybe if they are not going to be organized now, they may be organized later.

So it seems to me that this makes a very measurable step forward. It very materially confines the area of those who have any complaint. You do not hear the workers complaining that they do not want this bill or that it is invidious to them. They will be out of it, too. But you do not hear them complaining. The people complaining are the employers, the entrepreneurs. So it seems to me we make a very measurable contribution by taking out 80 or 78 percent of the complainers. I just wanted to make that very clear.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield again with regard to that last statement of the Senator from New York?

Mr. DOLE. May I yield first to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator for yielding. I think the amendment goes right to the point that was being discussed in the debate on May 23 here in the Senate, which occurs on page 14993 in the RECORD. The Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) said:

> Let me just add this: The present Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board has been on the Board for in excess of 20 years. He is on record as being for expanded jurisdiction. In other words, he wants to expand the Board's jurisdiction by narrowing these guidelines. I believe we are going to find that, regardless of what happens here, the guidelines will be narrowed.

So the amendment that was introduced and cosponsored by so many of us goes strictly to that point and directly to that point. The guidelines will not be narrowed. We will make it statutory. We will leave them where they are.

I think the Senator has brought about, in the course of these debates, a very worthwhile amendment, though I do not think the Senator from Utah has cosponsored it; has he?

Mr. HATCH. No.

Mr. MELCHER. The debate has been going on pointing out that the Board had the discretion. The Chairman of the Board, Mr. Fanning, had said he wanted to narrow the guidelines, and if he had his way he would. That is taken care of by the amendment. He will not be able to do so.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from Montana. I yield to the Senator from Utah for 1 minute.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas, and also the distinguished Senator from Montana for the point he has made.

Regarding the point made by the distinguished Senator from New York, first of all the employees are not the ones being excepted. Seventy-six to eighty percent of all employers will continue to be covered whether or not this amendment happens to pass. No matter what happens here they will be covered. The only ones who will not be covered will be those sole proprietorships or units so small the unions will not try to organize them anyway because it would not make economic sense.

The distinguished Senator from New York indicated that the employees are not complaining about this bill, but only the employers, the entrepreneurs.

That is not, in my opinion, quite true, because the polls are showing that the vast majority of people in this country are complaining about this type of legislation, including about 50 percent of the union employees, who do not want any further power lodged in the hands of the Washingtonian labor leaders through bills such as this. In fact, the polls are pretty clear on it, not only the opinion research poll, but the Cambridge Associate poll as well.

So the employees are complaining. People throughout society are complaining and they are scared to death that this delicate balance is going to be tipped completely, or at least to a great degree, into the hands of the Washingtonian labor union leaders. If that happens, everybody is going to lose.

That is the attitude that comes through all over our society. So it is not 75 percent of employees who are complaining, that is not true. It is actually 78 percent of small businesses that are sole proprietorships or so small that they are exempted under present law and will not be changed a bit under this law. But the vast majority of all employees will be subject to this law and I think that is where it comes down.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator will yield further just a moment, I gather the figures that are extrapolated to try to include the workers are these surveys that the minority leader put out, of which I have a copy here.

Those have been very, very thoroughly discussed and debated on the floor as to what the phrasing of the questions implies. I want to refer back to that argument, leading into this one, the point that was just made, this effort to extrapolate that workers are objecting, where they are specialized questioned designed to elicit certain answers. I am not going to redebate that particular issue, but I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this place in the RECORD, the record of that debate which dealt with the validity of those particular surveys.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appreciate that, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana dealt with the Cambridge Report survey, which was first introduced into the debate this morning by the distinguished minority leader; and his talk raises certain questions that I wanted to discuss.

I think it could be agreed that in polling public opinion it is difficult to formulate questions in a manner that is both precise and does not suggest a response. The Cambridge poll presented several questions that, in my view, were not accurate if they were intended to elicit public opinion about the bill that is before us here in the Senate. As an example, one of the questions was put this way:

In general, do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?

That was the question.

This question certainly does not accurately reflect the bill before us. The bill does not make the rules easier for a union to organize workers, yet the question was put in exactly those terms:

Do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?

What we have before us is a bill that makes it easier for employees to obtain the information they need to decide. The bill makes it easier for workers to decide in a prompt election whether they want a union. All of the provisions here run directly to the individual, the employee, not to the union. It goes to the employee in terms of the opportunity to be educated and informed on the decision that he or she will have to make at the time of the election. It makes it easier for the employee to have an opportunity to express that decision in a democratic election, whether that decision is to have a union, or not to have a union.

So instead of asking a question in terms of making it easier for unions, I was wondering, as the Senator from Indiana was speaking, what the response would have been if the question was put this way:

Do you think the rules should be changed to make it easier for workers to get information equally from both sides before they vote on whether or not they want a union?

I would have asked the Senator whether he would agree that had this question been asked, the answer, given the American public's sense of fair play, would have been quite different than as it was to the question presented in the Cambridge poll.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would not think that question would be fair under the facts in this bill. If equal access were to be applied, I think this would be unequal. Today the balance is in favor of labor with regard to the special treatment that it gets in regard to explaining its provision. If we add the equal access provision, that gives it almost total control over the explanation concerning the unionization of any particular business.

I do not think the Senator from Indiana would think that was a fair question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is another question, on page 5 of the Cambridge poll:

One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go on to the property of businesses at any time, including working time, and try to recruit members. Do you favor or oppose this idea?

This is probably the most inaccurate description of what the bill does in terms of equal access, yet that was the preface to the question, "Do you favor or oppose this idea?" The preface to that was, "One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go on to the property of businesses at any time, including working time."

The bill's equal access provision does not grant this opportunity or right at all. There is nothing in the bill which says that the union organizers can go on to company premises at any time. With a reading of the bill itself we can see that there are situations where the employer opens the door and creates thereby an equal opportunity for the employees to have access to information from those who would advocate the union. But in no way does it open that door at any time to union organizers to come on to the property.

Here, again, we have the question that is leading the person interviewed to the answer, the classical case of a leading question.

I wonder if in asking public opinion about access, the results would have been different if the question had been put this way:

If the employer calls the workers together in the plant to give an antiunion speech, do you think the workers should have an equivalent opportunity to hear the other side?

A question put in that form would reflect what this bill seeks and provides, an equivalent opportunity to match, in argument, the arguments made by the employer. That is all. Under the legislation, it certainly would not be at any time and at the will or the instigation of those who are advocating the union. It is only when the employees have been systematically exposed to the views of the person who speaks with the most authority, the employer, that the other side would get its opportunity for the presentation of its opposing view.

Again, I think the great American spirit of fair play would result in a clear answer by the American people of yes if the question had been phrased to accurately describe what is in our bill.

On page 6 of the poll included in the RECORD earlier today, this question was put:

When union elections are held, should the election be held immediately after some employees indicate they want a union, or should there be a waiting period such as a month between then and the election so that both the union and the business can explain their positions and campaign for support among employees?

First, I would have to say that my first reaction in hearing that question was that it is not talking about this bill at all, because the bill does not require or even suggest that elections be held immediately.

Second, what the question suggests as a reasonable waiting period, about a month, is pretty close to what this bill does provide, as a matter of fact. The shortest period is 21 days and for the simplest situation the period is 21 to 30 days.

On this question, Mr. President, if the actual terms of the bill had been related I wonder whether the results would have been different.

I think that the same 70 percent would have favored the bill's provisions without the erroneous suggestion that the alternative was to hold the election immediately. After that, regarding a waiting period of about a month, the result probably would have been the same.

Another question that was asked in the Cambridge survey:

"Some people say that if a majority of employees of a firm or factory want to have a labor union, then every employee should have to pay dues to the union since the union will be representing them. Do you agree with this idea or not?"

This has to do with the so-called right-to-work issue. Yet there is nothing in this bill that would deal with the right-to-work issue or would compel union security agreements. Including that question in this poll stacks up an opinion and an attitude that is in character with so much of the opinion and attitude about this bill that has been developed; a focus on issues that have no part, are not relevant to, are not included within, and are not going to be included in this bill.

I just raise this because I did feel that the Senator from Indiana, in raising it earlier today, had been very reasonable in his approach. I wanted to commend him for that, but I also wanted to point out that the questions in the Caddell Cambrige reports poll do not reflect the bill before us; therefore, the answers to the questions are not reliable in determining what American public opinion is on this legislation.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator is rendering a fine service by analyzing this policy and the results; therefore, I wish to associate myself with his views.

I point out that in the Joint Economic Committee, we had a series of hearings as to polls and what they mean, with testimony by the outstanding experts—Lou Harris and a whole group of other people who take polls. Their testimony is clear that the answers are heavily dictated by the questions. This is the technical side, the professional side of polling How you write the question is a decisive factor in what answers you get and what the percentages are. The Senator has gleaned that truth from this analysis which he has just made. That is their professional testimony, that is a decisive element in polling, how you ask what question you are asking.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that those of us who have been trained in the law are particularly sensitive to this. I respectfully suggest this to one of the leading Members that has a record of such distinction in the law. There is nothing like getting a lecture from the judge when you are trying to lead a witness into a question and have that gavel come down so you feel it is almost on your head.

We are particularly sensitive to this. I am sure that we all can fall into this polling error as we put questions.

We have included a poll in the record—and again, all sides develop and contract for a poll. We have the poll that the unions engaged, the AFL–CIO. It might be interesting to compare a couple of questions here. One is the poll that was contracted for by the AFL–CIO. The other is the Cambridge poll. Let me just read comparable questions. This might be somewhat redundant. First, I read from one poll. I shall not identify it at the outset:

The question was whether you favor—

A law making it easier for workers in large companies to vote on whether or not they wish to join labor unions.

From the same poll:

A law making it easier for workers in a small company to vote on whether or not they wish to join labor unions.

Both of those questions were answered predominantly yes, 73 percent and 67 percent, the first two questions.

Now, from the other poll.

One possible change in the labor law being considered would make it easier for unions to recruit new members in companies where they are not currently represented. Do you think this change is needed or not?

The answer in the affirmative on that question was 33 percent; not sure, 26 percent; no, 41 percent.

Those are two good polling agencies. They both, I am sure, have the highest competence in accurate sampling for desired results. The questions dealt with the same issue. The responses were diametrically opposite.

The first two questions I read were from the opinion poll contracted for by the American Federation of Labor–Congress of Industrial Organization, that had 73 percent yes to the first question, 67 percent yes to the second question.

The third question I read was from the poll contracted for by the retail federation, the Cambridge poll that I started my discussion of polling about earlier.

It came to the exact opposite result, again suggesting, as the Senator from New York described, and as I have, too, that we have to look at the polling techniques: The question produces and leads to certain answers.

So, when we are considering, when it is important to understand what people are thinking, in order to really know what they are thinking, we had better really know how the question that was put to the public was phrased.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield for one short comment?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. I should like to point out, however, that all of the polls agree and they are a wide variety of pollsters, the most respected pollsters in our society. They agree that employees themselves are concerned about this overreach, this bill, this type of legislation. Not only are they, but everybody in America is concerned and the vast majority of people in America do not want this kind of legislation. I think that is the important thing.

This amendment is not going to help eliminate some of those problems, regardless of the fact that some people think they do.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for allowing me to make these comments.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleagues who have commented on the amendment. The distinguished Senator from Utah properly pinpointed the problem: more than 75 percent of all employees work for employers covered by the National Labor Relations Act. We are not going to change that with the Byrd amendment. Any infringement the bill might make on their rights is not going to be affected by the proposed amendment. The amendment does not address, as I have indicated, the problems created by the "make-whole" remedy, the 150 percent backpay remedy, the debarment provisions, or any other section of the bill which has been criticized for its impact on small business.

As I have indicated, the analysis by the Senator from Kansas is supported by the small business community itself. Through their national representatives in Washington, small businessmen across the Nation have shown that this amendment does not address their underlying concerns. Those small businesses which have recently been the target of union organizing activity, would in most cases still be subject to the adverse consequences associated with passage of this legislation. Other amendments which adequately address these concerns may be brought up later in this debate. The Senator from Kansas will willingly support any amendment which makes a meaningful improvement in the status of small businesses under this legislation. However, the Byrd amendment is not such an amendment.

The second inadequacy in the proposed amendment deals with the jurisdictional standards themselves. The basic standards are tied to the monetary inflow and outflow of goods and services in the business. The annual volume of business is determined by the value of goods and services furnished to customers outside the State and to those customers within the State who themselves meet a jurisdictional standard. For example, transactions with retail establishments within the State which meet the retail standard of $500,000 gross volume are counted.

The primary two standards relate to nonretail and retail concerns. For nonretail concerns, the test is $50,000 outflow or inflow. For retail concerns, the test is a $500,000 gross volume of business. Other standards have been developed on a case-by-case basis. For example, newspapers must have a $200,000 gross volume to be subject to the NLRB's jurisdiction.

The so-called Byrd amendment would freeze the jurisdictional standards at the corresponding dollar levels. This freeze is made despite the current high rate of inflation. The Senator from Kansas was greatly disturbed when the most recent reports of inflation revealed that our economy had once again passed the double-digit inflation level. Even those businesses which are now exempted from the NLRB's jurisdiction would soon find themselves either brought under the Board because of inflation or put out of business by that same inflation. Given the current spending practices of Congress and the administration, I feel confident in predicting that many of the now exempt employers will soon find themselves compelled to deal with the complexities and penalties that this act would create. The proposed amendment does not address the problems that inflation will continue to create.

It seems to me that the concerns of small businessmen are real. They are not exaggerated. They are not addressed by the amendment. I tried to stress some of the most important provisions as they impact on small business. These small businessmen indicate that they are being pushed to the brink by the current economic conditions. Inflation, of course, has impacted heavily on them.

If this legislation is to pass, it should not leave this Chamber or should not be passed by Congress without some significant amendments in the small business area. The reason we have raised these questions on the Senate floor is so they can be properly addressed by those who support not only the amendment but the legislation.

The Byrd amendment does nothing except maintain the status quo, and not even that in every case, as I have tried to point out specifically. I suggest that perhaps later on, appropriate amendments may be adopted to address the conerns of small business. Certainly, the pending amendment does not do that.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield and do yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Thomas C. Corless of Senator MCCLURE's office be entitled to floor privileges during the debate and vote on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE MOTION (NO. 1)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair, without objection, directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on H.R. 8410, an act to amend the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen the remedies and expedite the procedures under such act.

1. Robert C. Byrd; 2. Howard M. Metzenbaum; 3. John Melcher; 4. Harrison A. Williams, Jr.; 5. Abraham Ribicoff; 6. Spark Matsunaga; 7. Daniel Patrick Moynihan; 8. Henry M. Jackson; 9. Edward M. Kennedy; 10. Paul S. Sarbanes.

11. George McGovern; 12. Jacob K. Javits; 13. Jennings Randolph; 14. William Proxmire; 15. John A. Durkin; 16. Gaylord Nelson; 17. John H. Chafee; 18. Richard S. Schweiker; 19. Birch Bayh.

CLOTURE MOTION (NO. 2)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, in accordance with the order that was entered this morning, I send a second cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair, without objection, directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTIONS

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on H.R. 8410, An act to amend the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen the remedies and expedite the procedures under such act.

1. Robert C. Byrd; 2. John Melcher; 3. Harrison A. Williams, Jr.; 4. Abraham Ribicoff; 5. Spark Matsunaga; 6. Daniel Patrick Moynihan; 7. Henry M. Jackson; 8. Edward M. Kennedy; 9. Paul S. Sarbanes; 10. Howard M. Metzenbaum.

11. Jacob K. Javits; 12 Jennings Randolph; 13. William Proxmire; 14. George McGovern; 15. John A. Durkin; 16. Gaylord Nelson; 17. John H. Chafee; 18. Richard S. Schweiker; 19. Birch Bayh.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, under the order that was entered earlier today, the 1 hour under rule XXII will begin running on this first cloture motion on Wednesday of this week at the hour of 4 p.m. This would mean that the rollcall vote on the cloture motion would occur at around 5:15 p.m., give or take a little, depending upon how long it takes to assemble a quorum or to establish the presence of a quorum. The clerk will begin to call the roll for that quorum at 5 p.m. on Wednesday.

Under the order entered today earlier, the vote on the second cloture motion will occur on Thursday at a time that has not yet been determined, but which will be stated on Wednesday this week.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on the matter of trying to establish a time to vote on Thursday, I wonder if I could have the attention of the distinguished majority leader for a moment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. It seems that the effort to accommodate Senators' schedules on Thursday has focused mostly on this side and I have a suggestion I would like to make to the majority leader to see if it has merit in his view.

In order to accommodate most Senators, I would suggest that we consider first asking unanimous consent to waive the quorum under rule XXII, to have the hour under the rule commence running at 1:15 in the afternoon on Thursday, and the vote, not the quorum call, but the vote begin then at 2:15 in the afternoon on Thursday, and that the rollcall in that instance extend for 30 minutes, to end then at 2:45 instead of the ordinary time allowed under rules for a rollcall vote in the Senate.

If the majority leader cares to put such a request, I believe it would not find objection on this side of the aisle.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. I was asked about this and it sounded reasonable to me.

I make a commencement speech, so it was originally intended that we have until 3 o'clock to vote. I agreed, so I am bound.

So I suggest, because of the exigencies of airplanes, perhaps we would be willing to let the vote run until 3.

Mr. BAKER. That is fine.

Mr. JAVITS. Just to take care of things.

Is that all right with both leaders?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that suits me, if it is agreeable to the majority leader, and there are no other objections to it.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield for a question, it is appropriate to waive the quorum under rule XXII?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I asked the Parliamentarian earlier.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Unanimous consent.

Mr. BAKER. I was advised by the Parliamentarian that it has been done on a number of occasions.

The only reason for it is because of the uncertainty of obtaining the quorum and, since we have plane schedules on both sides, that uncertainty would sort of complicate the equation.

So on the assurances of the Parliamentarian that it has been done and that there is ample precedent for it, I then made that suggestion to the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President I personally like the suggestion. I would like to withhold making the request for a few minutes until I have been able to do a little checking on this side of the aisle. I think it is a good suggestion, personally.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

(During Mr. GOLDWATER's address the following occurred:)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield sufficient time to the junior Senator from New York to make some remarks, and I ask unanimous consent also that I do not lose the floor, but will return to my text at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it is characteristic of the grace and the friendship of the revered Senator from Arizona that he would allow me to interrupt his discourse at this point. I wish to thank the Senator from Arizona.

TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF DEATH OF ROBERT F. KENNEDY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise for the difficult purpose of speaking in anticipation of the 10th anniversary of the death of our mutual friend, the friend of all of ours, Robert F. Kennedy.

Tomorrow the Senate will not be in session owing to the purpose of attending the funeral of Senator JAMES B. ALLEN, whose untimely death was a blow to us just this last week. That being the case. there would not be occasion to insert in the RECORD a few remarks I would like to make.

Mr. President, it is a complex fate that finds me on the 10th anniversary of his death rising to commemorate the life of Robert F. Kennedy who was the 52d Senator from the State of New York. It is complex for it was surely improbable that he would ever be a Senator from New York. He was altogether a man of Massachusetts. It is even more complex in that nothing was ever less probable while he lived that I should, after an interval, succeed him.

I would not wish to be too Irish about it, but we were, in truth, of different social orders—at least as the ancient Greeks, would judge the matter. He was truly of a race of heroes, born to die in battle and to be remembered in history. I was of a middling condition, a follower.

I knew him first in the 1950's when he was counsel to the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, at a time it was examining labor union activity. I was never so certain of this enthusiasm as he was and, indeed, for most of the 15-odd years that I followed him into one fray after another, I was rarely wholly confident of the ground on which he had chosen to fight, but never doubting him.

I never said goodby. I was in San Francisco on Thursday, the 30th of May, and I had to leave the campaign in order to give a series of commencement addresses which I had agreed to make long before he had announced his candidacy for the Presidency.

His had not been the easiest case to make, especially in California; yet I thought he would do well, and was almost certain he would end as President. Midmorning of the 30th I went by his suite at the Fairmont Hotel, but he was sleeping late. He would do that. With greater energy than most, he was even more prodigal with that energy.

And so I said goodby to Fred Dutton instead. On the following Wednesday morning, in New York City, I found that a story about my commencement address the previous evening at the New School for Social Research had made the front page of the New York Times. It was, in effect, a prediction that certain kinds of social policy to which we were giving ourselves over with much enthusiasm in the 1960's would give us more than an equivalent amount of grief in the 1970's.

I was wondering what he would think about it, for I knew he was just beginning to have doubts of his own. I was in the dining room of the Harvard Club in New York, and as I was asking myself this, a member came over to tell me the news that was not on the front page of the Times, the news that Robert F. Kennedy had been shot.

He died later that day—a day which few of us will ever forget. His dear friend Frank Mankiewicz said, in next to his final announcement, that his condition was uncertain as to life.

So a great heart passed from this body, and, as his younger brother, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, EDWARD M. KENNEDY, said from the altar of Saint Patrick's Cathedral, in that unforgettable funeral preceded by an unprecedented 4-day vigil, he had picked up a fallen standard.

Many lovely things have been written about Robert Kennedy since, and have been written on the occasion of this 10th anniversary, by his friends such as David Broder of the Washington Post, Robert Healy of the Boston Globe, and today Anthony Lewis of the New York Times and Jim Dickenson of the Washington Star. They speak always of his capacity for growth.

I would like to suggest that Robert Kennedy belongs to no single political tradition or tendency in the United States, save that of openness and pragmatism. Sometimes, there was an element in his views which was almost penitential, which it need not have been, for nothing is more appropriate than for a person to change his views in the light of new information or new thought or new experience. He bought passion and conviction to almost everything he did, so that the fact was of change and, indeed, of growth. His is a large example to have given the American Republic, which he loved so and for which in the true sense he died.

When President John Kennedy died, I was then a young Assistant Secretary of Labor. I said then:

> I don't think there's any point in being Irish if you don't know that the world is going to break your heart eventually.

Robert Kennedy's death made this thought overwhelming.

Yet on this 10th anniversary of Robert Kennedy's death I would suggest that this is not the only thing to know of such occasions, because following that, there is yet a larger judgment of the world which he himself, Robert Kennedy, offered on the occasion of the death of Martin Luther King, only 2 months before his own.

Standing on the back of a truck in Indianapolis, he spoke to a group of Americans and said to them:

> My favorite poet was Aeschylus. He wrote: "Even in our sleep, pain which cannot forget falls drop by drop upon the heart until in our own despair, against our will, comes wisdom through the awful grace of God."

So, Mr. President, I would take this opportunity both to celebrate his life and to mourn his passing, and I know I speak for the whole of the U.S. Senate in addressing to his widow, Ethel, and his children, the thought that we will share only a part of that they and only they can fully experience on this day.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I do not have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LUGAR. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Arizona for giving me likewise this opportunity to make comment after the eloquent remarks of the Senator from New York.

The Senator from New York has made mention of the speech given by Senator Robert Kennedy in Indianapolis on the night that Dr. Martin Luther King was assassinated.

Of course, all of us from Indianapolis remember that occasion and that speech very well, because the trauma of that evening was considerable throughout the United States of America, and it was my responsibility at that time, serving as mayor of the city of Indianapolis, to try to think through really what we were to do.

Late in the afternoon we had word that Senator Kennedy would be appearing in Indianpolis that evening, and that he proposed to appear at a park at 17th and Broadway, which at that time in the history of our city was perhaps the most volatile central city area.

It was a time of enormous unrest, quite apart from the affairs that were to occur immediately after Dr. King's assassination. We had gone through tremendous security precautions, simply to make certain that Senator Kennedy would be safe during his appearance.

His plane was in the air and I was attending a banquet being held for Shortridge High School athletes who had been runners up in the State high school championship basketball tournament. That high school at the time was 90 percent black—10 percent white in the constitution of its student body. The audience attending that banquet was predominantly black and highly emotional. The word came of the intent of Senator Kennedy to speak even under those circumstances.

We prepared in every way we could without knowing what could happen to him and, really, to our city at that point.

I must say one of the most dramatic things that happened, historically, in the history of our city was the fact that there were people at 17th and Broadway who were remorseful and shocked but absolutely quiet as he gave the speech, excerpts of which the Senator has just quoted, and which have been subsequently quoted all over the country and engraved on many occasions.

I was so deeply moved by that experience personally that at the time of Senator Kennedy's death, I conducted a memorial service in his honor on the steps of the City-County Building in Indianapolis and reunited, essentially, almost the same people who had been a part of the 17th and Broadway rally, which, although it was intended to be a partisan rally given Dr. King's assassination, had become something much more.

I am grateful for this opportunity, and for the remarks the Senator has made this afternoon, to simply reiterate once again in memory of both Dr. King and Senator Kennedy the circumstances of the city of Indianapolis in what I think is an appropriate and beautiful tribute.

I yield the floor to my colleague from Arizona.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I would like to thank the Senator from Indiana for his thoughtful and vivid recollection of that event. This goes beyond any personal references. I only want to say that to observe how a man at a moment in his life rises to a circumstance is such that we all rise with him. The people of Indianapolis on that day rose in that fashion, as perhaps all of us did.

I thank my friend from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would like to join my friend from New York in his comments on Bob Kennedy. I am probably one of the few Members of this body who has had the pleasure of serving with all three of the Kennedy brothers when they were Senators. It has been a very, very unusual experience to find three men from the same family, yet three so different.

Jack was different from Bob and Bob was different from TED. While I never had the pleasure of knowing Joe, I always felt that had he not given his life in World War II, he would have been the fourth Member of this body. It was a tragic thing that happened that night in Los Angeles.

I do not like to add this to our thinking, but I read in the morning paper that the man who killed Bob Kennedy is looking forward to his parole in 1985. That is a sad commentary on how justice has evolved in this country.

I worked with Senator Kennedy on the Rackets Committee, the McClellan committee, and I found him to be a typical, hard-hitting Irishman. He epitomizes more than his brothers what most people look for in the Irish, a man unafraid and willing to take on all comers in any numbers.

I think one of the great things that the men of the family have given to all of us is the observation of great and devoted love for a mother who has produced a remarkable family.

I thank my friend for presenting his remarks and I want to associate with him.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 11 a.m. on Wednesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 30 minutes, with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each, and I ask that there be no automatic call of the calendar, during that period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT ON OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH ACTIVITIES IN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS—PM–179

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was received on June 2, 1978, during the recess of the Senate, under authority of the order of May 26, 1978, which was referred to the Committee on Human Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress the annual report required by Section 19b of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, entitled "Occupational Safety and Health Activities in the Federal Government." The report summarizes the Government's programs for the protection of the safety and health of its employees during 1976, activities prior to the beginning of my Administration, and was prepared by the Department of Labor.

The report indicates that not all agencies of the Federal Government have in the past fully followed guidelines set forth by the Department of Labor for workplace safety and health programs. This Administration is studying ways to improve the workplace safety and health efforts of all Federal agencies, including those programs that affect Federal employees. I intend that reports covering the years of this Administration will reflect significant progress in that regard.

RECOMMENDATION FOR EXTENSION OF TRADE ACT WAIVER AUTHORITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE RECESS—PM–180

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was received on June 2, 1978, during the recess of the Senate, under authority of the order of May 26, 1978, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with subsection 402 (d)(5) of the Trade Act of 1974, I transmit herewith my recommendation for a further 12-month extension of the authority to waive subsections (a) and (b) of section 402.

In accordance with subsections 402 (d)(5) (B) and (C), this recommendation gives my reasons for recommending the extension of waiver authority and for my determination that continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

I include as part of my recommendation, my determination that further extension of the waiver authority, and continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic, will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

For the information of the Congress, I also include my finding and determination that the requirements for renewal of the United States-Romanian Agreement on Trade Relations under section 405(b) of the Trade Act have been satisfied.

EC-3744. A communication from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting, pursuant to law, three reports on Privacy Act systems of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3745. A communication from the Assistant Secretary for Conservation, Research, and Education, Department of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report for a new Privacy Act system of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3746. A communication from the Mayor, the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, a document entitled "A Plan for the Development of Improved Services for Alcoholics in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3747. A secret communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the effectiveness of the Joint Flight Test Program; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3748. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Status, Progress, and Problems in Federal Agency Accounting During Fiscal Year 1977," May 26, 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3749. A communication from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, an act adopted by the Council on May 2, 1978, which would order the closing of a part of Brookland Avenue, N.E., adjacent to Parcel 123 at the intersection of Brookland Avenue and Allison Street, N.E. (Act 2-195); to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3750. A communication from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, an act adopted by the Council on May 2, 1978, which would order the closing of a part of Aberfoyle Place, N.W., at 31st Street, N.W., between Squares 2344 and 2358 (Act 2-196); to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3751. A communication from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting, pursuant to law, an act adopted by the Council on May 2, 1978, which would order the closing of a part of a public alley in Square 218, bounded by Eye and K Streets, and 14th and 15th Streets, N.W. (Act 2-197); to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3752. A communication from the District of Columbia Auditor, transmitting, pursuant to law, reports on (1) analysis of 1978 real property sales ratio study; (2) analysis of D.C. Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1978; (3) "The City Can Obtain Discounts from the Postal Service on Large First Class Mailings"; and (4) "The Urban Corps Program Does Not Meet a Need for District Colleges"; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC-3753. A communication from the Assistant Secretary for Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "The Condition of Education, 1978 Edition"; to the Committee on Human Resources.

EC-3754. A communication from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, reports covering the period of May 1 through May 16, 1978, concerning visa petitions which the Service has approved according the beneficiaries of such petitions third- and sixth-preference classification under the Immigration and Nationality Act, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-3755. A communication from the Administrator, U.S. Small Business Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Small Business Act by transferring thereto those provisions of the "Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973" affecting the operation of volunteer programs to assist small business, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Small Business.

EC-3756. A communication from the Administrator, U.S. Small Business Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Small Business Act to increase the maximum allowable compensation and travel expenses for experts and consultants; to the Select Committee on Small Business.

PETITIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following petitions and memorials, which were referred as indicated:

POM-674. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 5

"Whereas, A new home buyer is paying substantial amounts in taxes and special fees to local California communities, which are charged to the buyer indirectly through the builder or developer of the home; and

"Whereas, These taxes and fees are not deductible under the current rules and regulations promulgated by the Internal Revenue Service; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States and the Internal Revenue Service to adopt legislation or regulations to allow deductions by a new home buyer for taxes and fees directly traceable to that particular new home; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice-President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the District Director of the Internal Revenue Service, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-675. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 6

"Whereas, The Federal Clean Air Act (42 U.S.C., Sec. 1857, et seq.) requires each state to prepare, adopt and submit to the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency a plan which provides for the implementation, maintenance, and enforcement of each national ambient air quality standard; and

"Whereas, The Environmental Protection Agency disapproved portions of the State Implementation Plan which California prepared and submitted in 1972, including the portion relating to the preconstruction review of new or modified stationary sources; and

"Whereas, The State Air Resources Board failed to revise California's State Implementation Plan within the prescribed period to include an acceptable new source review procedure, and in 1973, the Environmental Protection Agency promulgated a substitute new source review regulation which it is now administering and enforcing in most parts of the state; and

"Whereas, Under this regulation no approval to construct or modify a stationary source can be granted unless the applicant shows to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency that the source will not prevent or interfere with the attainment or maintenance of any national ambient air quality standard; and

"Whereas, One or more of the existing national ambient air quality standards are now being exceeded in many California air basins and the enforcement of this regulation may affect the future plans of enterprises to locate or expand in California or elsewhere in the United States and may have substantial social and economic impacts; and

"Whereas, The standards themselves, and the validity of the evidence upon which they are based, have been the subjects of several recent investigations; and

"Whereas, The Clean Air Act requires the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency from time to time to review, and modify as appropriate, the air quality criteria for each pollutant for which a national ambient air quality standard has been established; and

"Whereas, Testimony presented to the Senate Committee on Natural Resources and Wildlife suggests that the new source review procedures approved by the Environmental Protection Agency for other parts of the United States are not as restrictive, or not as rigidly enforced, as those which the Environmental Protection Agency has promulgated for California; and

"Whereas, Prospective enterprises and employees in California will suffer a competitive disadvantage unless the Environmental Protection Agency establishes and enforces the same uniform minimum standards for new source review in all states; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to review the present circumstances and control technologies to ascertain that the programs and timetables for compliance that are contained in the Clean Air Act, and the administrative regulations based on the act, are compatible with these circumstances and technologies and are not unrealistic and without public support; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress request the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to review the national primary ambient air quality standards to determine if they are consistent with the latest scientific evidence concerning the effects of air pollution on human health and they are appropriate for the purpose for which they were established; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress request the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to review the administration and enforcement of new source review programs throughout the United States to insure that all states are required to meet the same minimum standards; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-676. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Human Resources:

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 17

"Whereas, For 60 years prior to enactment of the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act by Congress, California had a strong industrial safety program, considered by most safety experts to be one of the most effective in the nation; and

"Whereas, Passage of the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act preempted California's proven safety program and mandated California's adherence to certain inflexible rules and regulations established by the federal act and by the Federal Department of Labor; and

"Whereas, Compliance with the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act eliminated California's cooperative safety program in which California labor, business, and state activities jointly established and maintained California's exemplary industrial safety records, and, instead, established an adversary procedure whereby California's safety inspectors have now become police officers enforcing the law; and

"Whereas, Making reasonable changes in the California Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1973 is extremely difficult because of the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act mandate which threatens a federal takeover of California's safety programs for any deviation from the federal program; and

"Whereas, The operation of the California Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1973 within such federal mandates has resulted in expenditures almost four times as large as under California's previous safety program; and

"Whereas, Compliance with mandated provisions of the federal act have buried California's safety inspectors under an avalanche of paperwork requiring three times more man-hours for report writing and the completion of various forms and written documents than under California's previous safety program; and

"Whereas, The California Department of Finance's January 1976 "Review of the Implementation of the California Occupational Safety and Health Act" identifies several research studies which provide evidence indicating that a majority of all industrial accidents are not inspection preventable and that an estimated 60–75% of all industrial accidents are thus uneffected by Cal-OSHA's compliance program; and

"Whereas, The number of California occupational safety and health standards is constantly increasing, until there are at present, an estimated 7,000 standards which are supposed to be enforced and with which the employer community is required to be familiar; and

"Whereas, Cal-OSHA has been in effect since 1973, and according to the aforementioned Department of Finance review, any reduction in the overall rate of occupational injuries and illnesses cannot be demonstrated and the potential for reducing injury rates is very limited; and

"Whereas, According to the aforementioned Department of Finance review, a meaningful relationship between violations of Cal-OSHA standards and the occurrence of injuries has not been found; and

"Whereas, The complexities of the California Occupational Safety and Health Act and its multitude of standards make it difficult for many compliance safety engineers to recognize violations outside their specialized field of expertise; and

"Whereas, California's Occupational Safety and Health Standards Board's General Industry Safety Orders many times conflict with orders generated by the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act for specialized industries, producing inconsistencies, contradictions, and confusion; and

"Whereas, An example which demonstrates the cumbersome absurdity of both the federal and the California acts' standards is the General Industry Safety Orders' 49 pages of requirements for ladders which apply generally to their manufacture, and which in many cases are not related to user safety, and, therefore, have little practical relevance to a safety inspection program; and

"Whereas, It is unlikely that more than three or four of the 49 pages in the General Industry Safety Orders on ladders are enforceable by California's Division of Industrial Safety; and

"Whereas, According to the most recent statistics available from the Division of Industrial Safety inspectors spend less than 20 percent of their time actually conducting onsite inspections; and

"Whereas, The California Legislature's chief fiscal officer, the Legislative Analyst, has reported that California Occupational Safety and Health Act compliance officers perform an average of only two inspections per week, at which rate each work place in California can expect an inspection on the average of once every 23 years; and

"Whereas, This rate of inspections under the California Occupational Safety and Health Act produces less than one-fifth of the inspections conducted under California's previous safety programs; and

"Whereas, The California Occupational Safety and Health Act produces thousands of citations, less than 2 percent of which are for serious violations; and

"Whereas, Compliance with the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act has resulted in a system whereby the California Occupational Safety and Health Act directs almost all of its efforts at eliminating minor nonserious hazards rather than the elimination of serious injury-producing hazards to California's workers; and

"Whereas, Cal-OSHA inspectors in enforcing Cal-OSHA standards, issue more than 98 percent of their citations for nonserious violations which bear little or no relationship to conditions which actually cause injuries; and

"Whereas, California's Legislative Analyst has reported that only 6 percent of the investigations conducted in 1975 pertaining to referrals to the State Department of Health resulted in the issuance of citations for serious violations; and

"Whereas, California's Legislative Analyst has reported that up to 40 percent of all employee complaints result in inspections which are frivolous, thus diverting the resources of the Division of Industrial Safety into nonproductive areas; and

"Whereas, California would be better served to maintain its own safety program with its own rules and regulations, with an ability to respond adequately to needed changes without the constant spectre of a federal takeover for not being in conformity with federal mandates; and

"Whereas, As a result of adverse federal and state court decisions in at least five other states, there has risen serious doubt about the constitutionality of the federally-mandated inspection program contained in the California Occupational Safety and Health Act; and

"Whereas, The California Division of Industrial Safety and the California Legislature, in cooperation with the industrial community and California's labor organizations, in a unified effort, are better able to produce a greater measure of safety for California workers than when forced to become adversaries in an inflexible system, as required by compliance with the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act; and

"Whereas, The Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act, and the California Occupational Safety and Health Act's compliance with its rigid mandates, has not improved California's safety record, but to the contrary has reduced the likelihood that inspections will take place, has increased costs, has forced inspectors to do paperwork rather than make inspections, and confused industry with a multitude of conflicting and contradictory standards; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act or insert supplementary language into the appropriate budget act allowing the California Occupational Safety and Health program the administrative flexibility necessary to efficiently resolve numerous problems of implementation such as those described in this joint resolution and to more effectively deal with the root causes of occupational injuries and illnesses to produce a genuine reduction in employee accident, injury, illness and death rates; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM–677. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"RESOLUTION CHAPTER —

"Whereas, Recent incidents of dam failures resulting in lost of life, injuries, and property damage point up a national need for improved dam safety programs at the federal and state levels of government; and

"Whereas, Previously authorized programs have not been adequate in scope or sufficiently funded to be nationally effective; and

"Whereas, Several agencies of the federal government directly design, build, and operate dams, or, through their licensing, permitting, or other regulatory procedures, cause the design, construction, and operation of dams in the United States; and

"Whereas, More effective efforts are needed on the national and state levels to assure improved public safety from the hazards presented by dams; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby expresses its concern about the safety of dams, and respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to include the following major principles in their deliberations on any federal legislation regarding dam safety:

"(a) That such legislation stress the critical role of independent dam safety reviews for publicly owned and privately owned dams, since the major problems of dam safety are probably going to be from the far more numerous private dams, which are often unregulated and uninspected;

"(b) That any legislation include (1) a requirement for annual safety evaluations and reports, and (2) five-year major inspections and reports after construction and during the continuing operations phases of the dam's life, so it continues to function without a loss of safety;

"(c) That such legislation provide for the establishment of appropriate organizations at the federal and state levels to provide dam safety inspection services, and allow individual states which so desire to contract with the appropriate federal agency established for this purpose;

"(d) That such legislation provide for the use of people on review panels or boards who are knowledgeable and experienced in the seismic design of dams, where dam safety programs are implemented in seismically active areas of the United States;

"(e) That such legislation should require that whenever federal agencies build or license dams in states where the design standards, construction practices, and inspection procedures are more stringent than their own or require the recognition of particular hazards, the state standards and processes shall govern; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Presidential Science Advisor, the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, the Secretary of the Army, the Chief of Engineers, the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM–678. A memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Florida; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs:

"HOUSE MEMORIAL NO. 242

"Whereas, the people of Florida sincerely appreciate the sacrifices of Florida veterans in times of war and peace, and

"Whereas, veterans are entitled to a final resting place provided by the country they so selflessly defended, and

"Whereas, it is proper for the state to participate in the selection of a location for a veterans' cemetery, now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"That the United States Congress and the Veterans Administration are requested to establish a cemetery for military veterans to be located in central Florida, and to further provide funding sufficient for annual maintenance of the cemetery.

"Be it further resolved that a copy of this memorial shall be spread upon the journals of the House of Representatives and Senate of the State of Florida and copies shall be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Florida delegation to the United States Congress."

POM–679. A memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Florida; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

"HOUSE MEMORIAL NO. 423

"Whereas, there is a compelling need for a veterans' medical facility in Brevard County, Florida, by virtue of an existing veterans' population in excess of 40,000 persons, including disabled veterans, military retirees, other veterans, and dependents of veterans, and

"Whereas, nearly $1,000,000 is spent annually by the United States Government on medical costs for veterans in Brevard County, Florida, and

"Whereas, a satellite facility could provide medical treatment at one-third the cost of private medical facilities, affording a great savings to the taxpayers, now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"That the Congress of the United States is requested to direct the Administrator of the United States Veterans Administration to conduct a demographic study of Brevard County, Florida, to confirm the need for a United States Veterans Administration satellite facility in Brevard County, Florida, and to report back to the Congress of the United States no later than 6 months after receiving directions from the United States Congress to perform such study.

"Be it further resolved that copies of this memorial be dispatched to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Florida delegation to the United States Congress."

POM–680. A memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Florida; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

"HOUSE MEMORIAL NO. 622

"Whereas, the Legislature, the Governor, and the Cabinet recognize and appreciate the vital and honored services rendered to our state and nation by the many veterans of Florida who have ensured our national defense and preserved our democratic institutions and way of life, and

"Whereas, the Legislature, the Governor, and the Cabinet fully support proper and convenient medical care for veterans in this state and throughout the nation in recognition of their contributions and sacrifices for the defense of our people, and

"Whereas, numerous veterans and veteran organizations such as the Broward County Veterans Council, repersenting mobile chapters of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, Jewish War Veterans, the Retired Officers Association, Fleet Reserve, Paralyzed Veterans Association, World War I Barracks, and other veteran and auxiliary organizations, have expressed need for a Veterans Administration out-patient medical facility to be located in Broward County, and

"Whereas, although there is a veterans hospital in Miami, travel by an out-patient from Broward County often represents great hardship because of the distance involved and extended delay at the Miami Veterans Administration hospital which cannot accommodate the influx of ever-increasing Dade and Broward veterans requiring medical attention, and

"Whereas, although Palm Beach County has an out-patient veterans' facility in Riviera Beach, the population of Broward County is almost double that of adjoining Palm Beach County, and the facility at Riviera Beach is too distant for out-patient care for most Broward veterans, and

"Whereas, Broward County has the second largest population of any county in the State of Florida and the number of veterans in Broward County exceeds 100,000 and is growing rapidly, now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"That the Congress of the United States is requested to recognize a present need for a veterans' out-patient medical facility in Broward County and is requested to direct the Veterans' Administration to establish such an out-patient medical facility in a readily accessible location in Broward County, giving consideration to population density and geographical factors and to make such site selection in cooperation with the Division of Veteran Affairs of the Department of Community Affairs of the state.

"Be it further resolved that copies of this memorial be dispatched to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Florida delegation to the United States Congress."

POM-681. A memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Florida; to the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE MEMORIAL NO. 341

"Whereas, the Republic of Cuba under the dictatorship of Fidel Castro has conducted ongoing programs of subversion and revolution against democratic republics in South and Central America with the sole objective of replacing democratic institutions with communistic-styled dictatorships, and

"Whereas, the Republic of Cuba under the dictatorship of Fidel Castro has continually attempted to foster a spirit of anti-Americanism throughout South and Central America, and

"Whereas, the Republic of Cuba under the dictatorship of Fidel Castro has confiscated American property without any compensation in contravention of all standards of justice and in direct violation of the basic American principles of just compensation, and

"Whereas, the Republic of Cuba under the dictatorship of Fidel Castro has oppressed its freedom-loving citizens to the extent that multitudes have been put to death, imprisoned, or forced into exile and have had their personal property confiscated for the benefit of the Castro government, and

"Whereas, any direct or indirect resumption of trade relations between the Republic of Cuba and the United States of America is tantamount to approval of the Cuban Government and its oppressive communistic policies, Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby urged to support a policy that no further direct or indirect trade agreements with the Republic of Cuba be instituted until American lives and property have been accounted for, just compensation for the loss of such property has been given, and a proper accounting has been given for the lives of Cuban citizens who have disappeared.

"Be it further resolved that copies of this memorial be dispatched to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Florida delegation to the United States Congress."

POM-682. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION

"Whereas, Increased diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago was authorized by Section 166 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1976 (P.L. 94-587), for the stated objectives of reducing shoreline damages due to high waters in the Great Lakes and to enhance the water quality of the Illinois Waterway; and

"Whereas, The diversion program may permit the Corps of Engineers to divert up to 10,000 cubic feet per second (cfs) of Great Lakes Water through the Chicago drainage canal and into the Mississippi Watershed, an increase from 3,200 cfs which was established as the maximum amount to be diverted by a 1967 decree of the United States Supreme Court after decades of litigation, (Wisconsin, et al. v. Illinois, 388 U.S. 426 (1967)); and

"Whereas, The said section 166 referred to above does not take into consideration the loss of hydroelectric power generation in New York, the higher energy costs for New York consumers caused by increased diversion, and the fact that the diversion program undermines national efforts to reduce dependence on imported oil for power generation; and

"Whereas, The Power Authority of the State of New York owns and operates major hydroelectric facilities on the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers which will be adversely affected by any such increased diversion since each decrease of 1000 cfs at those two facilities will decrease generation by some 254 million kilowatt hours annually, the replacement of which by oil-fired generation would require the consumption of 420,000 barrels of oil at an increased cost of 5.6 million dollars to the consumers of Authority energy each year at current oil prices, with the potential for such increased costs to reach $38 million annually if diversion at the full authorized rate is accomplished; and

"Whereas, The Canadian Government has filed a strongly-worded protest against increased diversion affirming the position that the Power Authority's hydroelectric plants, which share the use of international waters with Canadian plants, would be expected to absorb the full impact of any increased diversion at Chicago since the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty between the United States and Canada requires that neither country unilaterally undertake actions which affect boundary waters, and any diversions from Lake Michigan affect the levels of all the Great Lakes except for Lake Superior; and

"Whereas, Should the Canadian position prevail, the potential annual losses in energy to be absorbed by United States entities, including generating losses on the wholly-Canadian section of the St. Lawrence River, could be over 2 billion kilowatt hours, which if replaced by oil-fired generation would require the utilization of 3,300,000 barrels of oil costing nearly $45,000,000 annually; and

"Whereas, It is a highly inappropriate solution to Chicago's water quality problems to incur potential costs of this magnitude to dilute inadequately treated sewer discharges in the Illinois Waterway; and

"Whereas, The proposed increased diversion will have a very minimal impact on lake levels and shoreline erosion, since increased diversion in the full authorized amount would result in an end of the month level less than ¼ inch lower than it would have been if the diversion rate had remained at 3,200 cfs; and, since the effects of water diversions continue to be felt downstream years after the diversion stops, such effects would persist into national low cycles and exacerbate the problems associated with low lake levels; and

"Whereas, Despite the efforts of many New York Congressmen, the Congress approved a $500,000 appropriation for the Corps' diversion program for fiscal year 1978 and is considering a similar appropriation for fiscal year 1979; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this Legislative Body respectfully memorializes the President and Congress of the United States (a) to refrain from funding any further action to implement the plan to increase the diversion of water from Lake Michigan authorized by Section 166 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1976 (P.L. 94-587) and (b) to repeal said Section; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President Pro Tem of the United States Senate, and to each member of the Congress of the United States from the State of New York."

POM-683. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, General Kazimierz Pulaski was a gallant hero of America's war for independence who continually risked his life in the Battle of Savannah, Georgia; and

"Whereas, The year 1979 marks the 200th anniversary of that famous Polish cavalry officer's sacrifice on the plains of Georgia; and

"Whereas, General Pulaski, as well as many other ethnic heroes, contributed to the establishment of a republic that assured a home for free and hard-working people; and

"Whereas, Contemporary Americans have an obligation to honor General Pulaski in every possible manner; and

"Whereas, The issuance of a commemorative stamp, honoring General Pulaski at the 200th anniversary of the Battle of Savannah in 1979, would indeed be a singularly fitting tribute for Pulaski; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of Pennsylvania memorialize the President of the United States, Congress and the United States Postal Service to issue a stamp commemorating the heroic efforts of General Pulaski during the Battle of Savannah in 1779; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, and to the presiding officer of each House of Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from Pennsylvania in the Congress of the United States and to the Postmaster General of the United States."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES SUBMITTED DURING THE RECESS

Under authority of the Senate of May 26, 1978, the following reports of committees were received on May 31, 1978:

By Mr. HUDDLESTON, from the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, with an amendment and an amendment to the title:

S. 1835. A bill directing the Secretary of Agriculture to compile and publish certain information relating to the adequacy of a transportation system to meet the needs of agriculture and rural development in the United States, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 95-923).

By Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, with an amendment:

S. 3082. A bill to amend the North Pacific Fisheries Act of 1954 (Rept. No. 95-924).

By Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, without amendment:

S. Res. 471. An original resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3082. Referred to the Committee on the Budget.

BILL PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

On May 24, 1978, H.R. 11779, the Renewable Resources Extension Act of 1978, was received from the House of Representatives and through inadvertence was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, when it should have been placed on the Calendar, since a companion measure, S. 3035, Order No. 811, had on May 15, 1978, been reported from that committee. Therefore, the committee has been discharged from further consideration of H.R. 11779 and the bill has been placed on the Calendar.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. SPARKMAN (by request):

S. 3161. A bill to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 3162. A bill to secure and protect the freedom of individuals from unwarranted intrusions by persons acting under color of law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JACKSON (for himself and Mr. HANSEN) (by request):

S. 3163. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish an urban park and recreation recovery program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. BAYH (for himself, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. PERCY):

S. 3164. A bill entitled the Citizen's Privacy Protection Amendment of 1978; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SPARKMAN (by request):

S. 3161. A bill to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF THE CHILD ACT

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, and for other purposes.

The bill has been requested by the President of the United States and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with the letter from the President of the Senate, dated May 24, 1978 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3161

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "International Year of the Child Act."

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE OF THE INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF THE CHILD

SEC. 2. The United Nations General Assembly, by a resolution approved at its thirty-first session, has designated the year 1979 as the International Year of the Child. This action was designed to focus national and international attention on various aspects of the needs of children and to encourage all nations, individually and in cooperation, to take appropriate and relevant actions to meet them. The General Assembly called upon member states and international organizations to participate fully in the International Year of the Child and to devote the year 1979 to efforts at the international, national and community levels to provide lasting improvements in the well-being of children.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL COMMISSION

SEC. 3(a) The President shall establish a National Commission on the International Year of the Child (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Commission"), and to appoint to the Commission not more than 25 members chosen from among citizens in private life.

(b) The President shall designate a Chairperson and two Vice Chairpersons from among the members.

(c) The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives may each designate two members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, to serve on the Commission, in addition to the members to be appointed by the President.

FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4(a) The Commission shall promote: (i) effective and significant observance in the United States of 1979 as the International Year of the Child (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Year"), with particular reference to the goals stated in Section 2; (ii) cooperation by the United States with UNICEF and other international organizations and with other nations to achieve the objectives of the Year. To these ends, the Commission shall seek to stimulate within the United States a better understanding of, and actions to meet, the needs of children both in this and in other countries. Such needs would include, but not be limited to the social, health, educational, and developmental needs of children, as well as concern for the general condition and rights of children.

(b) The Commission shall keep informed of activities undertaken or planned by various organizations and groups in the United States and abroad in observance of the Year and shall consult with such groups and stimulate such activities and programs through community, civic, local, State, regional, national, Federal, international private and professional organizations.

(c) The Commission may conduct studies, inquiries, and hearings and hold meetings as it deems necessary. It may assemble and disseminate information, and issue reports and other publications. It may also coordinate, sponsor, perform, or oversee projects, studies, events, and other activities that it deems necessary or desirable for the observance of the Year.

(d) The Commission shall make recommendations to the President on national policies in furtherance of the goals of the Year; and shall make a final report to the President on its work and recommendations, not later than March 31, 1980.

COORDINATION AND ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 5(a) The Commission is authorized to establish such subcommittees, the membership of which may include persons not members of the Commission, as it deems necessary to carry out the purpose of this Act.

(b) Each agency of the executive branch of the Government is authorized: (1) to furnish to the Commission, upon request of the Chairperson of the Commission, such information, advice, and services, as may be useful to the Commission for the fulfillment of its functions under this Act, and (2) to detail personnel to the Commission.

(c) Each member of the Commission or any of its subcommittees, who is not a member of Congress may, while serving on business of the Commission, be compensated at a rate not to exceed the daily equivalent of GS–15 for each day they are engaged in the actual performance of duties.

(d) The Commission may appoint such staff personnel as it considers necessary to carry out its duties under this Act without regard to the provisions of Title 5, United States Code, governing appointment in the competitive civil service, and without regard to Chapter 51 and Subchapter III of Chapter 53 of such Title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that not more than two individuals so appointed may receive pay in excess of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS–15 of the General Schedule. Appointments shall be made without regard to political affiliation.

(e) The Commission is authorized to accept and use services of voluntary and uncompensated personnel. Such personnel shall not be considered Federal employees for any purpose other than for purposes of Chapter 81 of Title 5, United States Code (relating to compensation for injury), and Sections 2671 through 2680 of Title 28, United States Code (relating to tort claims), and shall not perform the work of Federal employees.

(f) Members or staff of the Commission or of a subcommittee thereof, shall be allowed travel expenses while attending meetings of the Commission or its subcommittees or otherwise engaged in the business of the Commission away from their homes or regular places of business, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized under section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons in Government service employed intermittently.

(g) The Commission is authorized to procure temporary and intermittent services of experts and consultants as are necessary to the extent authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(h) The Commission is authorized to accept, use, and dispose of contributions of money or property.

(i) The Commission is authorized to enter into contracts with Federal and State agencies, private firms, institutions, and individuals for the conduct of research or surveys, the preparation of reports, and other activities necessary to the discharge of its duties and responsibilities.

(j) The Commission may use the United States mails under the same conditions as other departments and agencies of the United States.

(k) The powers granted the Commission by this Act shall be in addition to those granted by Executive Order 12053. The powers granted the Commission by Executive Order 12053 may be employed to fulfill the responsibilities of the Commission under this Act.

(l) The powers granted the Commission under this Act may be delegated to any member or employee of the Commission by the Commission chairperson.

(m) Financial and administrative support services (including those related to budget and accounting, financial reporting, personnel, and procurement) shall be provided to the Commission by the General Services Administration, for which payment shall be made in advance, or by reimbursement, from funds of the Commission, in such amounts as may be agreed upon by the Chairperson of the Commission and the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

WAVERS OF CERTAIN OTHER PROVISIONS OF LAW

SEC. 6. In order to expedite matters pertaining to the planning for, and work of, the Commission, the Commission is authorized to make purchases and contracts without regard to section 252 of title 41 of the United States Code, pertaining to advertising and competitive bidding, and may arrange for the printing of any material pertaining to the work of the Commission without regard to the Government Printing and Binding Regulations and any related laws or regulations.

TERMINATION DATE

SEC. 7. The Commission shall continue in existence until thirty days after submission of its final report to the President pursuant to section 4(d), at which time it shall terminate, but the life of the Commission shall in no case extend beyond April 30, 1980.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 8. There are authorized to be appropriated, without fiscal year limitation, $1,360,000 to carry out the provisions of this Act. Such sums shall remain available for obligation until expended.

No funds authorized hereunder may be used for lobbying activities.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., May 24, 1978.

Hon. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C. 20510.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am transmitting today a bill to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979.

Enactment of this legislation will enable the United States to participate fully in celebrating 1979 as the International Year of the Chid, which was designated by the United Nations General Assembly by approval of a resolution of its thirty-first session.

This National Commission will create within the United States a better understanding of the needs of children, both here and abroad, and will prepare a report and recommendations on national policies to meet these needs.

The powers granted to the National Commission under this Act will be in addition to those provided in Executive Order 12053.

I urge its early passage.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER.●

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 3162. A bill to secure and protect the freedom of individuals from unwarranted intrusions by persons acting under color of law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PERSONAL PRIVACY ACT OF 1978

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the U.S. Supreme Court in a recent decision expanded the use of search warrants to seize an individual's private papers. The Senator from Kansas believes that the decision is not justifiable, will have a chilling effect on the freedom of the press.

Mr. President, I introduce legislation today to insure that every individual will be secure from a governmental intrusion into his private affairs.

In the case of Zurcher against Standford Daily, the Court held that law enforcement authorities may enter and search the premises of a newspaper armed only with a warrant issued upon probable cause that the newspaper may have in its possession evidence of a crime. For the police to obtain such a warrant, it is not necessary that they show any involvement by officers or employees of the newspaper in the alleged unlawful activity. It was also unnecessary for the police to give notice to the newspaper that such a warrant will be sought or that a warrant has been issued.

Mr. President, the principle the Court laid down permits searches of homes and offices for documentary evidence of crimes committed by anyone. The abuses of this type of conduct are enormous. The legislation I introduce today would require that before a warrant could be issued to search the private papers of a person not involved in a crime, there must be an adversary hearing.

PROVISIONS IN THE BILL

Mr. President, the bill that I am submitting would amend the existing section 2235 of title 18 to cover the situations in which warrants are issued involving persons not suspected of any crime.

Any person acting under color of State law would be required to have a prior adversary court hearing before obtaining a search warrant, if the person is not a criminal suspect. If the person seeking a search warrant, can convince a court that the subject of the warrant has committed or is committing a criminal offense, the prior adversary hearing would not be required.

Another safeguard is also built in to insure the effective administration of justice. If the person seeking the warrant produces reasonable evidence to show that the giving of notice would lead to attempts to conceal, destroy, or alter the items to be seized or substantially interfere with the conduct of the investigation, the prior adversary hearing could be omitted. In all other cases, an opportunity to contest the warrant before its enforcement would have to be provided.

Mr. President, Mr. Justice Stevens in his dissenting opinion, states that—

The warrant application set forth no facts suggesting that respondant was involved in any wrongdoing or would destroy the desired evidence if given notice of what the police desired.

I have Justice Stevens' view and believe that this type of warrant does not comply with the fourth amendment.

I believe that Congress should act swiftly and boldy in protecting the public against possible abuses by the Federal Government. There is no greater right that must be protected than to be secure in our private thoughts and in our homes.

By Mr. JACKSON (for himself and Mr. HANSEN) (by request):

S. 3163. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish an urban park and recreation recovery program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

URBAN PARK AND RECREATION RECOVERY ACT

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I am introducing today (by request) a bill to establish an urban park and recreation recovery program in the Department of the Interior. This proposal is based upon one of the major findings of the National Urban Recreation Study mandated by Public Law 94–422.

Mr. President, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee is extremely interested in working with the administration, affected State and local governments, and the relevant interest groups in formulating a comprehensive urban recreation policy for this country. In this regard, the rehabilitation of existing indoor and outdoor recreation facilities and areas will undoubtedly prove to be an important element of this policy.

Clearly, however, there are many other facets of the urban recreation scene that must be carefully addressed by the committee and the Congress.

I am pleased that Senator METZENBAUM of the our committee has indicated a strong interest in urban recreation policy. As vice chairman of the Parks and Recreation Subcommittee, he has agreed to take the lead on this issue, and I am confident that, under his leadership and initiative, the committee will consider all of the ramifications of the urban recreation issue in a comprehensive and responsible manner. It is my understanding that he plans to begin hearings on this important issue in the very near future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, the administration's letter of transmittal and an exchange of correspondence between myself and Secretary Andrus be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3163

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SHORT TITLE AND EFFECTIVE DATE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act" and shall become effective on October 1, 1978.

FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that the quality of life in urban areas is closely related to the availability of fully-functional park and recreation systems, including land, facilities and service programs. The Congress further finds that many hard-pressed cities have recreation systems which are seriously deteriorated and that no existing Federal assistance program fully addresses the needs for physical rehabilitation of these systems. The purpose of this Act is to authorize Federal grants to hard-pressed communities specifically for the rehabilitation and development of critically-needed recreation areas and facilities for a period of five years. This short-term program is intended to complement existing Federal programs such as the Land and Water Conservation Fund and Community Development grant programs by encouraging and stimulating local governments to revitalize their park and recreation systems and to make long-term commitments to continuing maintenance of these systems.

URBAN PARK AND RECREATION RECOVERY PROGRAM

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") is authorized to establish an Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Program to provide financial assistance for rehabilitation and development of recreation areas and facilities in the form of challenge grants to local governments in urban areas. Such assistance shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary considers appropriate and in the public interest to carry out the purposes of this Act.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. When used in this Act—

(a) "recreation facilities" means indoor or outdoor facilities which are intended to serve the close-to-home recreation needs of community residents, with emphasis on public facilities readily accessible to residential neighborhoods, including multiple-use community centers which have recreation as one of their primary purposes, but excluding major sports arenas, exhibition areas and conference halls used primarily for commercial sports, spectator or display activities.

(b) "recreation areas" means existing parks, building or sites dedicated to recreation purposes and administered by public agencies for use by the general public.

(c) "grants" means matching capital grants to public agencies for the purpose of rebuilding, remodeling, expanding or developing existing outdoor or indoor recreation areas and facilities, including improvements in park landscapes, buildings and support facilities, but excluding routine maintenance and upkeep activities.

(d) "maintenance" means all commonly accepted practices necessary to keep recreation areas and facilities operating in a state of good repair and to protect them from deterioration resulting from normal wear and tear.

(e) "general purpose local government" means any city, county, town, township, parish, village or other general purpose political subdivision of a State, including the District of Columbia.

(f) "special purpose local government" means any local or regional special district, public-purpose corporation or other limited political subdivision of a State, including but not limited to school districts, park authorities, and park, conservation, water or sanitary districts.

(g) "State" means any State of the United States or any instrumentality of a State approved by the Governor; the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

GRANTS TO IMPLEMENT PROGRAM

SEC. 5. GRANTEES.—(a) The Secretary is authorized to provide 50 per centum matching, rehabilitation grants directly to eligible general purpose local governments upon his approval of applications therefor by the chief executives of such governments. At the discretion of such applicants, and if consistent with an approved application, rehabilitation grants may be transferred to independent special purpose local governments: Provided, That recreation areas and facilities owned or managed by them offer recreation opportunities to the general population in their service areas.

(b) Payments may be made only for development or rehabilitation activities which have been approved by the Secretary. Such payments may be made from time to time in keeping with the rate of progress toward the satisfactory completion of a project.

(c) The Secretary may authorize modification of an approved project only when a grantee has adequately demonstrated that such modification is necessary because of circumstances not foreseeable at the time a project was proposed.

(d) CRITERIA FOR GRANT ELIGIBILITY AND PRIORITIES FOR PROJECT APPROVAL.—Eligibility of general purpose local governments for grants shall be based upon need as determined by the Secretary. Within 120 days after the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall publish in the Federal Register a list of the general purpose local governments eligible to participate in the Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Program together with a discussion of criteria used in their selection. Such criteria shall be based upon the minimum standards for physical and economic distress established for the Department of Housing and Urban Development's Urban Development Action Grants.

The Secretary shall also establish priority criteria for project selection and approval which consider such factors as:

(1) population;

(2) age and condition of existing recreation areas and facilities;

(3) demonstrated deficiencies in access to neighborhood recreation opportunities, particularly for low-income and minority residents;

(4) public participation in determining rehabilitation or development needs;

(5) the extent to which a project supports or complements target activities undertaken as part of a local government's overall community development and urban revitalization program;

(6) the extent to which a proposed project would provide employment opportunities for low- and moderate-income residents in the project neighborhood and/or would provide for participation of neighborhood, nonprofit or tenant organizations in the proposed rehabilitation activity or in subsequent maintenance, staffing or supervision of recreation areas and facilities; and

(7) the amount of State and private support for a project as evidenced by commitments of non-Federal resources to project construction or operation.

(e) LOCAL COMMITMENTS TO SYSTEM RECOVERY AND MAINTENANCE.—As a requirement for project approval local governments applying for rehabilitation grants must submit to the Secretary interim evidence of commitments to ongoing rehabilitation, operation, maintenance, and service programs and planning for their overall park and recreation system. Such commitments should maximize coordination of all community resources, including other federally supported urban development and recreation programs. Following an interim period to be established by regulations under this Act, all local applicants must submit to the Secretary, as a condition of eligibility, complete park and recreation recovery plans identifying overall rehabilitation and maintenance objectives for the park and recreation system, including satisfactory demonstration by a local government of:

(1) adequate planning for the development or rehabilitation of specifically identified recreation areas and facilities, including projections of the cost of proposed projects,

(2) capacity and commitment to assure that facilities provided or improved under this Act shall thereafter continue to be adequately maintained, promoted, staffed and supervised; and

(3) intention to maintain total local public outlays for park and recreation purposes at levels at least equal to such expenditures in the year preceding that in which grant assistance is sought.

(4) the relationship of the park and recreation recovery program to overall community development and urban revitalization efforts.

The Secretary shall establish and publish in the Federal Register requirements for preparation, submission and updating of local park and recreation recovery plans.

(f) PROGRAM DEVELOPMENT GRANTS.—The Secretary is authorized to provide 50 per centum matching grants for program development and planning specifically to meet the objectives of this Act.

(g) STATE ACTION INCENTIVE.—The Secretary is authorized to increase Federal grants authorized in section 5(a) by providing an additional match equal to the total match provided by a State of up to 25% of total project costs. In no event may the Federal matching amount exceed 75% of total project cost. The Secretary shall further encourage the States to assist him in assuring that local rehabilitation plans and programs are adequately implemented by cooperating with the Department of the Interior in monitoring local park and recreation recovery plans and programs and in insuring consistency of such plans and programs, where appropriate, with State recreation policies as set forth in statewide comprehensive outdoor recreation plans.

(h) MATCHING REQUIREMENTS.—The non-Federal shares of project costs assisted under this section may be derived from general or special purpose State or local revenues, State categorical grants, special appropriations by State legislatures, donations of land, buildings or building materials and/or in-kind construction, technical and planning services, but not from any Federal grant program other than General Revenue Sharing and the Community Development block grant program. Reasonable local costs of plans or program development to meet the requirements of subsection (e) of this section may be used as part of the local match only when local applicants have not received program development grants under the authority of subsection (f) of this section. The Secretary shall encourage States and private interests to contribute, to the maximum extent possible, to the non-Federal share of project costs. The amount of State and private contributions to the project, shall be considered as one factor in rating projects for approval.

(i) CONVERSION OF RECREATION PROPERTY.—No property improved or developed with assistance under this Act shall, without the approval of the Secretary, be converted to other than public recreation uses. The Secretary shall approve such conversion only if he finds it to be in accord with the then existing local park and recreation recovery plan and only upon such conditions as he deems necessary to assure the provision of adequate recreation properties and opportunities of reasonably equivalent location and usefulness.

COORDINATION OF THE PROGRAM

SEC. 6. The Secretary shall (a) coordinate the urban park and recreation recovery program with the total urban recovery effort and work with the Secretary of HUD to insure maximum effectiveness of the program. The Secretary shall also coordinate to the fullest extent possible with other Federal departments and agencies and with State agencies which administer programs and policies affecting urban areas, including but not limited to, programs in housing, urban development, natural resources management, employment, transportation, community services and voluntary action; (b) encourage maximum coordination of the program between appropriate State agencies and local applicants; and (c) require that local applicants include provisions for participation of community and neighborhood residents and for public-private coordination in rehabilitation planning and project selection.

AUDIT REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 7. Each recipient of assistance under this Act shall keep such records as the Secretary shall prescribe, including records which fully disclose the amount and disposition of project undertakings in connection with which assistance under this Act is given or used, and the amount and nature of that portion of the cost of the project or undertaking supplied by other sources, and such other records as will facilitate an effective audit. The Secretary, and the Comptroller General of the United States, or any of their duly authorized representatives, shall have access for the purpose of audit and examination to any books, documents, papers, and records of the recipient that are pertinent to assistance received under this Act.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 8. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the grants authorized by this Act, not to exceed $150 million for each of the fiscal years 1979 through 1983, such sums to remain available until expended. Not more than three per centum of the funds authorized in any fiscal year may be used for grants for the development of local park and recreation recovery plans and programs pursuant to sections 5(e) and 5(f) of this Act. Grants made under this Act for projects in any one State shall not exceed in the aggregate 15 per centum of the aggregate amount of funds authorized to be appropriated in any fiscal year.

LIMITATION ON USE OF FUNDS

SEC. 9. No grant funds available under this Act shall be used for acquisition of land or interests in land.

EXPIRATION OF AUTHORITY

SEC. 10. The authority for new appropriations under this Act shall expire on September 30, 1983. Funds already authorized and appropriated as of that date will remain available until expended.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., May 12, 1978.

Hon. WALTER F. MONDALE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed is the "Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act of 1978," a draft bill to implement one element of President Carter's Urban Policy message of April 3, 1978. This proposal is based upon one of the major findings of the year-long "National Urban Recreation Study" mandated by P.L. 94-422 and conducted by this Department. It reflects the contributions of innumerable government agencies, private organizations and individuals representing National, State and local interests and the results of field work in 17 major metropolitan areas around the country.

We recommend that this draft bill be referred to the appropriate Committee for consideration and that it be enacted in its present form.

The purpose of the Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act is to give National recognition to the importance of fully-functional park and recreation systems in urban communities and neighborhoods and to respond to difficulties which many hard-pressed cities have had in rehabilitating or improving deteriorated park and recreation areas. The "National Urban Recreation Study" found that many existing neighborhood and community recreation areas were failing to serve the needs of citizens because of the age, design or condition of their services-oriented facilities. The draft bill would address these problems by establishing a five-year grant program to stimulate local action to rehabilitate and revitalize park and recreation systems and to encourage long-term local commitments to continuing maintenance of these systems. We view this initiative as one time program which would not extend beyond 1983. The proposal would fill a gap in current Federal efforts to ensure, in cooperation with State and local governments, adequate recreation opportunities for all Americans.

The key elements of the proposed Act are:

1. Authorization of an Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Program in the Department of the Interior—

The Secretary of the Interior would be authorized to provide 50 percent matching grants for rehabilitation of indoor and outdoor recreation facilities directly to eligible general purpose local governments, with provision for assistance to special purpose agencies such as school or park districts at the discretion of city mayors, county chairmen or other chief executives of general purpose governments.

2. Emphasis on challenging States, local governments and the private sector to commit their own resources to urban revitalization.—

In accordance with the overall theme of the President's Urban Policy message, this program would emphasize self help through commitments of non-Federal resources in the matching of Federal grants. Section 5(g) of the bill contains a State action incentive which would provide a dollar-for-dollar bonus in Federal matching for every dollar a State contributes, up to 25% of project costs. This provision would allow up to 75% Federal matching with a 25% State match. The State matching incentive would encourage States to help their cities while providing flexibility for local and State governments on the share of project costs that each would bear.

Under section 5(d), project selection and approval criteria would also give a boost in priority rating to projects which are supported by State and private contributions.

3. Targeting of the program to fiscally hard-pressed cities.—

Under section 5(d) of the bill, the Secretary is mandated to use the UDAG criteria of the Department of Housing and Urban Development to target the program to local governments which meet minimum standards for physical and economic distress; these criteria include such factors as age of housing, per capita income, population decline, employment and unemployment rates and percent of residents below the poverty level as measurements of the relative distress of local jurisdictions on a national scale. Section 5(d) also requires development of priority criteria for project selection and approval which recognize age and condition of existing recreation facilities and demonstrable deficiencies in neighborhood recreation needs, along with other need factors.

We feel that the eligibility and priority criteria included in the bill will allow use of the funds authorized to ensure maximum stimulus to State and local governments and maximum direct benefits in the forms of improved recreation opportunities for urban areas with the greatest needs. Eligibility and priority criteria would be established in the shortest time possible following Congressional enactment of the program to eliminate unnecessary delays in implementation of local recovery programs.

4. Local commitments to development of overall recovery programs and to ongoing system maintenance.—

The purposes of sections 5(e) and 5(f) of the bill are to insure that local applicants for rehabilitation grants are committed to a systematic process for identifying rehabilitation needs and priorities and to adequate staffing, funding and maintenance programs for proper utilization and upkeep of existing and rehabilitated facilities. The bill would provide matching assistance for program development and planning where necessary, but we do not envision either requiring or funding lengthy or massive data collection and analysis efforts. The intent is rather to obtain formal commitments from local elected officials and administrators to publicly-approved projects, programs and policies for ongoing system rehabilitation and maintenance.

5. Coordination with other urban development and recreation programs.—

The bill recognizes the need for coordination of the Park and Recreation Recovery Program with related programs at the Federal, State and local level. It requires coordination among the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and other Federal agencies in the determination of eligible applicants and in development and administration of the program. This will ensure maximum linkage with other elements of the President's comprehensive urban policy, particularly the labor-intensive public works, arts and culture and neighborhood volunteer elements. The bill also specifies Federal cooperation with State recreation and urban assistance agencies and between State and local governments in program planning and administration; it has several provisions encouraging participation by community and neighborhood residents, volunteer organizations and other private interests at the local level.

We feel that the proposed program will address a long-recognized need for rehabilitation of urban parks and recreation centers and that proposed administrative procedures and requirements provide a balanced response to some critical recreation concerns of State and local interests. We look forward to working with Congress, the States and local governments in implementing this aspect of a comprehensive national urban policy.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that this legislative proposal is in accord with the President's program.

Sincerely,

ROBERT L. HERBST,
Assistant Secretary.

ENR-P & R-NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
May 17, 1978.

Hon. CECIL D. ANDRUS,
Secretary, U.S. Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On May 12, 1978, the Department transmitted to the Senate the "Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act of 1978." In that transmittal, you requested that the Administration's draft bill be referred to the appropriate Committee and enacted.

On April 27, 1978, Senator Proxmire introduced S. 3013, a bill to authorize the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to establish an urban park and recreation program. While there are some differences between the two measures in many respects they appear to be identical.

Since Senator Proxmire indicated that he was introducing his bill "at the request of the Administration," I am not clear as to the Administration's position on this legislation.

I would like some clarification on this matter at your earliest convenience. As I do not feel that I can introduce this particular draft legislation in the absence of such clarification, your prompt consideration of this request will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

HENRY M. JACKSON,
Chairman, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., May 25, 1978.

Hon. HENRY M. JACKSON,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SCOOP: Your letter of May 17 concerning the "Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act of 1978," has been received. This Act is an integral part of the President's urban program. It was transmitted by the Department of the Interior, on behalf of the Administration, to the Senate on May 12.

I am not aware of the circumstances surrounding the introduction of S. 3013 by Senator Proxmire. Prior to Administration clearance of the Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act which the Department of the Interior submitted to you, several drafts and versions of bills to accomplish our objectives were developed. A number of these drafts were circulated for review and comment. Possibly, in this process, a draft was confused as the Administration bill. However, the bill introduced by Senator Proxmire was not and is not an Administration proposal.

The actual Administration bill is the one the Department of the Interior submitted to the Senate on May 12. We believe this is an important piece of legislation and the need for this Act is thoroughly demonstrated in the findings of the National Urban Recreation Study, recently submitted to Congress in response to P.L. 94-422. I urge your immediate and favorable consideration of this legislation and am willing to work with you in expediting its passage this session.

Sincerely,

CECE,
Secretary.●

By Mr. BAYH (for himself, Mr. METZENBAUM, and Mr. PERCY):

S. 3164. A bill entitled "The Citizen's Privacy Protection Amendment of 1978"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, today I am introducing along with Senators METZENBAUM and PERCY the citizen's privacy protection amendment to the Civil Rights Act. This legislation is designed to establish special procedures for searching and seizing evidence of a crime when that evidence is in the possession of a person not implicated in any criminal activity. A special exception to this approach is incorporated when there are specific indications that the evidence to be sought might be hidden or destroyed.

The Citizen's Privacy Protection Amendment of 1978 is a response to the Supreme Court's decision of last week in the case of Zurcher against Stanford Daily. In that decision the majority held that the police armed with a warrant could, forcibly and without notice, search a person's business or home for evidence of a crime even if that person is in no way suspected of complicity in that crime. While no one would argue that prosecutors should not have access to necessary evidence, I do not believe that this is an appropriate standard for seeking such evidence from innocent third parties. As chairman of the Subcommittee on the Constitution I am particularly disturbed over the dangerous implications this ruling could carry for our first, fourth, and sixth amendment freedoms and the citizen's right to privacy in general.

Mr. President, the Zurcher decision poses a particular threat to the media and its constitutionally protected functions of news gathering and dissemination. By its very nature the media conducts investigations of possible criminal activity by a wide variety of people and organizations. The fruits of these investigations could almost routinely be considered "evidence" relating to crimes and would, therefore, be subject to seizure by unannounced police raids of newspaper, radio, and television stations. In the course of these searches confidential news sources could very well be compromised and exposed. As Justice Stewart's dissent in Zurcher points out:

A search warrant allows police officers to ransack the files of a newspaper, reading each and every document until they have found the one named in the warrant, while a subpoena would permit the newspaper itself to produce only the specific documents requested. A search, unlike a subpoena, will therefore lead to the needless exposure of confidential information completely unrelated to the purpose of the investigation. The knowledge that police officers can make an unannounced raid on a newsroom is thus bound to have a deterrent effect on the availability of confidential news sources. The end result, wholly inimical to the First Amendment, will be a diminishing flow of potentially important information to the public.

One need not rely on mere intuition to reach this conclusion. The record in this case includes affidavits not only from members of the staff of The Stanford Daily but from many professional journalists and editors, attesting to precisely such personal experience. Despite the Court's rejection of this uncontroverted evidence, I believe it clearly establishes that unannounced police searches of newspaper offices will significantly burden the constitutionally protected function of the press to gather news and report it to the public.

It should be emphasized, of course, that the dangers posed by Zurcher are not confined to the media. Justice Stevens' dissent eloquently outlines the negative implications of the court's opinion for our rights to privacy on a broad spectrum of American society:

Just as the witnesses who participate in an investigation or a trial far outnumber the defendants, the persons who possess evidence that may help to identify an offender or explain an aspect of a criminal transaction, far outnumber those who have custody of weapons or plunder. Countless law abiding citizens—doctors, lawyers, merchants, customers, bystanders—may have documents in their possession that relate to an ongoing criminal investigation. The consequences of subjecting this large category of persons to unannounced police searches are extremely serious. The ex parte warrant procedure enables the prosecutor to obtain access to privileged documents that could not be examined if advance notice gave the custodian an opportunity to object. The search for the documents described in a warrant may involve the inspection of files containing other private matter. The dramatic character of a sudden search may cause an entirely unjustified injury to the reputation of the persons searched.

Mr. President, in its decision the majority stated that Congress was free to establish more stringent legislative standards than the rule laid down by the Court in Zurcher. I believe we have a responsibility to respond to that invitation. The citizen's privacy protection amendment would require that when any person acting under color of law, whether a Federal, State or local official, seeks evidence of a crime from a citizen's home or business who is not suspected of being involved in the crime the proper procedure is to serve a subpena duces tecum rather than conduct a surprise search. An exception to this approach is recognized if there is reason to believe the evidence could be lost or destroyed. Violations of the act will result in civil damages.

Mr. President, it is one of the strengths of our Constitution that it provides so many safeguards to insure fair treatment and due process for those persons suspected of crimes, but I also strongly believe that when there is absolutely no reason to suspect a particular citizen is in any way implicated in criminal activity, that citizen's right to privacy in his or her home or business should be strictly adhered to by our Government. This is an ancient and honorable principle. It might be well for us to bear in mind one of the most famous statements by William Pitt in this regard:

The poorest man in his cottage may bid defiance to all the forces of the crown. It may be frail, its roof may shake, the wind may blow through it, the storm may enter, the rain may enter, but the King of England cannot enter. All of his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenements.

The citizen's privacy protection amendment will insure that persons not suspected of crimes will be afforded an equal degree of privacy from their Government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill and an editorial from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3164

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the Citizen's Privacy Protection Amendment of 1978.

SEC. 2. In order to assure the rights of citizens under the 4th and 14th Amendments of the Constitution and to protect the freedom of the press under the 1st Amendment, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new Title XII, as follows:

"TITLE XII

"SEC. 1201. Subject to the exceptions found in Section 1202 of this Act, anyone acting under color of law who has probable cause to believe evidence of a crime is located on or about premises in which the person in possession of the evidence has a reasonable expectation of privacy shall attempt to secure that evidence only through a subpoena duces tecum.

SEC. 1202. Notwithstanding Section 1201 of this Act; a warrant may issue if:

(1) there is probable cause to believe the person or persons in possession of the evidence may be involved in the crime under investigation; or

(2) there is probable cause to believe the evidence sought to be seized would be destroyed, hidden or moved if the procedures set out in Section 1201 were followed.

SEC. 1203. (a) Any person aggrieved by a violation of Title XII of this Act may commence a civil action in an appropriate United States District Court.

(b) In any action brought under this Section the Court may award such general damages as may be appropriate as well as punitive damages not to exceed $10,000 for each violation."

RESTRICTING SEARCH WARRANTS

Near the end of the Supreme Court's decision expanding the use of search warrants to seize private papers, Justice Byron R. White pointed out how the effects of the decision can be overcome. "Of course," he wrote, "the Fourth Amendment does not prevent or advise against legislative or executive efforts to establish nonconstitutional protections against possible abuses of the search warrant procedure. . . ." What he means is that Congress can pass a law embodying the protections the court has refused to find in the Constitution. Congress should seize the opportunity at once. The dangers of the "possible abuses" are too great to permit delay.

The statement by Deputy Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti that the Department of Justice will not authorize federal police to seek warrants for surprise searches of newspaper files is not enough. For newspapers, although they face a special problem involving confidential sources of information, are not the only ones in jeopardy. The decision threatens the privacy of every home and office in the country; yet the Department of Justice, which egged the court on toward the outcome it reached, seems oblivious of those dangers.

The principle the court laid down permits searches of homes and offices for documentary evidence—pictures, letters, notes, diaries—of crimes committed by anyone. As far as we can tell, there is no exemption even for the files of psychiatrists, ministers and lawyers.

The possible abuses are legion. Under this decision, the Nixon administration might have been able to get a warrant to search the files of Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist for information about the Pentagon Papers. Under it, your house can be searched if the police have reason to believe someone has mailed you a confession to a crime or a picture of a crime being committed. Such searches, no doubt, might make the solution of particular crimes simpler. But searches are not always productive and rarely are surgical. The search in the case before the court did not produce the picture the police sought; search of a Los Angeles radio station lasted more than eight hours. During the course of searches such as those, the police cannot be prevented from looking at whatever they run across. Who knows what bits of highly personal and private information they might have stumbled across in the files of Mr. Ellsberg's psychiatrist or would find in your home?

Congress can eliminate these and other possible abuses by passing legislation denying to federal judges the authority to issue warrants of this kind. Such legislation should go beyond repudiating the new doctrine that it is permissible to search an innocent person's belongings for evidence that someone else has committed a crime. It should also roll back the reach of search warrants to where it was 15 years ago, when the private papers of an individual could not be searched even for evidence of his own wrongdoing. The idea, now accepted by the court, that no place is immune from government scrutiny except a person's brain is alien to the precepts of the Bill of Rights.

By passing such legislation quickly, Congress would be doing more than just protecting the public against possible abuses by the federal police. It would be creating a model that could be taken to the state legislatures, each of which would have to adopt it before the public could be safe again. Beyond that, Congress would be sending a message to the Supreme Court that it's whittling away of the Fourth Amendment has gone too far. Such a message might have little immediate effect, given the current membership of the court. But it would lie there, waiting for the court of a later era first to realize that such basic privacy should not be breached and then to restore to the Fourth Amendment the meaning its authors intended it to have.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 1967

At the request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) were added as cosponsors of S. 1967, dealing with social security contributions by State and local governments.

S. 2504

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2504, a bill to amend the Commodity Credit Corporation Act to establish a program to expand exports of farm commodities by CCC financing.

S. 2674

At the request of Mr. PROXMIRE, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2674, to assist cities and States with respect to the authority of national banks to underwrite and deal in securities issued by State and local governments, and for other purposes.

S. 2716

At the request of Mr. NELSON, the Senator from Montana (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2716, the Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Amendments of 1978.

S. 2721

At the request of Mr. MCCLURE, the Senators from Utah (Mr. GARN and Mr. HATCH) were added as cosponsors of S. 2721, to amend section 803 of Public Law 90–284 to allow educational institutions to determine housing policies.

S. 2742

At the request of Mr. NELSON, the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CULVER) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2742, to reform the depreciation system for small business.

S. 2865

At the request of Mr. NELSON, the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) were added as cosponsors of S. 2865, to delete the widow's tax, on excess estate tax which is not found in the Internal Revenue Code.

S. 3147

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG), the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT), and the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) were added as cosponsors of S. 3147, a bill to prohibit the issuance of regulations on the taxation of fringe benefits.

SENATE RESOLUTION 461

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS), and the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA) were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 461, relating to the emigration of John and Lorriane Jodwalis.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 68

At the request of Mr. CURTIS, the Senator from Colorado, (Mr. HASKELL) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 68, expressing the sense of the Congress on the Baltic States question.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 79

At the request of Mr. MCCLURE, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 79, disapproving proposed regulations of the Department of Treasury requiring centralized registration of firearms and other matters.

AMENDMENT NO. 1794

At the request of Mr. PROXMIRE, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR) was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 1794, intended to be proposed to S. 50, the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978.

AMENDMENT NO. 2254

At the request of Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 2254, proposed to H.R. 8410, the labor reform bill.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978—H.R. 8410

AMENDMENTS NOS. 2255 THROUGH 2285

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. LUGAR submitted 31 amendments intended to be proposed by him to H.R. 8410, the Labor Law Reform Act of 1978.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 2286 THROUGH 2317

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HATCH submitted 32 amendments intended to be proposed by him to H.R. 8410, the Labor Law Reform Act of 1978.

SENATE RESOLUTION 471—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED DURING THE RECESS TO WAIVE THE BUDGET ACT

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget on May 31, 1978:

S. RES. 471

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 3082, a bill to amend the North Pacific Fisheries Act of 1954. Such waiver is necessary because the Japanese salmon fishing season begins June 9, 1978, at which time there will be no governing legal mechanism to implement the terms of the recently negotiated 1978 Protocol Amending the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean unless S. 3082 is enacted into law. The bill implements this Protocol by amending the North Pacific Fisheries Act of 1954. It would provide substantially increased protection for United States salmon stocks that would otherwise be subject to fishing by the Japanese high seas fleet and authorizes to be appropriated $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1979 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1980 in order to carry out the provisions of the bill relating to research of marine mammals in the North Pacific area. In addition, the bill authorizes to be appropriated $500,000 to the Secretary of Commerce for the 3-year period beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1981, to carry out a sonar salmon research demonstration project in the Arctic-Yukon-Kuskokwim region. Because the implementing legislation was not transmitted to the Congress until May 9, there was not adequate opportunity to act on the bill prior to May 15. The matters contained in S. 3082, as reported, relating to the cost of the implementation of the 1978 Protocol, were anticipated by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation in its March 15, 1978, report to the Committee on the Budget.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FEDERAL SPENDING PRACTICES AND OPEN GOVERNMENT

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Federal Spending Practices and Open Government is rescheduling the oversight hearing on the Government in the Sunshine Act (Public Law 94-409) from Wednesday, June 7, to Tuesday, June 13, 1978, at 10 a.m., in room 3302, Dirksen Building.

A hearing will also be held the following day, Wednesday, June 14, on the Contract Disputes Act of 1978 (S. 2787) at 10 a.m., in room 3302, Dirksen.

For further information regarding these hearings, please contact Mr. Ronald A. Chiodo, subcommittee chief counsel and staff director.●

CHANCE OF DATE ON NOMINATION HEARING

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that the public hearing originally scheduled for Tuesday, June 6, 1978, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, has been changed to Wednesday, June 7, 1978, at 4:30 p.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, on the following nomination:

Shane Devine, of New Hampshire, to be U.S. district judge for the district of New Hampshire vice Hugh H. Bownes, elevated.●

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Select Committee on Small Business will hold a hearing on S. 836 (to amend title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958) on Monday, June 12, 1978, at 9:30 a.m. in room 424 of the Russell Senate Office Building. The Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT) will chair the hearing.

Further information can be obtained from the committe office at 224-5175.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

PROPOSED ECONOMIC BOYCOTT OF UGANDA

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, on January 23, I introduced legislation in the Senate (S. 2412, S. 2413, and S. 2414) to end U.S. commercial support of the bloody regime of Idi Amin in Uganda. At that time, I stressed the great extent to which the Ugandan Government relies on U.S. firms to buy its coffee and sell its communication equipment and luxury goods. An economic boycott of Uganda is our readiest and most effective means of pressuring Amin to cease his terror.

But so far, Mr. President, the U.S. Government—a government which ironically prides itself as champion of human rights the world over—has, like the priest in the parable of the Good Samaritan, been content to mind high thoughts and ideals while walking past a beaten, bleeding nation.

Richard Ullman, in his article "Human Rights and Economic Power: The United States Versus Idi Amin" which appeared in the April 1978 issue of Foreign Affairs provides an astute discussion of the issues involved in United States-Ugandan economic relations. Formerly a professor of international relations at Princeton University, Mr. Ullman is currently a member of the editorial board of the New York Times.

He demonstrates how the Amin government would suffer in the event of an American economic boycott, such as I have sponsored in the Senate and Congressman PEASE introduced in the House. Coffee amounts to more than four-fifths of Uganda's exports. One-third of Uganda's coffee is bought by American companies. The lion's share of the money Amin uses to buy arms, pay soldiers, and reward henchmen comes from coffee sales. If the United States were to cut off Ugandan trade, the consequent shortage of available cash might well precipitate a crisis for Amin. Given the current political and economic turmoil of Uganda, one can easily imagine a scenario in which Amin, unable to meet the payroll of mercenary thugs, is deposed by the Ugandan people.

Even in the unlikely event that new markets could be quickly found for the 63,000 tons of coffee the United States bought from Uganda last year, enactment of a U.S. trade embargo against Amin would set a moral example for the world. The message would be clear that this democracy, founded on respect for fundamental human rights, want no part in sustaining government by genocide.

The concern of the Carter administration about economic sanctions against Uganda is that our actions will legitimize the use of economic leverage to achieve political ends. They justifiably fear economic actions like the OPEC oil embargo of 1973.

But the belief by many in our Government that economic and political realms can be kept separate belies reality. Political action always have economic consequences and vice versa. Moreover, as Mr. Ullman describes, the United States has constrained trade with the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, Cuba, Rhodesia, Communist China, North Korea, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, and the Dominican Republic. It is clear from our history that certain situations require the use of economic tools.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to examine Mr. Ullman's fine contribution to the growing body of literature dealing with United States—Ugandan relations and ask that the text of his article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HUMAN RIGHTS AND ECONOMIC POWER: THE UNITED STATES VERSUS IDI AMIN

(By Richard H. Ullman)

By the time this journal is in its readers' hands, the American Congress may have been called upon to decide whether Uganda's coffee should be barred from entering the United States. Its decision will hold great importance for Uganda, for the United States, and for the international system. At stake will be the issue of whether or not the richest and most powerful of sovereign states is justified in using its economic power unilaterally to force the government of a smaller and weaker state to alter the way it treats its own subjects. The questions raised come cascading forward: Why should rich North Americans interfere in the internal affairs of a poor Africa state? How would that interference relate to other American interests and policies—in Africa and elsewhere? What is the larger significance for the international system of such use of an economic instrument—a coffee boycott—for a political purpose?

II

In any contemporary lexicon of horror, Uganda is synonymous with state-become-slaughterhouse. The most conservative estimates by informed observers hold that President Idi Amin Dada and the terror squads operating under his loose direction have killed 100,000 Ugandans in the seven years he has held power. Some estimates run as high as 300,000. Many victims have been guilty of nothing more than catching the eye of the killer—a shopkeeper with coveted goods, a Christian in a Muslim village, a civil servant who questions a command, a judge with foreign friends.

Other governments, in Africa and elsewhere, rule by terror and reward opposition by death; Equatorial Guinea and Cambodia would belong on any list, and there are more. But the scale of official murder in Uganda, its ferocious brutality, and its terrible capriciousness all place Idi Amin's Uganda in a category of its own in which the nearest analogues may be Hitler's Germany or Stalin's Russia. Just as South Africa is unique—an entire system of political and social repression resting on racial distinctions—so Uganda is also. Each, for different reasons, deserves international condemnation.

Thus far, however, Uganda has escaped the kind of censure exemplified by the U.N. Security Council's vote last November to impose a mandatory arms embargo on South Africa. The most notable act of international censure came at last summer's conference of Commonwealth heads of government when, in Idi Amin's absence, the meeting passed a resolution deploring human rights violations in Uganda. Previously, in March 1977, the U.N. Human Rights Commission—on which Uganda sits—shelved a proposal that it should conduct an investigation into Ugandan conditions. Early last December the five Nordic governments jointly sponsored a U.N. General Assembly resolution condemning Uganda. Immediately it aroused intense controversy within the U.N.'s 50-member African group, with some members even willing to support it. But the majority urged—and the Nordic sponsors agreed—that in exchange for a commitment that the Human Rights Commission would take up Uganda once again in March 1978, the resolution would not be publicly debated or pressed to a vote.

Not surprisingly, many Westerners contrast African governments' toleration of Uganda with their denunciation of South Africa. Nearly all African leaders have been vociferous in their condemnation of the white regime in Pretoria while remaining silent regarding the black regime in Kampala. African leaders are, indeed, curiously schizophrenic regarding Amin. Many privately admit to abhorring him, and say that he has disgraced Africa. Yet only a few, such as Tanzania's Julius Nyerere and Zambia's Kenneth Kaunda, have said so publicly. The Commonwealth conference succeeded in condemning Uganda last summer only because the resolution of censure did not mention Amin by name and because it passed by acclamation: no head of government had to put his name to it. Only a short while later, at the summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) at Libreville, Amin received a rousing ovation.

Many African leaders refuse to speak or act against Amin for fear of violating the OAU's cardinal rule against interference in a member state's internal affairs. The use of repressive force to maintain order—or power—in new, fragile states composed of multiple tribal groupings is common. Some leaders undoubtedly feel that even though the scale and the capriciousness of official violence in Uganda goes beyond any rational bounds and is fully deserving of repudiation, any effort to condemn Amin would open the door to a process that ultimately would rebound against themselves. Therefore, perhaps the most important factor determining whether or not African governments will ever join in some sort of collective condemnation or action against Idi Amin's regime will be whether they can persuade themselves, as others are already persuaded, that the slaughter in Uganda is indeed a case apart.

There are a few African leaders who purport to believe that the allegations against Amin—well-documented though they are—are fabrications by white racists designed to discredit all African governments. Throughout Africa Amin enjoys a certain popularity because of his theatrical humiliation of whites; the photograph of his great bulk, chair-borne, being carried into an OAU rally in a Kampala stadium by a clutch of sweating British businessmen—a modern "white man's burden," as Amin himself put it—will not soon be forgotten.

III

Black African states can censure Amin, and their doing so would be a gesture of great moral significance. Conceivably, they could use coercive force against him. But armed action would endanger ordinary Ugandans and the citizens of the neighboring countries from which a military campaign would come.

It is the West, more than black Africa, that holds the power decisively to affect events in Uganda. The alternative to coercion by arms is economic coercion, and only the West can provide it. Uganda's economic relations with African states consist of a fairly modest trade in foodstuffs and light manufactured goods. As in the case of South Africa, it is in the economic realm that Western states can exert leverage. South Africa's modern, industrialized economy is deeply intertwined with the economies of the West. There is no comparable interdependence in the case of Uganda, but a simple and direct dependence. Uganda depends on the West to provide a market for the Ugandan coffee crop, and coffee is now the country's only export of any significance. A decade or so ago Uganda exported substantial amounts of both cotton and copper, but under Amin its economy has been thrown into such chaos that cotton growing and copper production have virtually ceased, and in recent years coffee has accounted for more than four-fifths of Uganda's exports. That coffee—the cheaper robusta type used for instant coffee—amounts to five percent of the world's crop by value. During 1977 Uganda benefited substantially from the rise in world coffee prices brought about by the frosts in Brazil and earned some $750 million for its crop, more than double the figures for 1976. No less than one-third of that coffee comes to the United States. Another fifth goes to the United Kingdom, and other Western countries—notably West Germany, France, Italy, Japan, and the Netherlands—buy virtually all the rest.

Uganda's coffee is grown almost entirely by peasant smallholders, not on plantations. Growers are required to sell their beans to the state marketing board, and are paid, at a price set by the board, in vouchers redeemable only in nearly worthless Ugandan shillings. Sometimes they are not even paid at all. Their crop is simply seized. Thus Amin's regime, and not the growers, receives all the foreign exchange. Amin uses it to pay off loans from Libya and other Arab countries, to buy weapons (mostly from the Soviet Union), and to supply his army, police, and civil service with luxury goods. The latter are particularly important to his hold on power: Amin uses lavish material rewards to purchase loyalty.

Thus there is a direct relationship between foreign purchases of Uganda's coffee and Amin's murderous regime. Whether he would fall from power if those purchases ceased is a question impossible to answer. Many knowledgeable persons think that he would. There is no doubt, however, that he and his closest collaborators would feel the impact of a boycott of Uganda's coffee, and feel it hard.

Who else would feel it? Economic sanctions, so the accepted wisdom runs, are blunt instruments. They cannot be "fined tuned" to impinge only upon those persons whose actions deserve censure. Take the case of South Africa: Some who support Pretoria's policies (and some who do not) concede that comprehensive sanctions—especially a stoppage of all petroleum imports—might eventually bring the white regime to its knees. However, the process would take years, they argue, and while it is occurring urban blacks (roughly half the black population) would feel the pain earlier, and to a greater extent, than whites. That may or may not be the case for South Africa. But Uganda's situation is very different. The vast majority of Ugandans, more than 90 percent and including most of the peasant coffee-growers, depend in large measure upon subsistence agriculture for the necessities of life and participate only marginally in the cash economy. An effective boycott of Uganda's coffee would thus seriously curtail the livelihood only of the country's small urban sector, including Amini's army and police.

There is, of course, the risk that a boycott—especially one that was only partial—would misfire, and merely cause Amin to rule with greater brutality. Even an effective boycott might only induce him to hunker down, rally Ugandans to his side, and wait out the siege. That is doubtful, however. Amin might indeed be able to rally some support. But he is scarcely a popular ruler, and he would have to rely entirely upon sticks, rather than upon the mixture of carrots and sticks he now employs. Moreover, he could not threaten to bring down Uganda's economy with him. It already is down. Some specialists compare Uganda today with Cambodia, so completely has Amin allowed—in fact, hastened—the deterioration of a once fairly impressive social and economic infrastructure.

While a coffee boycott—if effective—would be quite narrowly focused in its impact, and might succeed in removing Amin from power, it obviously could not assure a better future for Ugandans. Amin's downfall would likely be accomplished by members of the narrow circle around him. These are men who themselves have blood on their hands. However Amin's downfall were brought about, there are plenty of Ugandans with scores to settle. In six years of rule, Amin has vastly exacerbated religious and tribal animosities. To expect an easy and bloodless transition in the aftermath of one of the most barbarous reigns of our era would scarcely be realistic, although the process could (and certainly should) be eased by rapid and generous offers of foreign assistance. In addition, many of the thousands of educated and talented Ugandans who have fled abroad to escape Amin would undoubtedly return to aid their country's reconstruction. Whoever Amin's successors might be, however, the chances are overwhelming that they would not be men afflicted with his peculiarly vicious kind of paranoia. It is scarcely likely that the lives of Ugandans—of all classes—would be worse. And there is a very good chance that they would be much better.

IV

The certainty that the Amin regime would be hurt by a boycott, and the considerable chance that he might even fall from power, has motivated Democratic Congressman Don J. Pease of Ohio, supported by 75 colleagues, to introduce legislation to cut off all American trade with Uganda. They are also sponsoring an alternate, less sweeping bill that would bar Ugandan coffee from entering this country.

Pease would, of course, prefer international action, akin to the U.N. arms embargo against South Africa. But he recognizes that, at least for the present, the chances of securing the required international consensus are nonexistent. Even if the U.N. Human Rights Commission should agree to investigate Ugandan atrocities, its inquiry would be likely, at best, to give rise to a General Assembly motion of censure, but not to punitive action. Pease therefore favors a unilateral boycott by the United States, as Uganda's largest export market and supplier of foreign exchange. If an American lead were followed by the United Kingdom, where there is perhaps even a greater awareness and abhorrence of Amin, and by only one or two other Western countries, the impact would likely be large. Even if no other Western government were to follow—and there is no sign that any contemplates doing so—a strong American lead might well stimulate consumer boycotts elsewhere. In any case, denial only of the American market would crimp Uganda's foreign exchange supply. Even that might be enough to precipitate defections from the ranks of Amin's lieutenants. And, combined with the Administration's current policy of refusing to license the export to Uganda of armaments of any sort, it would at the very least effectively disassociate the United States from a genocidal regime.

The Carter Administration has pronounced itself as opposed to a unilateral American boycott of Ugandan coffee. Douglas J. Bennet, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, wrote to Congressman Pease in September 1977 that the Administration was "not convinced" that a unilateral boycott "would be effective in bringing about an improvement in human rights conditions" in Uganda. But its reason for opposing a unilateral action was more general. Bennet stated:

"Boycott actions are not consistent with the principles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), to which the United States is committed as the basis for international commercial relations. Whenever these principles are set aside, their overall authority as a protection for our own international trade interests is undermined. Therefore, as a general matter, we are extremely reluctant to take actions which contradict these principles."

This argument is, of course, very much in the mainstream of official and popular American thinking about international economic relations that runs back to the nineteenth century. As a major trading power, the United States should oppose any effort to restrain trade for a political purpose. Even though a particular cause might be compelling—and Bennet's letter reminded Pease of the Administration's "unequivocal opposition to the continuing record of human rights violations in Uganda"—the more general American interest in an international economic system with minimal barriers would ultimately suffer from a boycott. As The Washington Post put it (November 14, 1977), a boycott would set "a dangerous precedent for more of the same political manipulation of international trade in less egregious cases."

Underlying this argument is the widely shared conviction that economics and politics belong on separate "tracks." The GATT, to which Bennet referred in his letter to Pease, is an important element in the structure of global rules and institutions erected after World War II to guard against the political intrusions in world trade relations that had proved so ruinous during the interwar years. Within this framework, economic pressure should ordinarily be used only to counter economic abuses by others—unilateral imposition of protective tariffs, predatory exchange rate manipulation, and the like.

Human rights violations, such as Amin's, are in the political realm; they should be countered by political measures—denunciation, ostracism, and, ultimately, military force—unless (and here is the exception to the ordinary instance) economic sanctions are mandated by an international organization like the United Nations.

The model for such multilateral action—and one referred to by Bennet in his letter to Pease—has been economic sanctions against the Rhodesian government of Ian Smith, imposed by the U.N. Security Council following his unilateral declaration of independence from Britain in 1965. The requirement of great power unanimity in the Security Council assures that economic measures will not be taken unilaterally or, even more important, without American consent. If sanctions against Rhodesia—even though far from effective or fully observed by the United States—have been the beau idèal for American policymakers, the nightmare was the Arab oil embargo, imposed with varying degrees of stringency against the United States and other Western nations because of their support of Israel in the Middle East war of October 1973. A variant of the same nightmare has been the Arab boycott of selected American banks and companies for their business dealings with Israel. These visions seem to confirm the soundness of Washington's continued insistence upon the protection of a Security Council vote as necessary to justify blurring the separation between policial and economic "tracks."

American practice, however, has departed considerably from this ideal. To cite but a few examples: in 1960 the United States unilaterally imposed a trade embargo on Cuba in retaliation for the Castro regime's uncompensated expropriation of American property. Here, perhaps, was an economic response to an economic action, but the motivation—for both sides—was unabashedly political. That same year Washington obtained economic sanctions by the Organization of American States (OAS) against the Dominican Republic government of Rafael Trujillo for its attempted intervention in Venezuela. And, later by a majority vote in which there were a number of dissenters, it induced the OAS to put a multilateral fig leaf over its embargo against Cuba. Similarly—sometimes unilaterally, at other times through the medium of the so-called Coordinating Committee (COCOM) within NATO—the United States has restricted the sale of important equipment and sensitive technology to communist countries. Finally, the Carter Administration has taken limited punitive economic measures—a cutoff of economic aid and credits, suspension of arms sales—against several governments, Uganda's included, for their flagrant violations of human rights.

The truth, of course, is that the economic and political realms are inseparable, and that decisions made "solely" on the basis of economic criteria have profound political consequences. The explicit decision not to offer easier-than-market credit to a hard-pressed government, such as Peru's, means that it probably will need to repress workers protesting forced austerity—and, later, to face foreign accusations of human rights violations—in order to remain in power. Similarly, the tacit decision to allow market forces to govern the amount of Uganda's coffee American firms purchase is also a tacit decision to take no significant steps—covert measures being, presumably, ruled out—to bring down Idi Amin, nor even to disassociate the United States from support of his regime.

American policymakers are, of course, well aware of the difficulty, in practice, distinguishing between "economic" and "political" causes and effects. They find it convenient to maintain the rhetorical distinction, however, because of a view that, on balance, American interests are better served in a world in which there is a strong presumption against the overtly political use of economic instruments. Moreover, maintaining the distinction makes it possible to avoid some hard decisions. If unilateral (or Western) economic measures to bring down Amin are ruled out, the peculiar advantage that the United States possesses by virtue of its economic size is neutralized, and the issue of what to do about Amin becomes one of organizing a moral consensus against him. The United States thus becomes only one state among many, and the decision is passed squarely back to Amin's peers, the leaders of other African states. Washington is willing to do its part, at the U.N. General Assembly or in the Human Rights Commission, to contribute to censuring Amin, but the central role falls to his fellow Africans.

Undeniably, this is a posture that makes life easier for an American Administration for which, after all, events in Uganda—even if Americans are involved—can never be of continuing central importance. And it is one that carries no risk that the United States (or a Western coalition) will be labeled as an oppressor of a weak, black Third World state. Even African leaders who privately wish for Amin's downfall might be reluctant to see such an outcome brought about as a result of direct American economic pressure. The precedent might seem too dangerous: in other circumstances they themselves might be Washington's chosen targets.

This may be a more comfortable American posture, but it is one that is both intellectually and morally disingenuous, especially for an Administration like Jimmy Carter's, which has so forthrightly identified itself with the promotion of human rights worldwide. When it comes to dealing with Uganda the United States is not merely another small African country. African states can enjoy a luxury denied to the United States by virtue of its size and power. No matter what posture they assume regarding Amin, short of declaring war upon him it will make relatively little difference to his ability to survive. But the United States wields great leverage over the Ugandan economy. By not using it Washington tacitly acquiesces in Amin's survival.

VI

A peculiarity of the American relationship with Uganda is its drastic asymmetry. It is difficult to imagine a bilateral combination in which the power of the first partner to affect the second is so great and that of the second to affect the first so small. Doing without Ugandan coffee would cause scarcely a ripple in the American coffee market.

Indeed, so painless would a boycott be that the President of the National Coffee Association representing the entire domestic industry wrote last November 29 to Congressman Pease and to Secretary of State Vance stating that the Association's members awaited the government's orders. Its board of directors agreed unanimously "that the violations of human rights occurring under the Ugandan Government of President Idi Amin are abhorrent and morally repugnant." But rather than respond firm by firm to public pressures to desist from purchasing Ugandan coffee, and rather than risk being charged with antitrust violations for colluding in a boycott the Association asked the Congress and the Administration "to declare and implement a uniform national policy" that would bind the entire industry.

The situation in other Western countries would undoubtedly be similar, for Uganda's share of their markets is comparably insignificant. Nor would there be a likelihood of significant evasion. Boycott regulations are difficult to enforce if there is substantial profit in evading them. But Uganda's coffee is so small a part of the world crop that the incentives for importers to cheat would be slight, and they could reasonably ask for assurance that coffee from other suppliers was not in fact diluted with Uganda's crop. Similarly, Amin does not enjoy such political support that other African suppliers would be much tempted to come to his assistance by palming off his coffee as their own.[1]

There is, of course, the possibility that other purchasers—the Soviet Union or radical Arab states, such as Libya—might come forward, either to buy the coffee for their own consumption or for resale. That is unlikely, however. The effort would be costly. The countries in question routinely purchase little coffee. Resales might be detected. Moscow came to Cuba's rescue a decade and a half ago and purchased its sugar crop, but there are virtually no parallels between the situations of Cuba and Uganda, nor any—other than flamboyant personal styles and anti-Western rhetoric—between Idi Amin and Fidel Castro. And even Libya's Colonel Qaddafi might find that the role of Amin's savior would carry more political costs than benefits.

The relative ease of imposing an effective boycott against Uganda, however, may become an argument against it, especially in the eyes of Africans. If Western governments want to use their economic leverage on behalf of black Africans, such an argument might run, let them use it in circumstances where they themselves would also have to pay a price—for example, against the white racist regime in South Africa. Virtue that is costless is scarcely distinguishable from opportunism. To take action against Idi Amin while continuing to conduct business as usual with John Vorster would be an affront to the rest of Africa.

The counters to this argument are not so much logical as political—and avowedly opportunistic. It is undeniably true, given the degree of economic interdependence between South Africa and the West, that sanctions against Pretoria must be costly if they are to have any chance of effectiveness. But that, in fact, may be an argument for starting with Uganda. Once Western governments and societies prove willing to apply sanctions against Uganda, at little pain to themselves, it would be politically more difficult for industries and individuals to argue persuasively that comparable measures should not be taken next against South Africa. There is now, in every Western country and certainly within the U.S. Congress, a considerable body of opinion that decries what is held to be an international double standard applied to South Africa: those who fulminate at Pretoria's abuses of human rights, it is said, are too often willing to overlook equally grave violations elsewhere, especially in black Africa. A boycott aimed at Uganda would effectively dispose of these allegations of a double standard—and perhaps neutralize those who make them as politically potent opponents of sanctions against South Africa.

There is, it should be noted, one respect in which the asymmetries of Uganda's international relationships place leverage in the hands of Ida Amin—the vulnerability of the 300 or so Britons, 200 or so Americans, and lesser numbers of other Westerners who still reside in Uganda. Amin has threatened them before. In the face of a boycott, he might carry out his threats. Westerners in Uganda may be divided into three groups. Something over a third are Christian missionaries. (Perhaps 60 percent of the Ugandan population is at least nominally Christian, while ten percent, including Amin and nearly all his inner circle, are Muslims.) The missionaries remain precisely because they hope to alleviate the hardships Ugandans have suffered under Amin. An equal number of the Westerners are either businessmen or specialists of various sorts who serve the regime—pilots, technologists, and the like. They do not feel endangered, and they stay because there are large sums of money to be made. The remainder are a heterogeneous lot, including some dependents of Ugandans. Western governments acknowledged possible dangers to their citizens long ago by warning them to leave Uganda. The United States issued such a warning in 1973, when it closed its embassy in Kampala, and it has frequently been repeated. Each Western resident remains for personal reasons. Clearly their situation should cause concern. But it should not ultimately be a decisive determinant of Western policy.

If Congress mandates a boycott of Uganda's coffee by American importers (not to mention legislating the more drastic sanctions many Congressmen also desire), it should do so with a clear awareness of the larger implications of that action. I would indicate, of course, that the U.S. government is prepared to say that there are boundaries of decency beyond which other governments must not pass in their treatment of their own citizens, and that it will suspend official American assistance to those governments. This, in fact, is consonant with existing American policy, as has already been pointed out. Much more important, it would also indicate that Washington would order private persons and firms under its jurisdiction to cease actions that help those governments maintain themselves in power. And in nearly every instance it is the private sector's role, rather than official aid, that makes a difference. Such a posture could scarely be confined to Uganda alone. Unless Congress were prepared to make it general and, in particular, apply it to South Africa, it would make an absurdity of any larger American policy toward Africa. That is why action against Uganda should be accompanied by economic pressure—not necessarily an embargo, but meaningful economic measures of some sort—against the present South African government.

A boycott against Uganda for its abuses of human rights would also indicate a greater American willingess to depart from the "two-track" separation of economics from politics. There have, of course, been other instances in which Congress has blurred that separation to promote human rights—most notably the so-called Jackson Amendment of 1974, denying most-favored-nation treatment to the exports of countries whose citizens are not allowed freely to emigrate. In practice, however, the Jackson Amendment and similar punitive economic measures have been applied only to the Soviet Union and its allies, countries (especially the Soviet Union) that the United States has long regarded as adversaries on a number of grounds. Human rights violations constitute only one of those grounds, and historically it has not been the most important. By contrast, Uganda can in no sense be regarded as an adversary of the United States—its international role is too unimportant, and its impact on this country too minimal. That is why a boycott of its coffee could represent the application of a genuinely new principle in American foreign relations.

The difficulty, of course, lies not in stating that principle but in translating it into day-to-day policy. Especially, it lies in making the judgment as to which governments have placed themselves beyond acceptable limits of decency in their treatment of their citizens. Since consistency in application over time is an essential characteristic of sound policy—especially in an area as sensitive and as emotion-laden as this one—the criteria for determining whether or not a given government deserves a place on the list of offenders must necessarily be gross and not susceptible to reasonable contradiction. To put it crudely, ordinary garden-variety oppressors—of which, arguably, there are many—would not qualify. Rather, the list would be limited to the most egregious cases, such as regimes that practiced widespread murder or the wholesale forced degradation of their subjects merely on the ascriptive basis of race. The present government of South Africa would clearly qualify under the second criterion, those of Uganda, Cambodia, and Equatorial Guinea, under the first. While it is unlikely that other states will follow South Africa in grounding an entire political structure in racial distinctions, it is all too likely that the state system will see future Ugandas or Cambodias, where extermination—either capricious or in accordance with an elaborate design—becomes an habitual instrument of national policy.

To single out this handful of existing states as deserving of special censure, and special measures, is not to suggest that the human rights performance of other governments—from the Soviet Union to South Korea, from Argentina to Indonesia—should not be an object of considerable American concern, and of American pressure. To apply that pressure, a whole panoply of foreign policy instruments—incentives, protests, public exposure of wrongdoing, denials of aid of various kinds, Jackson Amendment-type restraints on trade—are available and appropriate. But only in the most serious instances should Washington resort to measures as drastic as sweeping economic sanctions whose ultimate objective is to bring about either a total change in a government's domestic policies or else its downfall.

These are measures, it should be noted, that fall far short of war—of the employment of American military forces for coercive purposes. Yet, at the same time, their purpose is one for which states have traditionally employed military force. If the Congress wants to bring down Idi Amin, it might be asked, why not use force to do it? The answer, of course, is that Congress does not wish to expend American lives in order to save Ugandans. That should surprise no one. Some 30 years ago, E. H. Carr observed that in the nineteenth-century European scramble for empire, Great Britain could accomplish without force what lesser economic powers could only achieve with warfare.[2] The observation applies to the United States today. It does not apply to the Soviet Union, which has nothing like the economic leverage the United States has; neither 100 years ago, did it apply to Germany, Britain's rival.

Just as some states are more potent wielders of economic pressure, so some are more vulnerable targets. We have seen that Uganda, by virtue of its dependence on a few buyers of a single crop, is peculiarly vulnerable. South Africa—with a modern, industrialized, energy-consumptive economy—is also vulnerable to economic pressure, but in a different way, and the necessary measures would be much more costly to the states wielding pressure. By contrast, Cambodia under the radically autarchic regime of Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge, would scarcely be vulnerable at all. Vietnam—a small economy itself, of course—had to use military force when it attempted to alter Cambodian conduct. But so would the United States if it wanted to deflect the Phnom Penh regime from a path of barbarism apparently approaching Amin's. One uses—or chooses not to use—the instruments at one's disposal. The fact that economic leverage can be applied only with difficulty against South Africa, and probably not at all against Cambodia, is no argument for not using it against Uganda.

International consciousness of a shared humanity may some day reach a point where supranational authorities or states acting at their command will maintain strike forces—larger versions of the Israeli force that landed an Entebbe or the German force at Mogadishu, each to rescue its own nationals—for use against regimes that brutalize their own citizens. But that day is nowhere in sight. Until it comes, today's prevailing general proscription against the use of military force is best preserved intact. It is a proscription which, by consensus, applies especially to the two superpowers. Although each has flagrantly violated it, it remains a bulwark of a "moderate" international order. American use of military means to save Ugandans or Cambodians from their own governments would violate prevailing norms regarding appropriate conditions for using international force: judged by commonly accepted standards, no "vital" American interests are at stake. And, of course, it would risk counter-intervention by others (conceivably, Moscow on Amin's behalf, Peking on Pol Pot's).

By contrast, the use of economic instruments to promote human rights does not conjure up quite the same images of a system of small-state lambs and predatory superpower wolves. The international economy contains strong incentives that in nearly all cases constrain a giant trading and investing power like the United States to play by the "two-track" GATT rules it was so instrumental in writing. The best assurance for the Senegals or the Bolivias (or other small states that are not egregious offenders against decency) that Washington will not some day use against them the economic leverage it might apply to Uganda is the likelihood that the United States itself would be seriously injured if the use of economic coercion for political purposes became an everyday occurrence. Uganda—and South Africa—would be distinct exceptions, and exceptions often do strengthen rules; those who break rules tend subsequently to observe them precisely in order to underline the uniqueness of the exceptional cases.

In the case of Uganda today, the rules of the system, which separate the "economic" from the "political," work entirely to support the brutal regime of Idi Amin. It is, therefore, incumbent upon others who benefit from the normal working of that system—large states and small ones alike—to take action to assure that it no longer provides Amin with the instruments by which he maintains his grasp on power. If possible, that action should be collective. Its impact, not to speak of its international legitimacy, would be much enhanced. But if efforts to bring about collective action by the international community should fail, the United States—and those other major purchasers of Uganda's crucial coffee crop that elect to follow—should take steps to wield the West's large economic power against, rather than in support of, Idi Amin.●

THE BATTLE OVER U.S. INTELLIGENCE

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at a time when the intelligence services of the United States are receiving undeserved criticism from major sources in the media and uninformed persons, it is timely that a feature appeared in the Air Force magazine of May 1978, entitled "The Battle Over U.S. Intelligence." It is very well done, succinct and to the point, and I would suggest that my colleagues take advantage of this writing and read it. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. The article follows:

THE BATTLE OVER U.S. INTELLIGENCE

(By Bonner Day)

The U.S. intelligence community is in a battle for money and power at a time when its product, vital information about the aims and activities of foreign countries, has never been more in demand.

The struggle is the result of public criticism of intelligence abuses, combined with repeated actions to cut spending and manpower in this critical area.

For the past five years, U.S. intelligence organizations have been buffeted by congressional investigations, damaging publicity, and a series of personnel purges.

All parts of the intelligence community have been affected, including the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Defense Department's National Security Agency, and the other military intelligence services. The Central Intelligence Agency, in its role of coordinator for all national intelligence, has been a principal target.

The latest in a series of shakeups of the intelligence community was ordered by President Carter in January. Next to come is a new intelligence charter, now being studied by the Senate and House, that would set the President's executive order on intelligence into law, after adding a number of congressional twists.

The aim is to mend a badly damaged intelligence network, but the effect has been to set the chiefs of the various intelligence organizations against each other in a heated battle for what remains of intelligence money and authority.

The effect of the criticism and the budget cuts already has been devastating: U.S. agents and analysts have been reduced to a fraction of what they were a decade ago. Numerous intelligence collection operations have been stopped for lack of men and money. Relations with foreign informants and friendly intelligence services have been damaged severely.

Veteran intelligence officers agree that disclosures and investigations, combined with the money pinch, have hurt the intelligence efforts of the U.S. Further, a significant number are convinced that intelligence reports have declined in quantity, timeliness, and accuracy over a period of several years.

Military intelligence officers are particularly disturbed that the frequent reorganizations of the intelligence community have put more authority each time into the hands of a single person—the Director of Central Intelligence—and diminished the military voice in the critical decisions over budgets and intelligence assignments.

For military intelligence organizations, this trend means fewer dollars in the annual budget scramble. More importantly, military intelligence chiefs fear they will have less say over what the agencies under them can collect.

Still, military intelligence officers interviewed by Air Force Magazine are optimistic about the nation's intelligence. They say the increasing use of modern technology for collecting intelligence—particularly satellite photography and electronic listening devices—could make intelligence more accurate than ever before. If the current turbulence within the US intelligence community can be resolved satisfactorily, they predict, the intelligence available to the nation's policymakers will be improving sharply in the years ahead.

The guidelines Congress and the Carter Administration have prepared are designed to provide additional checks on potential abuses by intelligence agencies.

Some military intelligence officers note that while it has been the civilian CIA that has been most criticized for abuses, each new reform has given the Director of Central Intelligence more authority, at the expense of the military intelligence services.

THE NEW RULES

The guidelines Congress and the Carter Administration have prepared are designed to provide additional checks on the activities of intelligence agencies.

President Carter announced his reform in January. In 1971 and 1975, major guidelines were issued during the Nixon and Ford Administrations. Says one military intelligence expert: "Each President seems bent on putting his individual stamp on the intelligence community."

Under President Carter's Executive Order 12036, two committees of the National Security Council—The Special Coordination Committee and the Policy Review Committee—have direct supervision of all US intelligence.

The Coordination Committee, chaired by National Security Affairs Assistant Zbigniew Brzezinski, reviews sensitive intelligence operations, and, for the first time, coordinates all counterintelligence activities.

For the military organizations, this means Defense Secretary Harold Brown will be sharing with the National Security Council authority that he once could delegate to the heads of the military intelligence organizations.

The Coordination Committee includes Vice President Walter F. Mondale, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance, Defense Secretary Brown, Attorney General Griffin Bell, Budget Director James McIntyre, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. George S. Brown, CIA Director Adm. Stansfield Turner, and FBI Director William H. Webster.

The National Security Council's other intelligence body, the Review Committee, examines intelligence operations and approves policies and budgets for the intelligence community. This committee has as chairman Admiral Turner, and as members NSA Assistant Brzezinski, the Vice President, and members of the National Security Council.

Secretary Brown thus will be only one voice on the review committee, when it passes on policies and budgets that have been prepared by Admiral Turner.

The President's order increased the authority of Admiral Turner, as Director of Central Intelligence, over military intelligence organizations, making him responsible for budgeting the entire intelligence community, for assigning intelligence tasks, and for preparing national intelligence reports for the President and the National Security Council.

In recognition of Turner's strengthened hold over military intelligence, Carter's order provides that the authority to assign intelligence tasks can be transferred to the Defense Secretary. Carter has directed Turner and Brown to practice such transfers regularly.

Still, military officers are concerned that units around the world must funnel intelligence requests up to Turner, a time-consuming process that would undercut the traditional authority of military commanders in the field.

Beyond the civilian-military dispute, Carter's order reaffirms the historic ban against assassination that President Ford introduced in Executive Order 11905. The 1947 intelligence charter that organized the US intelligence community after World War II handled this touchy issue differently, by authorizing "any such acts" as might be necessary. Assassination attempts were deemed necessary by administrations during the cold war, the Korea War, and the war in Southeast Asia.

About the ban on assassination, one veteran intelligence officer says: "If Congress had been asked to vote on the assassination of Fidel Castro in the early 1960s, the measure would have passed by at least a two-to-one majority, and the person who introduced the bill would have been given a medal. Now Congress it indignant that such a plan was even being considered."

Under the President's order, Attorney General Bell is responsible for ensuring that intelligence operations comply with the law and for protecting constitutional rights and privacy of US citizens who may be intelligence targets.

As an added precaution, intelligence agencies must answer queries of the Intelligence Oversight Board, which reports directly to the President. Unlike the disbanded Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, which monitored the quality of intelligence for the President, the new oversight board is charged instead with investigating questions of legality or impropriety in intelligence matters.

The three members are former CIA officer Thomas L. Farmer, former Tennessee Sen. Albert A. Gore, and former Pennsylvania Gov. William M. Scranton.

As a third safeguard, at the request of Congress, the President has directed that senior officers of the intelligence community report fully and promptly to the Senate and House intelligence committees.

CONGRESSIONAL REFORMS

The intelligence charter proposed in Congress goes further, with the intent of making into law many of the rules the President has established by executive order. Congress is scheduled to hold hearings this spring on the legislation, which would replace the 1947 and 1949 laws that organized the present intelligence community.

One of the more damaging congressional innovations, in the opinion of veteran intelligence officers, is a ban against payments for intelligence purposes to clergymen, journalists, members of the Peace Corps, and persons in US government-sponsored art, culture, and education programs. Intelligence veterans fear that some persons in every category of foreign travelers will seek to have their categories included in the ban. Even as proposed, they say, the job of the Soviet Union's counterintelligence teams is made much easier.

No such ban exists for Soviet travelers coming to the US. The large number of such travelers has caused FBI and other counterintelligence experts to concede that they no longer have enough agents to watch all those who are suspected of being Soviet agents.

The proposed law also gives the Senate a bigger hand in staffing the CIA and the National Security Agency. The Director, the Deputy Director, and the top assistants in the CIA would have to be confirmed by the Senate. For the first time, the Director and the Deputy of the NSA also would have to be confirmed, and at least one would have to be a civilian.

The Director of Central Intelligence, now Admiral Turner, would be renamed the Director of National Intelligence (DNI) under the proposed changes. He would serve as the chief intelligence officer of the US and as Director of the CIA, as he does now. But, in addition, the President would be given authority to separate the position of DNI and CIA director and appoint two people for the two responsibilites now held by Admiral Turner.

The effect of the proposed legislation would be to give Congress a bigger voice in intelligence activities, and to give the DNI a bigger voice over the defense intelligence organizations.

Military intelligence officers are busy studying the proposed charter in preparation for making final arguments to preserve some of the military's present authority.

As in the Carter order, Turner would prepare a budget for the entire intelligence community and have the authority to add to or subtract from the budget of the individual organizations. This authority would be at the expense of Secretary Brown and his intelligence officers.

The congressional bill makes some detailed restrictions, specifically prohibiting assassination, terrorism, torture, the mass destruction of property, creation of food or water shortages or epidemics, the overthrow of democratic governments, and the support of human rights violations.

Covert activity, in which US agents try to influence events rather than just collect inmation, requires certification by the President under the proposed charter, and congressional intelligence committees must be notified beforehand. The Director of National Intelligence also must report to the committee regularly on all such activity.

Veteran intelligence agents say the new and proposed rules make their work much more difficult. In the future, they say, US intelligence will be much more public and will resort to covert actions very sparingly, if at all.

The principal subjects of both the President's order and the congressional charter are the operations of the Central Intelligence Agency and its Director. But the rest of the intelligence community also is included. Specifically named are the State Department, the Treasury Department, the Defense Department's Defense Intelligence Agency and National Security Agency, the Department of Energy, the FBI, and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Military officers repeatedly make the point that the reforms are designed to correct CIA abuses, principally, but that the practical effect is to give the Director of the CIA even more authority. The additional authority comes, they say, at the expense of military intelligence organizations that have been relatively free of scandal.

DAMAGING PUBLICITY

Veteran officers say they are concerned about the effect of public disclosures on future operations, rather than who is to blame for the past.

In his book, Secret Missions, retired Army Lt. Gen. Vernon A. Walters, a former CIA deputy director writes: "During the great investigations into the United States intelligence community, I had occasion to talk to many chiefs of foreign intelligence services, friendly and otherwise. Damage was done to us not by the enemy, but by a distorted sense of national guilt cleverly exploited by those hostile to us. Many of these chiefs of foreign services were appalled at the spectacle of the United States dragging into public view not just dubious actions, but many of the sources and methods by which we worked."

Veteran intelligence officers say the recent congressional investigations, the open statements of former and current CIA Directors William Colby and Admiral Turner, and the release of intelligence documents through the use of the Freedom of Information law have seriously damaged operations abroad.

Intelligence veterans report that sources are refusing to meet with CIA agents abroad, for fear their names later will appear in public. In some cities, military agents have picked up the slack.

Further, the threat of lawsuits for excessive government censorship has caused the release of sensitive information through the Freedom of Information law. One intelligence agent complained to superiors that his identity and activities, as well as the identity of a close relative living abroad, had been released to foreigners without his knowledge or consent.

Says one veteran agent: "The direct effect of the publication of names is small compared with how it affects the willingness of ordinary Americans and foreigners to walk into an American embassy voluntarily with useful information."

The result has been that many intelligence offices abroad, assigned to gather intelligence, have been closed and the agents sent home for lack of business.

Intelligence reports have suffered. US government sources say when the Cubans went into Angola and later into Ethiopia, many of the details were poorly reported or relayed too late to help American policymakers. Other lapses have been reported in Asia and South America.

POLITICAL PRESSURES

US intelligence experts also are critical of the growing pressure from the White House to slant intelligence for political purposes. An increasing amount of information, other intelligence officers say, is held secret to prevent blunders of government officials from being made public.

In one of the more notorious cases, according to General Walters, he was asked as CIA deputy director to impede the Watergate investigation and to pay salaries to the Watergate burglars while they were in jail. Commenting on later being awarded the Distinguished Intelligence Medal, General Walters writes: "The citation recognized that I had resisted great pressures on me and by so doing had avoided even more serious consequences for the Agency."

Traditionally, the Defense intelligence voice has been independent and made policymakers at least hesitate before bending intelligence reports to fit policy objectives. This independence has been trimmed, however, by repeated reorganizations. Now military officers are concerned that the latest changes will silence the military voice entirely.

The restraints are already tight. Dr. James Schlesinger, while Defense Secretary, was unable to get the CIA to clear space satellite photos for a congressional committee. He had to order U–2 spy plane flights so Congress could get photos of Soviet missiles in Somalia.

Military officers are studying whether, under the latest guidelines, a Defense Secretary would have the same authority.

Says one source: "In most cases, it is politics rather than national security that causes an intelligence report to be kept secret."

SAVING FEDERAL DOLLARS

The manpower cuts in the intelligence community have been explained as a normal process following a buildup for the war in Southeast Asia. But CIA veterans say privately that that explanation is misleading, that the agency shifted personnel without raising total levels significantly, that there really was no buildup for the war, and that the cutbacks are at the sacrifice of essential and sometimes critical intelligence activities.

In the military services, the situation is different. During the war, there was a heavy demand for tactical intelligence that stripped other intelligence functions of trained operatives.

Military men saw their jobs eliminated after the crisis, and were transferred to other duties. Defense civilians were retired or dismissed in annual budget cuts to levels far below those before the war began.

The real push behind the manpower cuts is the evergrowing cost of satellites, photography, and electronic sensors, combined with the demand of budget officers from the White House to cut spending.

Most intelligence organizations, as a result, have cut manpower ceilings fifty percent or more from pre-Vietnam War years.

Top intelligence officials, with some exceptions, say the constant trimming has caused the quality of intelligence to deteriorate. Says one veteran intelligence official: "There is a growing notion that you can get along without spies and that space satellites can take care of all intelligence collection."

The growth of intelligence from machines has caused more than budget problems, however. Because the cost of collecting photos is so enormous, the results cannot be neglected. So as intelligence agencies pour more people into processing them, they have fewer agents for other intelligence gathering. According to one source: "Much of the critical intelligence from other sources has been neglected in recent years. US intelligence has come to rely on what it can count, and has disregarded much of the intelligence that cannot be measured."

Most of the extensive gadgetry is in the Defense budget, which has resulted in a deceiving increase in military spending for intelligence. The increase, say military officers, has gone directly to buy and operate machinery, while manpower cuts have continued.

Within the Defense Department is the National Reconnaissance Office (NRO), which has the mission of coordinating reconnaissance conducted by spy satellites and the SR–71 reconnaissance plane, the successor to the U–2.

The Air Force runs the NRO, spending almost a quarter of the nation's entire intelligence budget. Another big bite of the intelligence budget goes to the National Security Agency for electronic intelligence, including foreign military radio, microwave, telex, and telephone traffic. NSA is responsible for listening posts around the world, and also uses ships and aircraft for its collection of electronic intelligence.

The focus on machines has raised criticism. Retired Army Lt. Gen. Daniel Graham, former DIA chief and a one-time top assistant in the CIA, says: "In staring at the results of technical intelligence, we lost sight of the total picture, which includes military doctrine and strategy; I include myself in this criticism."

General Graham, while retired, was a member of "Team B," part of an intelligence exercise in which a team of nongovernment foreign affairs experts examined available intelligence and came up with a different, more pessimistic conclusion about the Soviet Union's military trends from that of the government's "Team A."

Graham says there might be enough agents to go around if the CIA stopped duplicating the efforts of the Defense Department and concentrated its activities on the analysis of nonmilitary intelligence.

The CIA's expansion into military intelligence, brought about partly by satellite photography, has been a source of embarrassment. In one CIA paper on a country's aircraft strength, it was noted that forty planes were in Iran and speculated that they must be there either for maneuvers or on some form of loan to the Iranian government. This caused some concern in government circles until an investigation revealed that the CIA paper itself was based on a military paper that used a standard military abbreviation, IRAN, for Inspection and Repair As Necessary. When the error was discovered, the CIA ordered all copies of the report destroyed.

Though money and missions long have been a problem to the intelligence community, morale is the principal concern today. The public abuse, combined with a steady stream of dismissals, has brought the intelligence community, particularly the CIA, to a new low. This has led a surprising number of veteran intelligence officers to conclude that some members of the US intelligence community may become susceptible to recruitment by the Soviet Union.

One former top official says: "I once never thought about the danger of a CIA agent becoming a double agent. Now, because of the treatment they have received, I wouldn't be surprised."

Jack Maury, a former top CIA official, is more optimistic: "It is remarkable that over the past quarter century there have been well over 50,000 employees of the CIA and of that number only three or four . . . for reasons of pride, profit, or treachery have seen fit to reveal information, with the result and apparent purpose of seriously endangering the effectiveness of the CIA."

POWER STRUGGLES

The civilian and military intelligence services have long battled. But in the past the struggle was focused on intelligence estimates. Now, the frequent changes of intelligence chiefs and the manpower cuts in the intelligence community have caused the battle for money, missions, and influence to escalate to the point where morale and the quality of intelligence has been affected.

Admiral Turner is the subject of most of the complaints, both from civilian and military intelligence officers. Says one CIA veteran: "Turner's firings have caused us to lose continuity, one of the most important factors in dealing with agents."

One top military officer says: "The manner of the firings was absolutely inexcusable and could not have been done more badly. He is letting good men go that other agencies would be glad to have, if they had the money to hire them."

In the face of these criticisms, Admiral Turner still seems a victor in the bureaucracy battle. He is conceded to be the most influential director in the history of the CIA. Says one official: "He meets with the President one and two times a week, more than any previous director."

TOMORROW'S INTELLIGENCE

Despite the current turbulence, there are some trends that point to improved intelligence.

Intelligence, at an increasing rate, is being declassified and converted into everyday language so that more people, particularly in military units, can understand and use it. More overseas military commands, for example, now are given daily reports on the movement of antiaircraft launchers and other selected weapons in the Soviet Union.

Improvements are being made in satellites, photography, and electronic sensors. Computers, already used extensively in Stateside headquarters, are now being used more and more at overseas bases.

But there are also many signs that disturb intelligence experts. The move to centralize intelligence under the direction of one man, Admiral Turner, upsets many who fear one intelligence voice increases the chances for error and miscalculation.

The danger of intelligence being used for political purposes is greater with the rise of the CIA over the military intelligence organizations.

The intelligence community has been losing senior, experienced analysts at an alarming rate, before replacements can be trained.

Overall, there have been continued manpower cuts since the Vietnam War, while the volume of intelligence requests has increased dramatically.

For veteran intelligence officers, there is no question that US intelligence has been hurt, or that it must be strengthened. General Walters speaks for many in his memoirs:

"Our position of strength in the world is changing, not necessarily for the better. This calls for more vigilance on our part than ever before."

AIR FORCE INTELLIGENCE—SHRINKING IN SIZE

The Air Force Intelligence Service, like the rest of the nation's intelligence organizations, has seen its strength cut sharply in recent years.

Maj. Gen. James L. Brown, USAF Assistant Chief of Staff/Intelligence and Commander of the Air Force Intelligence Service (AFIS), today head a force of 13,500. This total is forty-one percent smaller than the 23,000 officers, enlisted personnel, and civilians who were in AFIS as recently as 1970.

AFIS experienced a ten percent cut in manpower in 1972. This year it will complete a further reduction of twenty-five percent spread over four years.

Even with the cuts, however, the Air Force remains at the forefront of the nation's intelligence-gathering activities. Air Force personnel directed satellites, reconnaissance planes, and listening posts around the world.

Approximately sixty percent of AFIS personnel are overseas. A major concentration of intelligence people is at USAFE Headquarters at Ramstein AB, Germany. From this headquarters, Air Force intelligence operatives are sent throughout Europe. In the Pacific, significant numbers of the intelligence personnel are controlled from PACAF Headquarters at Hickam AFB, Hawaii, and subordinate commands in Korea and Japan.

About ten percent of the total Air Force Intelligence Service is located in Washington, D. C., assigned to the Defense Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency, or the U.S. Air Force Intelligence Headquarters. The remainder are assigned to air bases across the US or on special assignment in the US or abroad.

Despite a cutback in manpower, Air Force officials say the opportunities for men and women are excellent in the Intelligence Service. Much of what AFIS employees do involves top-secret sensors that can measure nuclear explosions, detect missile launches, and even count troops on the march at night. Employed are the latest techniques in satellites, aircraft, pilotless aircraft, photography, and electronic monitoring. Human agents, less conspicuous, are also used.

Air Force intelligence specialists assigned to air units brief and debrief aircrews. Experts in Russian and other languages translate and analyze foreign publications, documents, and intercepted foreign communications. Teams of specialists translate and interpret photos, radar prints, and other technical data into reports that can be read and understood by policymakers. Engineers and other technical experts search foreign defenses and weapons for weaknesses and vulnerabilities. Analysts compile intelligence from the Air Force and the nation's other intelligence organizations for special studies and comprehensive assessments on aviation, space, and foreign targets.

Though seldom brought to public notice, the Air Force Intelligence Service has produced some of the nation's most respected intelligence officers. Veterans of the Intelligence Service include Air Force Lt. Gen. Eugene F. Tighe, Jr., a career intelligence officer who was USAF's Intelligence Chief from January to September 1977 and is presently Director of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

Another veteran, Maj. Gen. George J. Keegan, Air Force Assistant Chief of Staff for Intelligence from 1972 to 1976, is credited with a number of intelligence achievements. Studies under his direction proved conclusively the intercontinental range of the Soviet Backfire bomber, in the face of now-discredited arguments from other intelligence organizations. General Keegan, now retired, also sponsored a massive study of the Soviet Union's civil defenses. In 1973, he initiated a series of translations of significant Soviet military writings under the title, Soviet Military Thought, that are widely used by colleges and universities throughout the U.S. as well as in foreign countries.

The present director of the Intelligence Service, General Brown, is a twenty-year veteran of intelligence assignments. He was appointed in September 1977.

A description of the Intelligence Service's responsibilities is provided on p. 96.●

THE BOSTON GLOBE ON TAX CREDITS, NOT TAX DEDUCTIONS, FOR CHARITY

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, during the recent Senate recess for Memorial Day, an excellent editorial appeared in the Boston Globe on the current debate in Congress over pending proposals for additional tax incentives to encourage charitable contributions.

The editorial recognizes the fact that the increasing use of the standard deduction in recent years has brought about a corresponding decline in the utilization of the charitable deduction. Since the charitable deduction is available only to those who itemize their deductions, not to those who use the standard deduction, fewer and fewer taxpayers—especially in low- and middle-income groups—are now in a position to derive any benefit from the charitable deduction.

While recognizing this problem, the editorial also takes strong exception to current proposals to provide a remedy by allowing taxpayers to receive both the charitable deduction and the standard deduction. A far more preferable remedy, as the editorial points out, would be to offer a tax credit, rather than a tax deduction, for charitable contributions, in order to avoid the extreme inequities that come into play when deductions are used.

In almost all areas in recent years, Congress has turned away from the use of tax deductions and opted for the use of tax credits in cases where tax incentives are thought to be desirable and effective means of providing Federal subsidies. The Globe editorial argues eloquently in favor of this trend and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

[From the Boston Globe, May 30, 1978]

GETTING CREDIT FOR CHARITY

In one form or another, the refrain that "of course, your contribution is tax deductible" is included in every charitable organization's pitch for donations. In fact, however, fewer and fewer Americans reap any benefit from the tax code's deduction provisions here. As a result, contributions to charity are declining and America's vaunted support of "voluntary associations" that perform good deeds is fading.

Few would deny the importance of sustaining a broad range of charitable organizations to foster medical research, to provide youth recreation and social services, and to provide all types of specialized educational offerings. Yet, the spokesmen for such organizations argue, increases in the "standard deduction" have eliminated the value of the tax advantage of giving to charity for most taxpayers.

In 1970, 52 percent of taxpayers took the standard deduction; in 1977 the figure was 77 percent; and, if tax simplification proposals now being advanced by the Carter Administration are adopted, the proportion is expected to rise to 84 percent.

Simplification of the tax system is a worthy goal but clearly the charities have a complaint. They also propose a remedy—allowing even those taxpayers who utilize the "standard deduction" to deduct charitable donations from their income when computing their taxes.

On its face, it's a sensible proposal. But it contradicts one of the most laudable themes of the tax reform movement. That is the effort to get away from tax deductions and substitute tax credits.

When a charitable donation is made, and a deduction claimed, the donor is, in part, giving what would otherwise have been tax money to the charity. A wealthy person in the 70 percent tax bracket who donates $1 million for a new college gym is, in effect, giving up $300,000 to the college and transferring $700,000 of what would have been government money to the school. At the bottom end of the income scale, a person in the 14 percent tax bracket who gives $100 to a church is giving up $86 and transferring $14 of what would have been government money to the church.

There is something very appealing—one is tempted to say very American—about this system of the individual personally directing the flow of some "government" dollars. Yet a substantial question remains. Why should the wealthy person be able by spending $3 to direct the flow of $7 that would otherwise have gone to the government while a less affluent individual has to spend $8.60 to influence the allocation of $1.40.

This inequity could be rectified, while maintaining the tax incentive for most charitable giving, if those using the "standard deduction" were allowed to take a flat tax credit equal to, say, 25 or 30 percent of charitable gifts when computing their tax liability.

A tax credit is deducted directly from the tax payment rather than the income on which the tax is computed. Thus, the man giving $1 million to his college would be able to deduct $250,000 or $300,000 from his tax liability. The person donating $100 to a church could deduct $25 or $30. Properly designed the revenue loss to the government would be the same as with the system of deductions. But each charitable giver would be leveraging the same percentage of "government" funds with his charitable gift.

The use of credits would actually enhance the tax incentive for charitable giving for most taxpayers. Yet, unquestionably, those institutions that count on very large gifts from wealthy donors would be hurt and would have to seek more diverse sources of funds.

However, the net effect of changing the tax code to permit tax credits for charitable giving would be once again to implant a financial incentive for giving by all taxpayers and quite likely broaden the support for the "voluntary associations" which are so much a part of the nation's history.●

THE MIDEAST ARMS SALES

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, today's Washington Post carries an interesting piece by the distinguished New York attorney, Rita Hauser, relative to the recent arms sale in the Middle East.

I ask that this thoughtful piece be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE JET DEAL: WE FAILED TO USE OUR LEVERAGE

(By Rita E. Hauser)

Now that the sound and fury over the sale of warplanes to Israel and Saudi Arabia has subsided, it is obvious that that was one battle the American people could have been spared. Yet, as has so often been true of President Carter's quest for peace in the Middle East, the administration had the germ of a good idea that was diminished by its poor tactics and its failure to place the matter in the proper context.

The United States and Saudi Arabia have been moving toward a unique relationship since the 1973 war. With arms and patronage, Washington is affording the Saudis the protection they need from radical states allied with the Soviet Union. By turning to the United States, the Saudis are making plain where they stand in global politics.

This unfolding relationship need not be advanced at the expense of American ties with Israel. To the contrary, the building of a military alliance between Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Iran, one based on their common interest in deterring Soviet power, should be the explicit aim of U.S. policy.

The sale of F15s could have been the occasion for the United States to announce its intent to develop such a common strategy. Instead, it degenerated into bickering over the power of the "Jewish lobby," and a battle of wills on the Hill. The president failed to clarify the contours of a sound policy.

To overcome Israel's fears about the sale, fears grounded in stategic considerations and a deeper worry that the Arabs are gaining political influence with Washington at Saudi expense, the United States should have insisted that the Saudis commit themselves finally and publicly to the peace process begun by President Sadat six months ago. For Saudi Arabia has not given open and unequivocal support to the Egyptian goal: a de facto peace between Israel and Egypt in which Jordan and Syria would probably later concur. That, rather than the vague and probably meaningless pledge by the Saudis not to use the F15s for offensive purposes, was the counterpart Carter should have sought. The chance to use arms for peace, in an explicit fashion, was lost.

Instead, the administration insisted it needed the Saudi sale to maintain leverage with the Wahabi Kingdom. But planes are not the real leverage, since other suppliers would take Saudi orders. The dynamic of the U.S.-Saudi relationship lies in the strong need for that Persian Gulf nation to reside within the American military protective orbit and thus to acquire influence in the development of U.S. policy for the broad Middle East area.

Moreover, Saudi Arabia's enormous wealth can cycle safely only through the United States. A hugh credit balance tilts the underlying strength to the debtor. The fear of many in Washington that the Saudis must be wooed lest they park their money elsewhere is groundless, for there is no other secure haven. So, too, oil: In the near future, at least, oil prices will be determined not by OPEC but by the glut in the world market. In short, the United States has the net balance of strength in the U.S.-Saudi equation, and should not hesitate to use it to foster a meaningful coming together of Egypt and Israel and the beginning of a real—rather than an apparent—peace process.

Would the Saudis respond to American pressure to aid the faltering Sadat initiative? The Saudis surely fear the prospect of another Mideast war in which, especially after the sale of the F15s, their oil fields would likely become a target. An Egyptian-Israeli peace would head off that prospect. But, in a peace, other Arab states might then turn their attention to Saudi Arabia, a bigger and more important prize than Israel by any measure.

A realistic Saudi strategy, one perhaps already in place, would be to forge an American and thus an indirect Israeli connection to prevent all-out war in the area but, at the same time, to support the PLO financially to keep the guerrillas alive and nipping at Israel from bases in Lebanon. That would tie down the Syrian army and preclude major subversion in the Gulf. The icing on the cake consists of building up a powerful military force to fend off local adventurers.

That is why Saudis may fear committing themselves to a full Israeli-Egyptian rapproachment. They are better off with a tepid Sadat-Begin love affair that freezes the status quo and permits the Saudis to gain strength at home.

The true test of American diplomacy is to persuade the Saudis, and not just the Israelis, to take risks for peace. In exchange, the United States would lead the way to an alliance of Mideast states desiring to safeguard the region from Russian incursion. Israel is central to such an alliance. An astute administration would seek not to break the "Jewish lobby" but to reorient strategy in light of current political realities.

The game unfolding in the Middle East is bigger than the immediate Arab-Israeli conflict. The Israelis did not, in recent months, always give evidence they were aware of geopolitical changes that have occurred since 1973. Or, if they were aware, they may have permitted their fears to overcome their wits in pushing a battle in the Senate that could not be won. But, then, neither did the White House show any sign of a mature political analysis. Unlike Israel, it did not have the excuse of fear.●

FINE LINE OR BOTTOM LINE?

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as we all know, the President is Commander in Chief of the Nation's armed services and is fully authorized to exercise civilian control over the military. Just how he does this is sometimes open to question although it cannot be disputed that he has the absolute right.

In my own opinion, there are times when our military leaders should speak out for what they believe is correct—even if this runs counter to the policy of his Commander in Chief and even though it may draw some disciplinary action.

The example of Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub who was forced to retire after voicing public criticism of the President's defense policies is a case in point. On this much debated question, the Lubbock, Tex., Avalanche Journal recently had an interesting editorial on the Singlaub case entitled "Fine Line or Bottom Line?" which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

FINE LINE OR BOTTOM LINE?

Although there have been times when the Constitutional balance between civilian control and military expertise have clashed, throughout most of the nation's history, fortunately the clashes have been academic or resolved in a satisfactory manner.

In brief, the President of the United States indeed is the Commander In Chief of the nation's armed forces, and as such retains final control over them.

This, to a certain extent, also applies to high ranking personnel of the armed services, their decisions, actions and comments, political or military.

But in an era of increasing outspoken opinions, it has been no surprise that there are those in the military who disagree with decisions reached at the civilian level.

One of the more "recent" classic examples of course, was the head-on confrontation between then President Harry S Truman and Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

And while there were those who still feel Gen. MacArthur should have been left to run the war—even if it meant chasing the Red Chinese back across the Yalu River in North Korea, the final decision rightly rested with Mr. Truman.

Since then, the U.S. has fought a controversial war in Vietnam and lost, mostly—military men and many others claim—because "civilian politicians" got into the act and fought the conflict on a "political" basis rather than on sound military principles.

Now, we have another "confrontation" of sorts. Maj. Gen. John K. Singlaub, after twice running into President Carter's policies and publicly criticizing them, is "voluntarily" leaving the service.

Army officials last week ordered Gen. Singlaub to fly to Washington after he blasted Carter's decision not to produce the neutron warhead and had disagreed publicly with the Panama Canal treaties.

A year ago, it was Gen. Singlaub who was called to the White House for a face-to-face meeting with Carter after the general had criticized the President's decision to withdraw U.S. ground forces from Korea. At the time, Singlaub was chief of staff of U.S. forces in Korea and later was reassigned to his post at the Army Forces Command headquarters in Fort McPherson, Ga.

The General is muchly decorated, a combat veteran of World War II, Korea and Vietnam. He is 56 years old and has completed more than 35 years of military service. As such, he is no novice or upstart.

And while we subscribe fully to the Constitutional concept that there must be civilian control over the military's actions, there is a question in our mind at what point that "civilian control" should completely muzzle opinions or thoughts by competent military leaders.

The fine line, we think, may come where the civilian judgment, in the opinion of the military, jeopardizes both the military and the nation.

At that point, the military as now set up, must risk the wrath of the President, or the Pentagon, by speaking out. Unfortunately, it may be a case sometimes of attempting to save the nation and destroying a career.●

COMMONSENSE ABOUT ENERGY

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, despite increasingly higher prices for conventional finite energy resources and the Nation's balance of trade deficit, predicated in part on increased fuel imports, we have not begun to realize the potential of energy conservation and alternative energy technologies. While the lack of fully implemented conservation and alternative energy strategies have a number of separate and distinct causes, they both suffer severe public relations problems. Conservation, to many minds, means curtailment which is subsequently associated with substantial lifestyle adjustments generally reducing the overall quality of living. On the other hand, while it is difficult to find anyone who is opposed to renewable energy resources in principle, it is common for the public to perceive solar energy as a nice idea which may be feasible several generations in the future. Essentially, many people believe these strategies offer few practical solutions. In his article, "Common Sense about Energy," Steven Schneider states:

If conservation suggests the coming of the dark age, then alternative energy suggests the millennium.

Today, with the "oil glut" and temporary relief from Canada on the natural gas question, the people no longer believe that the energy crisis demands the moral equivalent of war. Their reasoning, in part, is justified. The world is not about to run out of oil today or tomorrow as some suggest. However, the public policy issues that must be addressed here do not concern the time when the last drop of our conventional fuels have been severed from the ground. The impact of depletion of our energy resources on the standard of living becomes evident and unbearable long before such resources are gone. Prices increase and the resulting inflation will reduce the purchasing capacity of our citizens and pose severe hardships on the millions of individuals living on fixed incomes.

The public's reasoning is also justified on the grounds that the administration and Congress have not been able to enact the stated goals of the national energy plan; and perhaps more importantly, the goals of the plan do not adequately reflect the needs of the Nation. The fact that the administration has neglected to take appropriate initiatives with regard to the development of renewable energy resources demonstrates another major facet of the "public relations problems" discussed earlier. The administration is only beginning to study relationships between energy technologies and other facets of the Nation's economy. It would seem particularly imperative that we undertake major Federal initiatives in solar energy and conservation as those technologies have been shown to be considerably more labor intensive than conventional technologies. In light of the administration's support of full employment goals, their lack of substantive initiative is confusing to say the least, and may discredit these technologies in the public eye.

Mr. President, I ask that an excellent article, "Less is More: Conservation and Renewable Energy," by Steven Schneider, that appeared in the March–April issue of Working Papers, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

LESS IS MORE: CONSERVATION AND RENEWABLE ENERGY

"The phrase 'energy conservation,' like the term 'budgeting,' has a certain ring of asceticism to it," wrote Columbia University professor Lloyd J. Dumas not long ago. "It conjures up images of working by candle-light, shivering in the cold, and bumping along the streets in a dirty, overcrowded bus."

The notion of "alternative" or "renewable" energy sources conjures up quite a different image, but it also suffers a public relations problem. It is hard to find anyone who is against solar energy, windmills, or any of the half-dozen other ways people might find to utilize the energy flows of nature. But it is easy to find people who believe that solar power is an impossible dream, that geothermal energy is best confined to entertaining tourists at Yellowstone, and that windmills are the province of a few half-crazed back-to-the-landers who eat granola for breakfast. If conservation suggests the coming dark age, then alternative energy suggests the millennium. To many, the chance that either one will help solve our energy problems seems slim.

President Carter's proposed energy plan—even its original form, let alone the half-cooked compromise emerging from Congress—reflected this "realistic" approach to energy policy. The plan was touted as fostering conservation. Yet its original projections depended on conservation measures to reduce overall energy demand only 4 percent from what it would otherwise be in 1985. Domestic energy supplies, by contrast, were expected to expand some 20 percent.

Alternative energy sources also got short shrift. If the administration's original projections were realized, the use of solar energy would increase, but it still would account for only 1.5 percent of the growth in energy demand projected for 1985. This year the government will spend $224 million on research into solar electric power, with another $96 million going into solar heating and cooling research. For comparison, the nuclear program is getting $1.67 billion in federal research and development money.

It is true, as I argued in Part One of this essay ("Where Has All the Oil Gone?" Working Papers, January/February 1978), that the world is not about to run out of oil—and that ways should be found to tap the reserves that the big companies have so far shown themselves unwilling to produce. It is also true that oil and gas, even coal, will not last forever. Anthropologist Marvin Harris recently wrote, "The real question is not when the last drop of oil is gone, nor is it when the last ton of coal will be mined."

"The effect of [resource] depletion on the standard of living becomes unbearable long before the last blade of grass or the last horse or reindeer is gone. . . . As coal and oil become scarcer, their costs will go up. And since virtually every product or service in industrial society depends on large energetic inputs derived from these sources, inflation will steadily reduce the ability of the average person to pay for the goods and services now regarded as essential for health and well-being.

"How fast and how low standards of living in the industrial nations will fall depends on how long conversion to alternative energy sources is delayed."

In addition to stretching out our supplies of fossil fuels, conservation and renewable energy sources have other advantages. They do less damage to the environment than conventional sources. They are frequently cheaper, and are likely to become more so. They are more labor intensive, and their development is thus likely to have a favorable impact on employment. And they are the only energy options not currently dominated by the big energy corporations.

Right now, saving energy is cheaper than producing more of it. The cost savings are particularly significant when the environmental and public-health damage done by fossil fuels is taken into account. But even in pure economic terms, as Business Week reported, "An investment in conservation is far cheaper these days than almost any investment in new supplies."

"Except in the Mideast, where oil production costs remain extremely low, most new oil or gas wells require a capital investment of $4.5 billion for every quadrillion BTUs of energy ("quads" in energy lingo) that they yield each year. Synthetic oil and gas from coal would probably cost more than $10 billion per quad. New electric power plants range anywhere from $45 billion per quad for coal to nearly $90 billion for nuclear.

"By contrast, an investment in capital equipment to save the equivalent amount of energy is often less than $1.5 billion per quad of energy saved each year—and is sometimes zero." [1]

If conservation is so economical, why don't we have more of it? One reason is that people often seek to minimize the initial cost of a purchase (whether an appliance or a house) rather than the item's life-cycle cost. Another reason is that consumers often have more trouble coming up with the cash for an investment in energy conservation than utilities have in coming up with the funds to supply more power. Finally, again according to Business Week, "Plant managers generally look for a fifteen percent return on investment in their product lines, but they typically demand a return of thirty percent or more on discretionary investments, including those on energy saving equipment."

A serious push for conservation will thus require even greater changes in energy prices than have already occurred. That fact is well appreciated in the corridors of power: hence all the wrangling over price controls, new taxes, and the like. Conservation will also require changes in some of our institutional arrangements. That fact, as yet, may be less appreciated.

For years, the ready availability of low-cost oil and natural gas meant that buildings, machinery, and means of transportation were designed with little regard for energy efficiency. One-third of America's housing has no insulation at all. According to a study by the American Institute of Architects (AIA), between 25 and 50 percent of energy used in older buildings—and up to 80 percent of energy used in newer ones—is wasted. In 1973, U.S. cars weighed an average of 4,275 lbs. If they had weighed 2,500 lbs. instead, they would have used 30 to 40 percent less fuel.[2]

The possibilities for saving energy through conservation are therefore substantial. A Congressional Budget Office study stated that insulation and related improvements could save 35 percent of the energy used to heat a typical home. The AIA estimates that by 1990, 12.5 million barrels of oil a day—the equivalent of roughly one-third of our current energy use—could be saved by installing energy-efficient systems in both new and old buildings. According to administration figures, simply adding one passenger each to 40 percent of commuting cars—and thereby reducing the number of cars on the road—would save about 400,000 barrels of oil a day, or about 2.5 percent of total oil consumption.

Measures that seek to encourage conservation are ordinarily of two sorts. One strategy is to require changes in the way buildings are built, the ways people and goods are moved, and the ways energy is used in industrial production. The other is deliberately to raise the price of fuels and electricity (or allow them to rise as the market dictates), thereby giving people an economic incentive to use less.

In the long run, a nation's use of energy will depend heavily on its price. Since World War II, for example, countries where fuel is expensive relative to everything else (West Germany, France, Japan, and Sweden) have used only about half as much energy per unit of GNP as nations with low fuel costs (the United States, the United Kingdom, Norway, and Canada). In Sweden, primary fuels in the early 1970s cost about 37 percent more than in the United States, and Swedish industry used about 35 percent less fuel per capita than American industry. But electricity in Sweden was 18 percent cheaper, and industrial consumption of electricity per capita was 26 percent greater than in the United States.

In the short run, however, the effect of price increases on energy use is less than is commonly supposed. Following the Arab oil embargo, gasoline prices rose from an average of 40 cents a gallon (October 1973) to more than 62 cents a gallon in 1977. Despite this price increase, consumption rose from 6.7 million barrels of gasoline a day in 1973 to a record level of 7.1 million barrels in 1977. Nor has any other country achieved commensurate reductions in gasoline consumption by increasing gasoline prices. Between October 1973 and January 1977, West Germany boosted gasoline prices from $1.12 to $1.44 per gallon, and France raised them from $.95 to $1.59; but in both countries gasoline consumption declined to only about 6 percent. In the United States it is estimated that a 10 percent increase in the price of gasoline would initially reduce consumption by only 1 percent. Over several years consumption might fall by 2 or 3 percent, still a modest savings relative to the price hike.[3]

There are good reasons for drivers' reluctance to cut back on car use. Many find it difficult or impossible to reduce their driving simply because they have no other way of getting to work or to shopping areas. Fuel accounts for less than a fifth of the total cost of owning a car (18.4 percent for a standard-size automobile and 14.3 percent for a subcompact, according to Department of Transportation figures for 1976). So increases in the price of fuel alone won't do much to change behavior.

A combination of price hikes, regulations, transportation alternatives, and long-term planning, however, can significantly change transportation patterns. Long before the rising price of OPEC oil intensified pressure for energy conservation in the United States, Sweden slapped a 50 cents per gallon tax on gasoline to keep prices up, and taxed new cars between $500 and $900 depending on size. The Swedes also have maintained a rapid, efficient system of public transportation. According to a recent study, Swedish automobiles in 1971 averaged 2,400 lbs. (60 percent of the American figure), and people used private cars for roughly 55 percent of their trips below six miles (as compared with 90 percent in the United States).

For the Swedish strategy to be even partially effective in this country—which is both larger and less densely populated—American systems of public transportation need to be improved and expanded. Again, higher energy prices alone will not induce many travelers to switch from cars to more energy-efficient forms of transportation; despite the increase in gasoline prices, riders on mass transit systems have increased by only about 3 percent since 1971.

The main reason that public transportation does not attract more riders is that it is slow and uncomfortable. When the traveler's time is counted as part of the cost of using public transportation, mass transit's apparent cheapness relative to the automobile disappears. Evaluating the cost of the traveler's time near the average wage rate of $5 per hour in 1975, the Department of Transportation found that roughly three-quarters of the total cost of both an automobile and a bus varies in proportion to speed. Because the automobile is, on the average, 1.7 times as fast as the bus, it ends up being 75 percent cheaper per passenger mile. Inducing people to ride the bus, therefore, will require express bus lanes, more comfortable vehicles, a more extensive network of routes and, correspondingly, high public investment.

Yet even such inducements, in the short term at least, can go only so far. Cities built during the era of cheap oil are simply too dispersed for the kinds of mass transit systems found in Sweden. And heavy rail systems for intraurban travel (San Francisco's BART, for example) will not save energy in most American cities. In the long run, saving energy on transportation—and freeing the United States of its addiction to the automobile—will require more compact housing patterns. "Thanks from Jimmy Carter" signs in buses will not do the trick. Neither will gimmicks like the standby gasoline tax that Carter proposed and Congress rejected.

In the meantime, we need to continue boosting automobile fuel efficiency. Current federal regulations require automobile manufacturers to increase the average efficiency of their cars to 27.5 miles per gallon by 1985. In addition, Carter has proposed (and at this writing the House-Senate conferees have provisionally accepted) a tax on new cars whose fuel consumption is relatively high.[4]

Making intercity transport more efficient will require a massive infusion of capital into America's railroad system, which suffers from decades of neglect. If U.S. metroliners, for example, could operate at the 160 miles per hour they were designed for, they would be the fastest way of getting from Manhattan to downtown Washington, and would utilize about one-fourth as much energy per passenger as an airplane making the same trip. Yet because track conditions are poor, the metroliner cannot exceed 95 mph.

In general, a well-built system of railroads would be the fastest, safest, and most energy-efficient way of getting from one downtown area to another when the distance between the two is less than 500 miles. Despite this fact, U.S. policy toward the railroads is half-hearted. On the one hand, the federal government is spending $1.75 billion to upgrade the Northeast Corridor rail system. On the other hand, Congress has cut Amtrak's annual request for capital funds by two-thirds in each of the last three years, and has reduced its operating budget as well. Congress is thus forcing Amtrak to order both cutbacks in service and increases in fares, two classic ways of reducing ridership. And it is doing so despite the fact that since Amtrak's first full year of operation (1972) the agency has boosted annual ridership from 16.6 million to a record 19.2 million, reversing the decline in passenger service that plagued the private railroad system. Amtrak currently has a $4.5 billion five-year plan before Congres. The plan, which merits support, seeks new high-speed passenger train corridors and equipment.

In the residential and commercial heating sector, higher prices will encourage more efficient buildings. But there are substantial lags and loopholes in the effect of higher prices. According to a Congressional Budget Office study, the increase in energy prices over the last several years has already made insulation a good investment: fuel savings over a 20-year period are already roughly triple the cost of the insulation. Since 1974 about 8 million owner-occupied homes have been insulated, but it is estimated that 30 million more (and 11.5 million rental units) could still profit from insulation. The main obstacle in owner-occupied homes may be that insulation requires an initial outlay of several hundred dollars. The obstacle in rental units may be that the tenant pays the heating bill and the landlord makes the decision about insulation.

Again the Swedish case is instructive. Space heating there is twice as efficient as in the United States. That is only partly due to higher Swedish energy prices. It is also due to the fact that Swedish building codes require more energy-efficient construction, that Sweden's mortgage law gives homeowners and builders access to extra funds for energy-saving features in homes, and that the government maintains energy-saving training programs for homeowners and apartment managers.

In industry, a major potential source of energy conservation is termed "cogeneration." Nearly half the fuel used by industry is burned to produce steam. That steam can be reused to produce electricity as well, giving plants a kind of in-house generating capacity. West German industry, for example, now produces 28 percent of the country's electricity by cogeneration. In a 1975 report to the National Science Foundation, Dow Chemical's Industrial Center estimated that by 1985 half of all U.S. industry's need for electricity could be met by cogeneration. That is the equivalent of the power produced by 50 large nuclear reactors.

Other than the initial equipment costs, the main obstacle to cogeneration is the structure of the electric power industry. Plants that utilized cogeneration would sometimes need back-up power supplied by the utilities and would sometimes have excess power to sell. Under current pricing arrangements, back-up power would be more expensive per unit than power currently purchased; most utilities reduce prices to large customers. Also, the excess power a firm produced would often be unsalable, since laws in most places allow only the utilities to sell electricity to the public. (Even where such laws do not exist, access to the transmission lines is controlled by the utilities.) If these difficulties were removed, cogeneration should become highly attractive to significant numbers of companies.

Overall, despite its recent public relations campaigns, the utility industry does little to encourage conservation of electricity. Most utilities have resisted flat-rate or "Lifeline" pricing systems under which large users would pay the same (or more) per unit than small residential customers. They have also resisted peak-load pricing, which would raise the cost of electricity during the times of day when use is highest. The reason is not hard to understand. Investor-owned utility companies are typically guaranteed a fixed return on their invested capital. If peak-load demand is high, they can expand their capital by borrowing money to build new plants or improve old ones. They then repay the loans with revenue from the additional electricity they sell. The shareholders, meanwhile, are earning a fixed rate of return on a growing investment base: earnings per share are thus increasing. If demand remains constant and more capacity is not needed, investor earnings can increase only when state utility commissions allow rates to go up. These days, that is an infrequent occurrence.

The utilities were in serious financial trouble during 1974 and 1975, the years of slow energy growth, but have since recovered along with the resurgence in demand for electricity. 1974, for example, New York's Consolidated Edison omitted its quarterly dividend for the first time in its 90-year history and saw its stock drop from $18 to $6 a share. That same year the Dow Jones utility index fell from 95 to 57.9. With the resumption in demand, Con Ed has raised its dividend to a new high, and its stock is selling at more than $20 a share; the Dow index, meanwhile, has passed the 100 mark.

Economic performance of this sort is good for those who own utility stocks, but it is bad for the cause of energy conservation. As Carter has recommended, the utilities' practice of promotional pricing (discounts to big customers) should be terminated and peak-load prices increased. (These measures were approved by the House but rejected both by the Senate and by the House-Senate conferees.) In addition, local communities should consider taking over privately owned utilities and establishing municipal ownership. While privately owned utilities have consistently opposed rate reform aimed at discouraging consumption, some publicly owned companies have pioneered in this area.

Renewable energy sources, like conservation, become more attractive economically as the prices of conventional fuels rise. The variety of potentially practical alternative sources is quite wide. Hungary, Iceland, New Zealand, and the Soviet Union, for example, all make relatively extensive use of geothermal energy—heat from the earth's core. The one large-scale commercial use of geothermal energy in the United States—Pacific Gas and Electric's dry steam Geysers of California—produces electricity considerably more cheaply than coal-fired or nuclear generating plants.[5] Four plants generating power from mixtures of steam and hot water—a more abundant, but more difficult source to utilize—are currently planned for the Imperial Valley. (Nine other countries already have such plants.) Comparable resources appear to lie in the Rocky Mountain states. This January—in the first effort to develop them—Utah Power and Light Company announced plans to build a plant at Roosevelt Hot Springs. It is not yet known how common the geological configurations allowing geothermal energy to be tapped may be, but these recent developments are encouraging.

Tidal power—harnessing ocean currents to produce electricity—is produced commercially in France and the Soviet Union. Research into its possibilities for the United States is virtually nonexistent. Windmills, another way of generating electricity from natural energy flows, are currently cost effective only in remote locations. By 1980 it is expected that technological improvements will enable them to generate electricity at between 2 and 6 cents a kilowatt hour, roughly twice the cost of conventionally generated electricity today. If conventional costs continue to rise, windmills may become more attractive. Companies like Lockheed and General Electric are reportedly waiting for a market to develop; the Department of Energy is spending some $20 million in research and development money on problems of windmill reliability and back-up generation.

Another promising renewable source of energy is what is known as biomass conversion—that is, burning wood, wastes, sugar cane, algae, or other combustible agricultural products. Some American cities are already burning refuse to generate energy, and roughly a hundred others are studying the process. John Deere and Company, an agricultural equipment manufacturer, burns garbage in energy-generating facilities in Wisconsin and Iowa.

Other biomass fuels are better than garbage, however. The energy content of wood and dry crop wastes is comparable to that of western coal. (America's half-million woodburning stoves, in fact, represent the most popular renewable energy source currently in use.) A report by the Mitre Corporation recently concluded that approximately 5 percent of all U.S. energy needs could be produced on just 10 percent of now-idle forest and pasture land. High-yield species would be grown in closely spaced, short-rotation tree farms.

In another form of biomass conversion, it is estimated that harvesting ocean kelp and converting it to methane could generate as much gas as the United States currently consumes each year—23 trillion cubic feet. Land plantations reportedly could generate another 8 to 10 trillion cubic feet a year. Estimates are that the cost would come to between 2 and 6 cents a kilowatt hour, but these figures remain highly speculative.

Despite this potential, biomass conversion has played little role in U.S. energy policy; it is barely mentioned in the Carter plan. In Sweden, by contrast, the forest industry currently produces 60 per cent of its own energy needs. Throughout Europe liquid fuels from biomass materials have been blended with gasoline for decades. In Brazil it is now national policy to substitute up to 20 percent ethyl alcohol for petroleum-based liquid fuels. And in China biomass materials converted into a nontoxic fuel are used for cooking, lighting, machinery, and electric power generation.

Of all the alternative energy sources, solar power has attracted the most attention and seems to hold the most potential. Right now approximately 20 percent of U.S. energy consumption goes to provide space heating and hot water. Much of this heat could be furnished with existing solar technologies. According to government studies, solar hot water heating makes good economic sense almost everywhere in the United States right now. Solar space heating is not yet competitive with oil and gas, but an Energy Research and Development Administration study of 12 geographically dispersed cities found that it is already competitive with electric heat.[6]

During the past few years the number of solar heating systems has grown between 10 and 20 percent a year, with about 15,000 solar energy systems currently in place. Carter's plan called for 2.5 million to be installed by 1985. The main barriers to realizing this goal are the high initial cost of solar systems, slow turnover in housing stock, the need to retrofit existing homes, and reluctance or ignorance on the part of consumers. These factors may decrease in importance over time. According to an ERDA study, reducing the cost of solar collectors from the present $20 per square foot to $15 would enable solar heat to compete successfully with oil space heating in many areas. If it could be reduced to $10 by 1980, solar space heating would be competitive with gas as well. If the price of oil and gas rises to the extent Carter has proposed, solar will become competitive that much faster.

Solar thermal power plants can also generate electricity. At present the cost of solar electricity is estimated to be between two and four times that of conventionally generated power. But the capital cost of nuclear power plants has grown 16 to 20 percent annually for the past decade, with coal plants close behind at a steady 16 percent. Both increases are significantly higher than the rate of inflation, and both are due largely to new requirements for safety and environmental protection. Solar thermal power plants have none of the safety or environmental problems associated with their competitors, and are therefore apt to become more attractive economically. If present cost trends continue, solar power will be competitive with coal and nuclear power by the year 2000. Additional research into solar technology could shorten that time lag.

Photovoltaics—producing electricity directly from sunlight with a photoelectric cell (and thus bypassing the heat-generating process entirely)—currently can provide electricity at about ten times the cost of conventional power. The Department of Energy estimates that it will take ten years and cost $500 million in research and development funds to reduce costs to practical levels.

Present policy does little to encourage the development of such energy sources; instead, it encourages the consumption of oil and natural gas. Existing price controls hold the cost of energy in the United States below the world price, and market prices in any event take inadequate account of the fact that oil and natural gas are depletable resources. If conservation and alternative energy sources are to be fostered, oil and gas prices will have to rise.

Allowing a straight price hike, however—with the proceeds going to oil and gas producers—reduces consumption simply by reducing people's standard of living. That is essentially what has happened so far, and Carter's proposals—not to mention the compromises emerging from Congress—would exacerbate the situation. Decontrolling the price of "new" oil, allowing increases in the price of "old" oil, and raising the price of interstate natural gas—all measures envisioned by the administration—would effectively transfer millions of dollars from consumers to energy producers. Despite the latter's protestations to the contrary, they do not need the money. And energy price increases of this sort fall particularly harshly on the poor, who spend a greater proportion of their income on energy than do those who are better off.

Carter should therefore consign to the dustbin his proposal that oil companies get the full OPEC prices of $13.50 a barrel for newly discovered oil. Instead he should give them the present ceiling price of "old" oil—$5.25 a barrel—for all domestically produced oil. Considering that domestic oil was profitably sold for $3.50 a barrel only five years ago, a price of $5.25 should more than cover the cost of most domestic production.[7] While the companies will complain that such prices give them little incentive to look for more oil in the United States, there is no reason for consumers to pay premium prices so the companies can scurry around after marginal additions to domestic supplies. Most of the continental United States is pretty well drilled already.

The way to keep prices up without hurting people's standard of living is to tax energy use and rebate the money to consumers. Carter proposed such a system, with a $75 per capita across-the-board rebate. His original proposal would have been mildly progressive in impact: under the plan, according to the Congressional Budget Office, families in the lowest income group would come out 2.8 percent ahead by 1980 and those in the highest group would come out .4 percent behind. Within income classes, the system would be less equitable. Since the amount rebated varies only with family size, high energy users within each income class (who would pay the highest tax) would suffer more than low energy users. People without cars would gain at the expense of auto owners, and city dwellers with access to public transportation at the expense of people in suburbs and rural areas.

To some extent, an effective conservation strategy requires these effects: each of them penalizes those who use a lot of energy. But considerations of fairness militate against Draconian measures for the low-income farmer who bought a big car in an era of cheap energy and who still has no access to public transportation. Partial compensation based on locale and income group should therefore be built into the rebate scheme.

For example, a sample survey might be conducted on the amount currently spent on energy by people in different geographic regions and income groups. Data would be gathered both on direct energy expenditures—gasoline, heating oil, etc.—and on indirect expenditures such as energy costs incorporated in a family's food bill. Families could then be compensated for such factors as area of residence and income group. Of course, those who currently use more energy than the average for their income class or region would still be more heavily penalized by the tax, but that is an inevitable effect of any conservation measure.

The reason for such a tax and rebate scheme is that a family that paid $400 extra for natural gas (say) might begin to think seriously about insulation or solar heat even if the $400 were rebated at the end of the first year. To maximize the rewards for efficient energy use, rebates in subsequent years would be based on the family's initial entitlement.

Other than relative price, the greatest barrier to the widespread adoption of conservation measures and solar heating for residential and commercial properties is the high initial cost. Investments in insulation or a solar system may save money even now when figured over the life of the equipment; but the steep initial cost often discourages consumers from purchasing them. Builders too are reluctant to install solar systems in new houses, for fear that the additional cost will scare off potential buyers.

In response to this problem, President Carter has proposed tax credits (25 percent of the first $800 spent and 15 percent of the next $1,400) to families that insulate; similar measures were approved by both Houses of Congress. The difficulties of tax credits, however, are well known. Most of the benefits would go to middle and upper-class families who own homes and who have access to the capital necessary to purchase insulation. The proposal does nothing to stimulate insulation in rental units, or in homes owned by people with lower incomes.

Rather than provide subsidies to the middle class, the government might better ensure that low-interest loans for energy-saving improvements are available to low and middle-income groups, and give tenants the right to compel landlords to make such improvements. The House-Senate conferees have taken a step in this direction by approving a plan for $3 billion in federally subsidized energy conservation loans, to be made available to families with incomes below the median in a given area.

A similar policy should apply to solar power. Solar water and space heating will shortly be competitive with oil in several parts of the country, and with natural gas if its price is deregulated. "Competitive," however, means over the 20-year average lifespan of a solar system. Some studies have shown that consumers will not make purchases of that sort unless they are assured of a payback within five years.

Consequently, the pricing strategy needs to be supplemented by measures to provide funds to prospective purchasers of solar equipment. Carter again proposed tax credits for this purpose (40 percent on the first $1,000 and 25 percent on the next $6,400), but to take advantage of the maximum credit available ($2,000) a family would ordinarily need an income of more than $18,000. According to the Congressional Budget Office, each barrel of oil that would be saved by such a tax credit would "cost" the government $11.28. A better measure is simply a low-interest loan program aimed at low and middle-income groups. The House-Senate conferees have agreed on a program of solar loans made by conventional lenders but purchased from them by the Government National Mortgage Association at rates between 7.5 and 12 percent. Most of the benefits of this program, however, will go to the relatively well-off.

The auto makers, the oil companies, and the utilities rise regularly these days to laud the future of solar power and energy conservation. But their continued profits depend on our continued use of fossil fuels and nuclear power. Automobile manufacturers have always made their highest profits on the sale of big cars, and they are not exactly bending over backwards to meet Washington's new regulations on fuel efficiency. The utilities have traditionally increased their profits by boosting demand for electricity and expanding their capacity correspondingly. The oil companies, which have extensive holdings of gas, coal, and uranium as well as petroleum, have profited enormously from an energy-dependent public.

So while they bow in the direction of "soft" energy paths, these companies have done much to persuade us that too great an emphasis on conservation and alternative energy means slow growth and unemployment. The economy, they say, needs cheap, abundant energy—and right now they are the only ones who can provide it. Upon occasion voters and their representatives have bought this argument. Referenda to curtail nuclear power or to institute flat-rate electric bills, for example, have floundered on the rocks of slow-growth threats.

In the long run, there is no necessary connection between levels of energy use and GNP or living standards. Sweden, West Germany, and Switzerland have living standards equal to or higher than our own but consume only about 60 percent as much energy per capita as the United States. Numerous studies have shown that by increasing the efficiency with which we use energy we can reduce future consumption but continue to raise our standard of living. For example, a study by Data Resources for the Energy Policy Project of the Ford Foundation concluded that we could cut our historic rates of energy growth in half and still more than double our GNP by the year 2000.[8]

In the short run, however, high energy prices (with no corresponding rebate) do act as a kind of surtax on people's incomes, lowering discretionary income and thereby depressing aggregate demand. Industries that depend on high energy inputs will be forced to raise their prices substantially, and may have to cut output and employment.

If the economy is to grow with less energy use, energy will have to be employed more efficiency; its productivity will have to increase. Existing technologies can accomplish much of this. West German industry, for example, uses 38 percent less energy per unit of output than American industry, and Sweden uses 40 percent less energy than the United States for each dollar of GNP.[9] Estimates are that by using known methods the United States could save between 20 and 30 percent of energy used in manufacturing (which in turn accounts for some 28 percent of total U.S. energy consumption). Higher energy prices will encourage both replacement and innovation, but the transformation will be gradual. Machinery is replaced slowly, and energy costs in most industries are a relatively small fraction of total costs.

The economy can also grow with less energy as energy-intensive industries decline relative to other sectors. To some extent this shift has already begun. Since 1945 energy use in the United States has been expanding more slowly than GNP despite (until recently) declining real energy costs. Foreign experience suggests this pattern is typical. One reason for it may be the continued growth of service-providing sectors of the economy relative to manufacturing sectors.

The five most energy-intensive industries, together with the energy-producing industry, consume about one-third of all the energy used by U.S. industry. They also account for roughly half of new investment in plant and equipment. But together they account for only 15 percent of GNP and about 10 percent of employment. Declines in these industries, therefore, would reduce energy consumption significantly without reducing employment by a commensurate amount. If they can be "replaced" economically by labor-intensive sectors—services, for instance, or new conservation and alternate-energy industries—the economy need not suffer.[10] But the transition will require extensive government planning, public investment, and job programs.

It is no accident that conservation and alternative-energy sources suffer from public relations problems, whether of the bumpy-bus-ride variety or the rising-unemployment variety. There are many powerful interests pushing coal, nuclear power, natural gas, and oil—provided only that it all can be sold at the right price. There are few interests—and no powerful ones—pushing conservation measures or research and development programs for alternative energy. There are many workers whose jobs and lives would be affected if the price of natural gas rises substantially, or if gasoline is heavily taxed. There are very few who would be immediately affected if we decide to forget about solar energy.

But in the end the energy dilemmas we are constantly reminded of are only political problems to be solved. In the short run we need the oil that the companies are reluctant to produce, and we need new institutions capable of seeing that fossil fuels are produced with the public interest in mind. In the long run we need to use energy more efficiently—to get "more for less." And we need to encourage soft, renewable energy technologies.

Anything less seems foolhardy if not suicidal. But the outcome is nonetheless in doubt for all that. The chances of wisdom winning out over foolishness—and the interests of the many winning out over the interests of the few—have never, in our society, been particularly bright.

FOOTNOTES

[1] Roger Sant, former assistant administrator of the U.S. Federal Energy Administration, found that a $500 billion investment in energy conservation would save the United States twice as much energy as a comparable investment in new supplies would produce.

[2] Between 1950 and 1973 fuel economy in autos decreased by more than 10 percent.

[3] So far the increase in gasoline prices has not had a major impact on Americans' auto buying habits. In September 1973 small cars (compacts and subcompacts) accounted for 36 percent of the domestic market. Immediately after the major gasoline price increases in January 1974 their share of the market rose to 41.2 percent, but in 1977 they were back down to 36.4 percent. Imported cars, however, modify this picture somewhat. In 1973, imports and U.S. small cars combined accounted for 37.3 percent of the U.S. market. In 1974 the figure was up to 53.2 percent, but last year it was back down to 48.2 percent. (Not all imports are small cars, but most are.)

[4] According to the provision approved by the House-Senate conferees, the tax would begin at $200 in 1979 on cars getting less than 15 miles per gallon. Those getting less than 14 miles per gallon would be taxed $300 and those below 13 taxed $550. These taxes would be increased annually until 1985, when cars getting less than 22.5 miles per gallon would be taxed $400, while those under 12.5 would be taxed $3,850. Carter's original proposal to rebate the proceeds of this tax to consumers was rejected by Congress. Even without the gas guzzler tax the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the average fuel economy of cars on U.S. roads will increase by about 20 percent between now and 1990.

[5] Since 1890 residents of Boise, Idaho, have used naturally occurring hot water to heat their homes. Those on the geothermal line pay less than one-half as much as Boise residents who use natural gas for heat. The only other U.S. city to make extensive use of geothermal heat is Klamath Falls, Oregon. But there the results have been only marginally economic.

[6] Electric heat is not so uncommon as is frequently supposed. As a result of the natural gas shortage, about half the new homes built in the United States today are unable to get gas hookups and therefore turn to electric heat. While 30 percent of new dwelling units built in 1971 had electric heat, by 1974 the figure was up to 47 percent.

[7] The only exception to this should be oil that is more expensive to recover. Even here the companies should be required to demonstrate both the reasons for the higher cost and the immediate need for the oil. If both these conditions were met satisfactorily, the companies should then be entitled to a fair return and a higher price. But they should not automatically get the OPEC price, as they would under President Carter's proposals.

[8] From the period after World War I to 1954 the amount of energy used to produce a dollar of GNP in the United States fell from a peak of 92 million BTUs to about 59 million. Then, in the era of cheap Middle Eastern oil, little progress was made: in fact by 1970 the energy/GNP ratio was back up to 62 million. But with the rise in the price of energy during the past few years, the ratio has fallen below 58 million. In West Germany and Sweden it is already down to about 41 million.

[9] In 1972, West Germany used only 67 percent as much energy as the United States to produce a ton of petroleum products; 68 percent as much for a ton of steel; and 57 percent as much for a ton of paper. Measured on the basis of a dollar's worth of shipments, West German output in 1972 required 70 percent as much energy for food production, 37 percent for paper, 57 percent for chemicals, 50 percent for petroleum and coal products, 73 percent for stone, clay, glass, and concrete products, and 80 percent for primary metal production. The average for these six energy-intensive industries was 69 percent.

[10] A Bonneville Power Administration study found, "High impact conservation programs create more jobs than would be created by building new power plants to generate an equivalent amount of energy." Similarly, Fred Dubin, president of an engineering, planning, and management firm that has done several energy analyses, found that $2 billion invested in solar power and conservation technologies creates four times as many jobs as $2 billion invested in nuclear reactors.●

PAUL FREUND ON "WHAT IS HAPPENING TO AUTHORITY?"

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last month, in a commencement address at Stonehill College in North Easton, Mass., Prof. Paul A. Freund of Harvard Law School spoke perceptively on an issue of fundamental importance to the Nation and its future—the role of respect for authority in Government and other institutions in our society.

Professor Freund finds several causes of the current erosion of respect for authority. In particular, he cites such factors as the confusion between "authority" and "authoritarianism," the modern trend toward equality, and the disenchantment with the results achieved by those in authority—a feeling, as he puts it, that the best and the brightest have been frauds and failures.

Professor Freund's address contains both diagnosis and prescription. In addition to his analysis of the causes, he also suggests appropriate ways to stem the current erosion of authority—particularly the need for those in authority to engage in what he calls self-correction and self-limitation. In this way he suggests, it may be possible for those in authority to demonstrate the wisdom of the restraints that are essential to protect and preserve the freedom of us all.

Mr. President, it is easy to understand why Professor Freund has earned his high reputation as one of the wisest men in America and as one of the most influential scholars and students of our constitutional system of government. I believe all of us will appreciate the opportunity to read his Stonehill College essay, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

WHAT IS HAPPENING TO AUTHORITY?

I confess that I enjoy the pageantry of Commencement, matched only by military processions. I suggest an innovation in government protocol—that in receiving foreign heads of state, the President forego the review of troops to substitute an academic line-up in full regalia. It would be symbolic of our values, and whether it was well received by the visiting potentate would be a test of his own culture and civilization.

Ten years ago we saw the beginnings of the student protest movement. In retrospect it is clear that it was not a special American phenomenon, not simply an explosive outburst against the war in Vietnam. It was a world-wide generational rebellion against authority. In Germany, for example, it took the form of an attack on the university system, its concentration of authority in a group of senior professors. When a young German teacher complained of the new order—tripartite government of faculty, students, and staff—I remarked that surely reform was overdue. "Yes, but you know us Germans—when we do anything, we do it so thoroughly."

On this anniversary it seems appropriate to reflect on the theme of authority—what it is, and what has been happening to it.

The two great dangers threatening modern society, in the words of the French poet Paul Valery, are disorder and order. The force of that aphorism is surely felt by anyone contemplating a country such as Italy today and as it was under Mussolini's fascism. In the same spirit one could say that the two great threats are authority and loss of authority. The choice between all of the one and all of the other is a choice between stagnation and anarchy. Or, as Alfred North Whitehead put it, "The art of free society consists first in the maintenance of the symbolic code; and secondly in fearlessness of revision, to secure that the code serves those purposes which satisfy an enlightened reason. Those societies which cannot combine reverence to their symbols with freedom of revision, must ultimately decay either from anarchy, or from the slow atrophy of a life stifled by useless shadows."

Over the past generation in our own society it takes no profound observer to recognize the erosion of respect for authority, and therefore of authority itself, in all the major institutions of life—the family, the church, the law, the schools, the government. What causes are responsible for this decline? I suggest two principal causes: first, a general disenchantment with authoritarian governance, which is a spurious form of authority and which is not distinguished from the authoritative, the genuine form; and second, a general enchantment with social and economic mobility and egalitarian goals. Often the two are combined, as in the case of upper middle-class children who discover injustice in the world and rebel against their parents.

Authority, I have said, has been confused with authoritarianism. The latter is the sheer exertion of power or will over others, while true authority is something more qualified—power which can be justified by reason, by the capacity to explain itself. Books have been written on the authoritarian personality, but it was all said by Ring Lardner: " 'Father, why are we moving?' 'Shut up,' the father explained."

The word authority comes from the Latin "augere," to increase or augment, and among rational beings this is done by reason, not by fiat. Hitler was authoritarian; Charles Evans Hughes was authoritative. And yet the revolt against sheer power has spilled over and been projected against rational processes of ordering. All forms of constraint become suspect and are looked on as at least presumptively illegitimate.

A second cause of the decline of authority, I have suggested, is the movement toward egalitarian ideals. Partly there is a leveling up; the idea of a hierarchy of talent, ability, achievement is rejected in favor of an ideal of fellowship, of brotherliness rather than Big Brotherhood, community rather than competition. Partly there is a leveling down, a feeling that too often eminence has been bogus, that the "best and brightest" have been frauds and failures, have failed us miserably. The feeling goes back, in my lifetime, to the great depression of the 1930's. I recall a lady in Washington telling Justice Brandeis that the bankers were descending on the capital wringing their hands, utterly helpless and defeated, to which Brandeis replied wryly, "Well, aren't they known as the Napoleons of finance?"

The loss of respect for authority is no doubt an overreaction, but it is at least comprehensible. It springs from a combination of sources: misunderstanding the claims of authority, a generous impulse toward brotherhood, and a disillusionment with the pretensions of the captains and the kings.

How then can authority, and respect for authority, be rehabilitated and restored? First of all, by demonstrating that those in authority are prepared to engage in self-examination and self-correction. Consider two paradigms of authority—in law, the Supreme Court; in language, the dictionary. The Supreme Court of the United States owes much of its prestige to its readiness to reconsider its own decisions, yielding, as Justice Brandeis put it, to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning. As for a great dictionary, we may think of it as a huge, impersonal repository of unalterable truths, but of course it is nothing of the kind. The late Professor Kittredge of Harvard was once approached after class by a student who said, "Professor, you pronounced so-and-so with the accent on the first syllable, but I had occasion to look it up in Webster's unabridged, and the accent is on the second syllable." Kittredge took out a little notebook and said, "I am making a note of that. That's wrong. I must change it in the next edition."

Besides self correction, a necessary virtue of those in authority is self-limitation. There are many experts, but few if any universal sages, although there is a prevalent disease known as the Nobel-prize syndrome, which infects its victims with delusions of omniscience. The late Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore was once asked whether he really believed the Pope was infallible. "I can only say," he replied, "that when I was last in Rome his Holiness called me Cardinal Jibbons!" (In 1960, when John F. Kennedy was running for President and was seeking ways of de-fusing the church-state issue, I gave him this story, which he used in New York, except that, doubtless because Cardinal Gibbons was a remote figure there, he changed the names to Spellman and Spillman.) Self-limitation is not a mark of weakness. It is, said Goethe, the first mark of the master. Power confined is power compounded.

In addition to self-correction and self-limitation, it is extremely helpful if one can radiate authority rather than exert it. Justice Brandeis opposed the construction of the present Supreme Court building, the marble palace, on the ground that the influence of the Court must come from the intrinsic quality of its performance, not from the pomp of its ceremonies or trappings.

I have spoken of those who yield authority, and what they can do toward its restoration. Those who are subject to authority, in turn, need to be reminded of the role that authority plays in enhancing freedom. The lesson of the playing field is just that; without the umpire, the coach, the captain, each player's freedom to play the game would be dissipated in enervating, open-ended disputes. Without the authority of precedent and a binding higher law, the judge would be torn apart by the agony and absurdity of passing judgment on a defendant's past and future life. If restraints are wise, they make us free. If our fetters are shaped and re-shaped by right reason, we find freedom in our fetters. These are large "ifs," but they are a necessary attribute of authority.

I would add just a word. Right reason cannot be merely abstract and mechanical. It must include a sense of wonder at the unknown, and awe at the mystery of the unknowable. Wallace Stevens had this to say about the range of reason:

"Rationalists, wearing square hats,
Think, in square rooms,
Looking at the floor,
Looking at the ceiling.
They confine themselves
To right-angled triangles.
If they tried rhomboids,
Cones, waving lines, ellipses,—
As, for example, the ellipse of the half-moon—
Rationalists would wear sombreros."

I invite you, from time to time, to remove your mortarboards, look at the shape of things outdoors, and wear sombreros.●

THE AFRICAN QUAGMIRE?

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, Mr. Tom Wicker, the brilliant New York Times journalist, has written a most thoughtful and provocative piece, entitled "Which Way to the Quagmire?" which appeared in the New York Times of May 28. The article raises serious questions about the administration's Africa policy.

I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. The article follows:

WHICH WAY TO THE QUAGMIRE?

By Tom Wicker)

What, if anything, is the Carter Administration up to in Africa? Does even President Carter know? In view of the following record of events and statements, does anyone?

May 16—Mr. Carter complained to Congressional leaders that existing laws unduly restricted him in aiding friendly governments under attack, as Zaire was at the time; Secretary of State Vance said one such restriction was the Clark Amendment barring aid to forces fighting in the civil war in Angola.

May 18—A French-Belgian airlift, using some American planes, began to rescue Europeans and Americans from Shaba Province in Zaire; Fidel Castro summoned an American diplomat to deny that Cuba was participating in any way in the Katangan invasion of Shaba from Angola.

May 19—The State Department asserted that Cuba had trained the Katangan forces and supplied them with Soviet weapons; the White House publicly detailed the American participation in the airlift while high Administration sources privately let it be known that the participation had been in response to Cuban Soviet involvement in Angola, Ethiopia and elsewhere in Africa.

May 23—Senator Dick Clark of Iowa said Mr. Carter's public statements about Congressional restrictions led him to believe Mr. Carter had "made the decision to reinvolve the United States in the Angola war."

Walter Pincus and Robert Kaiser reported in The Washington Post, however, that Mr. Clark, the chairman of the Senate subcommittee on Africa had been recently approached by Stansfield Turner, the C.I.A. director, and David Aaron, the President's Deputy National Security Advisor. Both talked to Mr. Clark about indirect aid to forces opposing Cuban troops in Africa; Mr. Turner was reported to have specified a plan to pass American arms through a third party to forces waging guerrilla war against the Marxist Cuban-backed Government of Angola.

This would have circumvented the Clark Amendment, which prohibits such aid being given directly; not unnaturally, the author of the Clark amendment resisted the idea.

May 24—White House Press Secretary Jody Powell said President Carter "had no knowledge (Mr. Turner and Mr. Aaron) were doing this sort of thing," although he did not deny that they had done it. When Mr. Clark's charge first appeared, Mr. Powell did deny that Mr. Carter had decided "to take any action that would be contrary to the Clark Amendment or any law."

May 25—At a new conference in Chicago, Mr. Carter said that he (a) had no intention of involving the United States in military conflict in Angola or anywhere else in Africa, (b) had no problem with most existing restrictions, including the Clark Amendment, but (c) was worried that Congress might impose further restraints on Presidential authority and the use of foreign aid funds.

He also described American participation in the rescue airlift as "an appropriate and measured response" to a situation for which he said Angola and Cuba must share responsibility.

If Mr. Carter's news conference is taken at face value, at least the following questions arise:

What was he complaining about for a week, if existing restrictions on his powers enable him to make "an appropriate and measured response" to what he considers Cuban-Angolan responsibility for the Shaba fighting?

What was Mr. Turner talking about to Dick Clark if there is no intention of further American involvement in Angola?

Or does Mr. Carter exclude roundabout schemes like the one outlined by Mr. Turner from his definition of being "involved" in Angola?

If so, does he believe such "covert" operations can be kept secret? And if not, does he think his C.I.A. director ought to be making such proposals independently of Administration policy?

Even Mr. Carter's protestations at Chicago that he only wants to be able to give "much needed friendship" to African nations seems curiously overstated. He said, for instance that "We are prohibited, except under special circumstances, from giving any aid to Zambia." The special circumstances must have been in effect one week earlier when it was announced that the United States would give Zambia $100-million in economic assistance over three years to ease problems caused by the declining of copper prices.

Now it may be that Mr. Carter only wants the world to think he would be tougher on the Cubans if Congress would let him; but the Cubans and Soviets are quite likely to take his complaints to mean only that Mr. Carter's hands really are tied.

Or it may be that the President really does feel the need to fend off further Congressional restraints on his powers. Letting Stansfield Turner run loose on Capitol Hill with covert action schemes to circumvent existing restrictions is a strange way to make that point.

Everything considered, and in the light of the distaste of Presidents for appearing weak and indecisive, one may be pardoned for being grateful that the Clark Amendment was in effect in these recent weeks, to do just what it was intended to do.●

EXCESSIVE GOVERNMENT SPENDING

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as we all know, President Carter came to the White House on the basis of a campaign which promised to reduce the size of Government and cut bureaucratic expenses. We all also know at this point that campaign promises mean very little to the present occupant of the White House. As an example of how he came to grips with the question of big government, we have only to look at his new Department of Energy. There we find a budget of $10.6 billion for fiscal 1978 and a roster of employees expected to total nearly 20,000.

Mr. President, in the Thursday Letter, a publication of the Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., there is an interesting item on the Department of Energy which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The item follows:

[From the Thursday Letter, May 11, 1978]

FEDERAL FUNDS—CALL THEM TAXPAYER PAYMENTS

Like most of us, Dean Witter Reynolds' Joseph Garcia knows that he's been working most of 1978 thus far to pay for Uncle Sam's share of our entire year's earnings. Also like the rest of us mortals, he often wonders what our good Uncle does with all that dough. The other day, while reading the 1977 Annual Report of Supran Energy Corp. (27.8% owned by Southern Union Co.), he saw an interesting commentary that sheds some light on where our avuncular friend puts some of our money, and why the government keeps getting bigger and bigger:

"$10.6 Billion! They Can't Be Serious! The Department of Energy will employ 19,767 people and dispose of a fiscal 1978 budget of $10.6 billion. To put that budget in perspective, consider the following:

1. It represents $500,000 per Department employee.

2. It represents $50 for each and every member of the total United States population.

3. It represents $266,871 for each of the 39,763 wells drilled in 1976.

4. It represents $58.35 for each of the 181,855,700 feet drilled in 1976.

5. It represents $3.59 for each barrel of domestic crude-oil production in 1976.

6. It represents $1.67 for every barrel of petroleum products consumed in 1976.

7. It represents $0.10 for every gallon of gasoline consumed in 1976.

8. It represents $0.3434 on every barrel of proven crude oil reserves as of December 31, 1976 (30.9 billion barrels).

9. It exceeds 1975 capital and exploration expenditures by the petroleum industry to explore for and produce domestic crude oil, natural gas, and natural-gas liquids ($9.4 billion, according to the Chase Manhattan Bank), and it is almost three-fifths of capital expenditures in all United States petroleum sectors that year ($17.7 billion).

10. It exceeds the 1974 profits of the seven largest oil companies—profits that were called "obscene."

There's a footnote to the above: "The 1979 budget increased to $12.6 billion, up 19%. This budget approximately doubles the 1976 earnings of the seven largest oil companies and exceeds the 1976 earnings of the top 20 oil companies by almost $2 billion."

If this doesn't rile you up enough, consider the recent statement by the Health, Education, and Welfare Department, which said that about $7 billion of taxpayer money has been lost via various means, including improper payments, ineligible payees, etc. Now it wants to add about 200 investigators (at a cost of several million dollars) to find out where that missing moolah has gone. No wonder business executives point to government spending as the principal cause of inflation. You might also note that the Tax Foundation, after studying Mr. Carter's budget figures, estimates than $0.45 of every $1 of taxpayer-money spending in the next fiscal year will go to individuals under such programs as Social Security, Medicare, welfare, and federal employees' pensions. The latter could be as much of a millstone around the federal government's neck as New York City's employee pension obligations are on the Big Apple's.●

FOREIGN INVESTORS IN U.S. AGRICULTURE

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, there is growing concern in America on the subject of foreign investments in U.S. real estate, particularly American farmland. The chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry (Mr. TALMADGE) has commissioned the General Accounting Office to use its resources on this subject and formally report its findings to the Congress. This report is in progress and is anxiously awaited by Members of the Senate.

Perhaps the most indepth analysis of foreign ownership yet to appear in the printed press was an article by Robert Lindsey that appeared in the Sunday, May 14, 1978, New York Times, entitled "Foreign Investors Rush to Acquire U.S. Property as Haven for Funds." It is my judgment that other Senators have developed such an interest in the topic that I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD:

FOREIGN INVESTORS RUSH TO ACQUIRE U.S. PROPERTY AS HAVEN FOR FUNDS

(By Robert Lindsey)

STOCKTON, CALIF., May 11.—Alfred Zuckerman's father came here from Texas 70 years ago and began farming the capricious soil of the San Joaquin River Delta. Realizing a dream in 1937, he bought a 5,200-acre island in the river and turned its rich peat into a farm lush with asparagus, potatoes, onions and other crops protected by high levees that held back the river.

The island remained in the Zuckerman family for more than 40 years. But last month it was sold for $5.8 million to a corporation based in the European principality of Liechtenstein and owned by investors in Italy. "I've never met the investors and don't know who they are," Alfred Zuckerman said.

The island here is among thousands of acres in California's San Joaquin Valley, and many thousands of acres more elsewhere across the country, that have recently gone into foreign ownership. The unusual real estate rush by noresident foreign buyers involves not only farmland but also shopping centers, office buildings, hotels, houses and other property.

Foreign investors, troubled by political and economic instability in their own countries and attracted by the greater purchasing power a deflated dollar has given them, are buying much of the United States—but no one knows how much.

Gerald Jackson, president of the American Real Estate Exchange of San Francisco, which handles many foreign sales, estimates that about 20 percent of all farmland being sold in the country now is going to foreign buyers and that the total is 40 to 50 percent in certain areas, among them the Mississippi Delta, certain parts of the Middle West and California's Central Valley.

The European Investment Research Center, a holding company in Brussels, estimated recently that Europeans spent $800 million on American farmland last year alone, while other estimates placed the total investment in real estate at several times that amount. But none of the figures are more than guesses.

Many, if not most of the purchases, Government experts said, are being made through trusts, corporations, banks, lawyers and offshore companies in the Netherlands Antilles and other Caribbean locations that specialize in concealing such transactions.

FARMERS PROTEST SALES

Farmers in many parts of the country are more and more frequently protesting the acquisitions, complaining that foreigners are often paying too much for land and driving up prices and taxes. However, some real estate brokers who cater to foreign investors argue that American farmers are overreacting, that there are not as many deals being consummated as the farmers believe.

"If foreigners could buy all the farmland available for the next 10 years, they would not own 2 percent of the country's farmland," said Jeffrey T. Server, an executive of Chicago's Arthur Rubloff & Company, a major dealer in farmland. "There's no reason at all for the family farmer or anyone else to feel threatened by foreign investment."

But such reassurances have not stilled the protests, and there are lobbying efforts around the country to limit such purchases by state law.

"You can't pay what these people are paying for the land and farm it," said Richard H. Lehman, a Democratic Assemblyman from a farming district in California, who is pushing legislation to restrict foreign purchases. "Land is probably the most important resource we have, and we do not have the necessary tools to find out who owns it."

7 STATES BAR OWNERSHIP

Seven states—Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire and Oklahoma—have laws barring nonresident aliens from owning land, and 13 other states, including New York, impose some limits.

But knowledgeable real estate experts say that most of these laws can be circumvented easily, and they add that, if tested, the laws might be held unconstitutional because they deny equal protection under the law to foreign buyers.

Although there are no reliable figures on the total volume of foreign land purchases in the country, interviews with Government officials, real estate specialists, foreign investors and others in 15 states suggest a large and growing role by foreign investors in American real estate.

Canadian investors, because they have generally been less secretive in their dealings, are among the most conspicuous buyers. But the interviews indicated that moneyed families, corporations and institutions such as pension funds from West Germany, Italy, France, Britain, the Netherlands, Belgium, South Africa, Rhodesia, the Arab countries, Latin America, the British crown colony of Hong Kong and elsewhere are investing heavily in this country.

FRENCH CANADIANS IN FLORIDA

In south Florida, some real estate men estimate that French Canadian investors have spent more than $500 million in the last three years; a company controlled by Canada's Hudson's Bay Company recently announced that it would finance half the cost of a $1 billion new town of 50,000 people in Dade County.

Canada's Olympia & York Development Ltd. recently bought eight New York City office buildings for almost $350 million, and has made several other acquisitions in this country.

Another Canadian company, Nu-West Development Corporation Ltd. of Calgary, recently paid $16 million for 2,000 acres of undeveloped land overlooking the coast at San Clemente south of here, not far from the home of former President Richard M. Nixon. The same company offered recently to buy 80 percent of a major Phoenix home builder.

Substantial foreign real estate investments were reported in virtually every section of the country. The following examples give an indication of the activity:

¶In Boston, the 34-story State Street Bank Building was sold to Dutch investors for $35.5 million, and Italian and French companies are among the major investors in Boston's redevelopment effort.

¶In Montana, a recent survey by state officials indicated that foreign buyers had acquired at least 100,000 acres of ranch land.

¶In Beverly Hills, real estate experts estimated that Arab and Iranian investors had spent more than $150 million in the last 18 months on expensive homes. Significant numbers of Korean and Chinese investors have also bought homes in southern California, some of them, real estate agents said, with cash.

¶In New Orleans, Iran's Bank Omran is supplying half of the capital for a $500 million complex of offices, hotels, stores and apartments called Canal Place.

¶In rural Louisiana, the Ferruzzi family of Ravenna, Italy, bought and is developing a 27,000-acre cattle ranch; the family also owns major ranching properties in North Carolina.

¶In northern Iowa, a prosperous West German farmer, Clemens August Van Twickel, bought 1,013 acres of farmland last year for $2 million, not far from where the Metternich family of West Germany paid $3.85 million for a farm three years ago.

BID FOR 3 HOTELS

Last week, an Arab-backed, Dutch-based consortium bid $50 million to buy the Roosevelt, Biltmore and Barclay Hotels in Manhattan from the Penn Central Company. And along Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles, Arab and Iranian investors have bought at least a half-dozen office buildings in the past six months.

In a comment echoed by his counterparts in other parts of the country, Roy Schwarz Jr., a New Orleans broker, said of the overseas buyers:

"They're looking to put out big bucks; they want shopping centers, office buildings, quality property. They're paying high prices and taking low returns. They want to preserve their capital and they want pride of ownership. They figure this country is the last bastion of free enterprise."

The foreign buyers are often willing to settle for lower rates of return than Americans. This quality has troubled some real estate men.

DESIRE TO PRESERVE CAPITAL

"As a broker, I must say the commissions from foreign purchases are as spendable to put my children through college as those of domestic buyers," said a Philadelphia broker. "But the prices can get out of whack and become higher than domestic buyers can afford; we see Equitable Life and Prudential buying properties for 8.5, 9, 9.5 percent return while foreign buyers are getting them for 6.5."

Stephen K. Weber of Oppenheimer Industries in Kansas City said that fear of leftist governments, terrorism and kidnapping and the desire to preserve capital—not necessarily to make money on it—were all factors.

"There is a lot of old wealth in Europe," he said, "and these people know from experience that after wars and conflicts have ended, retention of farmland has enabled them to retain a net worth and get back on their feet. They're looking now at American farm properties because they feel this is the last place in the world where land will be confiscated."

Regarding commercial properties, Edward Sulzberger of Sulzberger-Rolf Inc. in Manhattan, which sold a Fifth Avenue office building last week to a West German company, said: "The dollar is so low that even if foreigners did nothing with the property they've bought, they'd make a handsome profit."

Here in California's great Central Valley where family farms have given way increasingly in recent years to large corporate agribusiness enterprises, the question that farmers are asking is, How much more will the foreigners buy?

CALIFORNIA DEALS CONTINUE

And the deals continue; last month, an Italian family bought a 2,120-acre peach ranch south of here for $5.5 million. North of here, in Sacramento, some Canadians bought a hotel for $4 million; Hong Kong investors bought a 300-unit apartment complex for $5.7 million; a smaller apartment house went to investors from Thailand, and three shopping centers were bought by Swiss and Canadian investors.

"This is about the last of the big family-owned properties around here," Mr. Zuckerman said, remarking on the irony that his family had to sell because of the need to pay inheritance taxes after his father's death.

Mr. Zuckerman has agreed to help manage the property for a year, then the Italians will take over. Mr. Lehman, the State Assemblyman who is trying to win passage of laws to block such purchases, said he expected them to continue. "It's an incredible infusion [of money]," he said. "The one thing holding them back is that there's not that much land for sale." ●

SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, there have been so many inaccurate and downright dishonest things written about South Africa in this country in the last several years that it is like a ray of sunshine on a dark day when a South African takes his pen in hand and writes a few truths about his country. I am not going to say that everything has happened in South Africa that we Americans would like to see happen as far as the relationship of black and white goes, but I spent the Easter recess there, and that was my third visit to the country covering some 35 years, and I am convinced that South Africa can live without the United States but the United States is going to have a very difficult time surviving in this world without South Africa and her strategic importance to us, particularly now that we have practically lost every vantage point around the Indian Ocean except South Africa. I ask that this article entitled, "South Africa—the Facts of Life Today . . . and a Vision of Its Future" by Jan S. Marais be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SOUTH AFRICA—THE FACTS OF LIFE TODAY . . . AND A VISION OF ITS FUTURE

(By Jan S. Marais)

INTRODUCTION

Is there any other country in the world which has suffered so much criticism over the last three decades as has South Africa?

What are the facts? Has the country really so many imperfections? Has it made so many mistakes?

Are there special conditions; has it special problems, and what are they?

Are there any good and wonderful things at all about South Africa?

Any special advantages and factors in its favour?

And what, on balance, is the truth; and what in true perspective, based on realities, is its future? Is there going to be an ultimate and terrible bloodbath, wiping out the many achievements of the past, and culminating, in the place of white minority rule, in black minority rule in typical African fashion?

Talking about typical African fashion: Some believe that this means clamouring for black majority rule, on a one-man-one-vote basis, meaning one vote only one, and then a black dictatorship or military regime.

Should the West, especially America, wash its hands of the problems and sins of Southern Africa? If not, what can be done? Particularly in its own interest and in the interest of the Western World and the Western way of life.

Is it a matter of the great Western powers of today having to make up their minds and to opt for either an evolutionary development towards an acceptable democracy, or to opt for revolution such as is so common in Africa and elsewhere in underdeveloped or developing countries?

Of course, you are entitled to believe that I cannot but be biased or prejudiced and that I, as a South African, will hold on fanatically to an optimistic view of this country's future. All I can assure you is that, while wearing also my hat as President of the South Africa Foundation, I have for many, many years made it my business to study the South African and Southern African situation in both local and international perspective, to be fanatically realistic and to endeavor to convey or project the truth in its unadulterated form, whether it be good or bad.

So, on this basis, what are my conclusions?

Well, in a nutshell, I believe that as with so many things in life, the wheel will turn a full cycle—has now almost turned a full circle—and the much-maligned South Africa will again become a magnet of attraction for both people and investments within the next few years. That there will be a "scramble" to get in before we are much older.

But, let's look at some of the special features of present day South Africa first.

THE FACTS OF LIFE IN SOUTH AFRICA TODAY

To put the South African situation in proper perspective, it is necessary to indicate briefly, what the main facts of life in South Africa are at present.

1. Population Composition

According to the latest available statistics, there are today 25,260,000 South Africans, as follows:

South African population

	Number	Percent of total
Whites	4,300,000	17.0
Asians	730,000	2.8
Coloureds	2,430,000	9.6
Blacks	17,800,000	70.6
Total	25,260,000	100

White South Africans are mainly of Dutch, English, French and German descent with a sprinkling of others from practically every other country. Many languages are spoken, but there are two official languages, Afrikaans and English.

According to the latest official census (1970) about 48 percent of the White population regard Afrikaans as their first language and 30 percent English. Another 18 percent have no specific language preference. Most people in South Africa have at least a working knowledge of both official languages.

About 65,000 South Africans prefer German as their first language.

The Asian group consists mainly of the descendants of Indians who were imported during 1860 and later years to work in the sugarcane fields in Natal. Indians were subject to repatriation until 1961, when, under the present Government, they became permanent South African citizens.

The Coloureds are the offspring of the original so-called "Strandlopers" in the Cape, imported Malay slaves and the mixing of these groups with the Whites and Blacks.

It is important to note that of all the various racial groups in South Africa, the Coloureds are undoubtedly, in a historical sense, the group best entitled to claim South Africa as their home—especially the Western Cape, where more than 35 percent of the total Coloured population live at present.

The Blacks consist of 9 separate ethnic groups, each with its own language, legal system, life-style values and socio-political identity. In life-style and language the Zulu nation, for instance, differs as much from the Tswana nation as the French from the Italians.

Historically the Black came down from the Northern areas, often as a result of tribal and faction fights, and settled in different parts of the country, more or less in the areas of the present-day homelands plan.

It is often not properly understood that these different Black tribes do not always get on well with one another, especially that they cannot be mobilised and become united against a "common enemy", such as is unfortunately, at least to some extent, the situation in South Africa today. They can in any case not always understand each other. Neither do all of them speak or understand English and Afrikaans. It is evident that many communication gaps exist.

Urban blacks

Of the present Black population of 17,800,000, about 8,500,000 live either permanently or temporarily in the so-called White areas outside the planned homelands. These are the people who are usually referred to as the Urban Blacks. They were drawn to the developing "White" areas, especially after the discovery of diamonds and gold toward the end of the nineteenth century and the subsequent rapid industrial take-off and development.

2. EDUCATIONAL LEVELS AND FACILITIES

The White group is highly literate and compares well with any developed nation. Proportionately more Whites receive a university education than any other nation apart from the U.S.A., and illiteracy* in this group is, for all practical purposes, non-existent. (Only 2.3 percent of the White population older than 6 years of age cannot read and write).

There is also compulsory education being introduced step by step for the Coloureds and Asians and the literacy rate is estimated at 76 percent for the Coloureds and at 80 percent for the Asian Group.

School education for Blacks is not yet compulsory although an African child who wants to go to school, is never turned down. In this respect South Africa often boasts of having among its Blacks the highest literacy rate in Africa, viz 45 percent (31.9 percent in 1960). compared with an estimated general average of only 31 percent in the rest of Africa. Figures like 25 percent for Botswana, 25 percent for Ghana, 40 percent for Uganda, 24 percent for Nigeria and 10 percent for Sierra Leone are not uncommon in present-day Africa.

It has been confidently calculated that illiteracy in South Africa will be wiped out within the next generation.

One of the criticisms sometimes thrown at the Whites by Black leaders is, "Why tax yourself and educate our children if you are not prepared to open all possible job and advancement opportunities to them? This is the way to frustrate them and breed revolutionaries among them!"

3. PER CAPITA INCOME AND LIVING STANDARDS

South African Whites enjoy one of the three or four highest standards of living in the world. And it is usually believed that the standards of living of Non-Whites compare very well with those in practically the whole of the rest of Africa, or anywhere else.

In terms of taxable income the per capita remuneration of White South Africans increased by 143 percent to $2,900 over the period 1960–1975, while Coloured income increased by 176 percent to $570. The corresponding increase in Asian income was by 184 percent to $671, and in Black income by 195 percent to $272 per annum (1975 figures).

Figures can, of course, be misleading. The factual position is that percentages now increase faster for Non-Whites but the physical gap in wages is still widening. Some calculations indicate that the latter will start narrowing in about 5 years' time, while wage discrimination should be non-existent in the near future. Merit is now rapidly taking its place.

When compared with other African States the following statistics will indicate the relative positions:

Comparisons with other African states

(1972–73 figures, the latest available from many African States).

	Per Capita Income

Another comparison is that with 43% of Southern Africa's population, South Africa and South West Africa provide about 70% of the total output of the whole region.

4. THE PRESENT ECONOMIC RECESSION AND ITS RELATION TO WORLD MARKETS

In order to evaluate properly the present recession and its various repercussions, it is necessary to refer briefly to the following:

a. Firstly, South Africa is a so-called "open country" and one of the world's first 16 trading nations.

b. Historically, economic cycles in South Africa have shown 12 to 18 months time lag between a recession or upswing in the countries which are its main trading partners and a recession or upswing in its own economy.

c. With reference to the present situation, South Africa was in fact still enjoying "boom" conditions about two years ago when America, England, West Germany and its other trading partners were experiencing severe recessionary conditions.

It is therefore, not illogical that South Africa is at present still experiencing recessionary conditions and that it can look forward to a recovery after the elimination of the recessionary conditions which its trading partners have experienced for a relatively long time, but which now show definite signs of recovery.

Since we are a major exporter of important minerals and raw materials, this seems only a logical development and it will benefit considerably the export earnings and balance of payments situation in South Africa.

In my view South Africa will again experience sound growth of some 5 percent plus towards 1978.

5. THE GOLD PRICE

Although South Africa has expected, and in her forward planning provided for, a decline in the role of gold in its future economic growth, it is also true that the recent extent of the collapse in the gold price was not generally expected.

South Africa did not bargain on a $200 or $300 price for its gold, but at the same time it did not expect a decline of much lower than about $125 to $150 per fine ounce.

The sudden sharp drop in the gold price to around $110, did, therefore, aggravate South Africa's balance of payments problems.

6. CAPITAL EXPENDITURE COMMITMENTS

Many South Africans would agree that right at the moment we have committed ourselves to a rather heavy expenditure programme on infra-structure and other major development projects in relation to our balance of payments situation.

It could be argued that we were too optimistic in view of the rather high gold price which prevailed for quite a long time. On the other hand, it is also true that many of these commitments were entered into on relatively reasonable terms with reference to inflation and escalating costs and that they are essential for further replacing gold as a foreign exchange earner and for laying the foundation of increased employment opportunities for our rapidly increasing population.

Under the changed circumstances, a considerable scaling-down of projects that can be delayed, has already taken place. The following, however, is an indication of important projects which are going ahead.

The expansion of the large South African Iron and Steel Corporation (Iscor) to nearly twice its present size—a project which will cost $2,070 million;

The completion of the Sishen/Saldaha ore export project at $800 million;

Work is now starting on a second oil-from-coal installation, SASOL II, which will cost more than $1,200 million;

About $3,000 million will be spent, over the next 10 years, by the Electricity Supply Commission (Escom) to produce six times the present output;

The implementation of containerisation by the South African Railways and Harbours, at $2,300 million;

A variety of smaller, private projects, with a total cost of about $3,000 million.

Grand total $12,370 million.

It will be obvious, when glancing through this list, that these projects are very strategic and that many of them will contribute on a large scale to foreign exchange earnings, directly and/or indirectly.

Many new job opportunities will be created, exports will be boosted dramatically, and the standards of living of all our peoples will improve. Obviously, this can only happen over a number of years.

7. BALANCE OF PAYMENTS SITUATION

Viewing our balance of payments problems against the background that I have sketched, it can be said that we have plans to manage the situation, but that at the same time, any renewed or increased inflow of capital will considerably benefit South Africa.

It is furthermore logical that any easing of the tensions in Southern Africa will make it possible to save on defense and allied expenditure and will practically overnight result in an increased inflow of capital.

Remedial Measures

Under the circumstances of fighting inflation, coping with the recessionary economic situation, handling in the best possible manner the balance of payments shortfall and on top of all that experiencing a rapidly declining gold price and a decline in foreign capital inflow, the South African authorities had to implement rather severe and formerly unknown methods of dealing with the situation. These have taken the form of severe credits restrictions through the banks, an import deposit scheme to discourage imports, the scaling-down of certain development projects already mentioned, increased loan levies and expediting as far as possible the development of several foreign exchange earners.

The situation is manageable, but as in other countries, it cannot be managed without certain hardships, more specifically unemployment in certain categories. This, in the South African context—with its large number of underdeveloped people and racial problems—is undoubtedly a more serious matter than in most other countries.

As a rough indication we project the future trend of the current account of our balance of payments as follows:

Deficit on current account:	Million
1976	$1,700
1977	1,400
1978	1,100

As far as our unemployment situation is concerned, it may be expected that the present 4–5 percent will increase to 6 percent by the end of the year; and possibly up to 7 percent by the middle of next year. It will, however, improve towards the end of 1977 as the expected economic recovery gets under way.

Although South Africa is at the present time going through a downward economic phase, our economy will, I believe, regain its normal upward growth path before long. Obviously, those who want to make the most of the opportunities offered by the new growth era should not wait until the upswing actually starts. They should begin preparing themselves accordingly; they may have to start investing right now.

*A literate person, in this context, is seen as any person older than six years of age who has passed any standard at school.

8. OUR MINERAL AND OTHER RAW MATERIAL RESOURCES

It has been said that the Good Lord gave South Africa the most complex racial situation in the world, but that He compensated by also giving it some of the world's richest natural resources.

Others have said that if the Communist world should succeed in controlling, in addition to their own, also the resources of South Africa, they could create a monopolistic advantage for themselves which would make the OPEC cartel look like a kindergarten party.

What in fact are the known resources of South Africa? And how important are they to the Western World?

The Russian hope of a commodity "OPEC"

There has been a spate of press reports recently, stating that South Africa is not important to the West and that the West, more specifically the U.S.A. could do without her.

Is this true?

Let us forget, for the moment, about South Africa's strategic importance: that she is situated at perhaps the most vital or sensitive corner of the sea-lanes which already carry 24,000 ships per annum—mostly tankers—bound for Europe and America.

These lanes carry the supplies of most of Europe's oil, and will, towards the turn of the century, carry 60% of the U.S.A.'s oil needs.

Let us first concentrate on South Africa's mineral and other raw material production and reserves, at time when the major Western industrial countries are at least beginning to give some attention to possible future commodity shortages.

a. Actual Mineral Production.—Interesting features of South Africa's mineral production includes the following:

Our annual gold production of nearly a million kilograms, forms more than 70% of all the gold produced in the Western world.

About 50% of all the gem diamonds of the world are produced in South Africa and South West Africa, as well as large quantities of industrial diamonds.

South Africa is the largest producer of platinum in the free world. This is an essential ingredient in fertilisers and in many metallurgical processes; and it is widely used in the jewellery trade.

South Africa is the world's second largest producer of chromium after the U.S.S.R. It is said that Rhodesia possesses the largest reserves of high grade chromium. Together with South Africa, the region holds 96% of the world's chromium resources.

Other minerals include manganese, vadium, fluorspar, asbestos, antimony, vermiculite, titanium, nickel, amosite and, of course, coal and iron ore.

South Africa's mineral sales during 1975 consisted of the following (in $ millions):

	1975
Gold	2,944
Coal	363
Diamonds	200
Copper	168
Manganese	117
Asbestos	105
Nickel	71
Iron Ore	48
Chrome	47
Limestone	45
Vanadium	44
Phosphates	29
Antimony	26
	4,207
Others	546
Total	4,753

The total value of $4,753 million was up 5,2% on the 1974 figure despite the world economic recession, and despite a drop in the gold price as well as a 2,2% decline in the volume of gold production—which led to a decline of 3,3% in the net gold output during 1975. Under expansionary economic conditions the annual increase could be considerably more. However, to what extent this will or could make up for the decline in the gold price, remains to be seen.

South Africa supplies Germany with 80% of its blue asbestos, 53% of its manganese, 45% of its chrome ore and virtually all of its gold and diamonds.

b. South Africa's Mineral Reserves.—South Africa's biggest lack, so far, is oil. But this drawback is offset by extensive coal fields, which supply fuel for most of the country's power needs. Sasol I's oil-from-coal process already makes sizeable contribution to the country's petroleum needs, and when Sasol II comes on stream the two plants will be able to provide about 40% of South Africa's 1975 oil needs.

South African coal is among the cheapest to mine in the world, and she relies on coal for 75% of her energy needs—compared with a world average of 32%.

Uranium

Furthermore, South Africa has 25%–30% of the Western world's uranium resources. South African scientists have developed a unique and much cheaper method of enriching uranium, a breakthrough which will stand her in good stead in years to come.

With existing mineral resources, South Africa is regarded as one of the world's top four mining countries. According to Dr. Robert A. Kilmarx of Georgetown University, Washington, South Africa is next to Australia and just below America and Soviet Russia as far as non-fuel mineral wealth is concerned.

South Africa's estimated mineral reserves, as a percentage of world and Western reserves, are as follows:

[Percent]

	Of world reserves	Western reserves
Gold	65	72
Chromium	72	75
Platinum	60	70
Manganese	50	72
Vanadium	50	73
Uranium	25	30
Iron ore	6	8
Nickel	2	3
Asbestos	14	16
Coal	2	5
Diamonds	50	60
Copper	2	4

It is clear from these figures that South Africa's mineral resources are quite remarkable. While she only accounts for 0.8% of the world's surface, and has only 0.5% of the globe's population, she is exceeded only by the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. in world Mineral Production. This is the position at the present time. It is not impossible that, in the future, South Africa will compare even more favourably.

It remains to be said that, in her mining history of about a century, South Africa has acquired a greater knowledge of underground mining than any other country in the world.

This country holds every possible world record for shaft sinking and is a world authority and adviser on rock mechanics, mining ventilation, hydro-metallurgy, exploration techniques, and the refining of petrol from coal.

c. Global Importance.—The 20 metallic and 30 non-metallic minerals mined in South Africa include almost every raw material needed by modern industry.

The U.S.A., Russia and China each consume more raw materials than they can produce. They are net importers of commodities. The U.S.A. alone, consumes about 30% of the world's annual production of raw materials and energy. The rest of the world, especially Western Europe and Japan, may be forced to look to possibly only four countries for its supply of raw materials—South Africa, Australia, Canada and Brazil.

Out of 122 countries classified as "developed" today, 48 (or 40%) have no mining industries whatsoever.

Against this background, is it logical to say that South Africa is of no importance to the West?

There are many who believe that South Africa will in the future increasingly be the raw material store-room for the Free World.

d. The Russian Strategy.—According to a Special Report of the "E.R.C. World Market Perspective" of Vancouver, Canada, ". . . the really important events which will shape future world-wide economic events . . . are being largely ignored . . . we believe that the stage in South Africa is currently being set for an international powerplay which could radically change the course of political, military and economic events for the remainder of this century . . ."

Their thesis, in essence, boils down to this:

The U.S.S.R. can survive at its present level of economic and military activity only by purchasing food and technology from the West;

The U.S.S.R. is rapidly exhausting its international line of credit, having run a record $5 billion trade deficit in 1975;

The principal liquid asset that the U.S.S.R. can offer the West in exchange is gold, but the international price of gold is nearly at a two year low;

South Africa is the U.S.S.R.'s only major competitor in supplying newly-mined gold bullion, and other raw material to the international markets. South Africa's sales tend to depress international prices;

A political and military vacuum exists in Southern Africa because the U.S.A., Britain and Western Europe have now for a long time pretended that this area of the world has ceased to exist—despite its strategic importance, and despite its obvious economic importance to the West.

"The next logical target (for the U.S.S.R.) . . . would be to Sovietize South Africa, not only to get control of the world's most strategic shipping lanes, but also to take over South Africa's gold and mineral production".

By controlling, largely, the supply of the world's main raw material resources, Russia could manipulate prices at will, and replenish Russian granaries with western crops.

Russia will in fact be able to hold the world at ransom as far as raw materials are concerned—a commodity "OPEC"!

Look at the combined strengths:

80 percent of the world's gold,
76 percent of all chrome,
90 percent of all platinum,
75 percent of all manganese,
80 percent of all vanadium, and
50 percent of the world's uranium.

High Quality Steel.—In addition South Africa has the largest fluorspar reserves in the world. Fluorspar, chrome, manganese and vanadium are essential for the production of high quality steel, such as that used in the armament industry.

Of no importance to the West?

Gold.—When it comes to gold, I have been pleading for some 20 years for an entirely new approach to this most unique metal. I would like South Africa to launch a major goldsmith, goldrefining and conversion industry, to produce a wide range of articles in gold and to develop a world-wide market for them.

Admittedly, this kind of project could not possibly render colossal returns overnight, but over a period of time, it could hold tremendous advantages for South Africa.

9. STRATEGIC VALUE OF THE SEA ROUTES AROUND THE CAPE

The strategic importance of the sea lanes around the Cape of Good Hope has been mentioned previously: 24,000 ships around the Cape each year, mostly carrying oil for Europe and America.

Admiral Ralph Cousins, Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic and Commander in Chief of the Atlantic Fleet during 1974 said recently, while speaking on the possibilities of wars of economic sabotage:

"The most obvious example would be an attempt by the Soviet Union through a naval guerrilla war to interrupt oil shipments out of the Persian Gulf to Europe and the West. One option open to the Soviets would be submarine or missile patrol boat attacks on tankers once they have left the Persian Gulf and headed south to round the Cape of Good Hope. Naval authorities in the West should be acutely conscious of the importance of this route to America and her allies".

The British Labour Government's decision to abandon the Royal Navy's base at Simonstown at the very tip of the Cape may well be considered in future as an act of folly. By abandoning Simonstown, the British gave up the only fully-developed, modern deep-water naval base on the coast of Africa. The Simonstown naval base contains protected submarine pens, is large enough to accommodate nuclear powered submarines, and has the facilities to repair warships as large as cruisers.

In the bowels of the Silvermine mountain, to the north of the base, is the Cape naval radio installation, a major communications facility. The same mountain houses electronic intelligence-gathering devices that keep track of naval traffic in the waters around Southern Africa—an electronic eye that scans most of the Indian and Atlantic oceans.

The noted American military expert, Drew Middleton, put it as follows:

"The decision to abandon the base went hand in hand with the emotional drive among British and American liberals to ostracize South Africa for its race policies. In the present global strategic situation, the U.S.A., and certainly Britain, cannot afford these fits of ideological self-indulgence. It can only be hoped that unofficial arrangements can be worked out between these navies and the South African government for the use of Simonstown in war or crisis".

10. INVESTMENTS FROM OVERSEAS AND CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS

There are today foreign investments in South Africa to the tune of approximately $15,000 million. The major sources of these investments are as follows:

	Amount in millions	Percent of total
* European Common Market countries	$9,750	65
Other European countries	1,200	8
North and South America	2,550	17
African countries	450	3
Asia	250	2
Others	800	5
Total	15,000	100

* Direct German investment in South Africa totals $213 million, while a further $1,662 million was invested indirectly. Germany thus contributes about 12 percent of all foreign investments in South Africa.

For these calculations, we have allowed for a net capital inflow of $1,200 million per annum in the foreseeable future, which is not unrealistic when it is compared with capital inflow figures of previous years. Any increased inflow will, of course, make more rapid economic development possible. A slow-down in investment inflow will on the other hand reduce our economic growth rate and lead to lower employment figures. This, in turn, will depress standards of living—especially among the peoples that cannot afford it.

11. FUTURE INTERNAL MARKET POTENTIAL

Population projections indicate that towards the year 2000 South Africa should have a total population living here of some 55 million. And provided a satisfactory growth rate, let's say an average of 6% per year, can be maintained, the general average standards of living of this relatively large population, could perhaps be 3 to 4 times of what it is today.

Here is therefore a most promising and lucrative market potential unfolding not only for South African manufacturers but also for the country's trading partners.

12. THE POTENTIAL FOR ECONOMIC COOPERATION IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

Nobody has as yet made careful calculations and projections about the obvious potential of co-operation among the 10 or so countries in Southern Africa. Some indicators, however, are as follows:

a. Harnessing the waters generating electricity, irrigating the arable land, growing the foodstuffs, exploiting, converting and refining the minerals and other raw materials and selling all these to the rest of the world, indicate mind-boggling opportunties.

b. South Africa has the technology and the know-how to master all of these projects as envisaged. For instance, we are the only country in Africa where food production at roughly 4,0% per annum grows faster than the population increase of 2,7%.

Only 12% of our total land area is arable. Yet the country produces more than enough food, and considerable quantities can be exported—mainly maize, sugar and wool. Exports amount to $1 300 per annum depending, of course, on weather conditions.

c. South Africa also has the know-how about matters such as pest-control, elimination of diseases and the application of the most modern scientific techniques in agriculture and for breeding purposes.

d. South Africa has the world's most up-to-date knowledge of deep-level mining and many other relevant forms of expertise to help exploit the enormous latent resources.

e. As a money and capital market, South Africa is already far advanced, with the most modern institutions, some of which lead the world in innovation and modernity.

Furthermore, the country has an excellent reputation for credit-worthiness.

Once peace has settled and co-operation becomes a way of life, the world's future El Dorado is likely to be here in Southern Africa.

13. THE RACIAL AND POLITICAL SITUATION

What then is holding back or preventing this dream of prosperity, wealth and happiness in South Africa?

For almost 30 years now, South Africa has been the skunk among nations.

It all really started with the so-called winds of change—the breaking away from the old colonial system and the swing to practically the opposite—Uhuru, the ideal of freedom under majority rule.

Now in Africa there are those clamouring for freedom—a system of majority rule on the one man, one vote basis on the one hand and, on the other hand, there are those who maintain that this is not possible in the African context, simply because it cannot work at all where the people are not yet educated, experienced, and mature enough in their thinking about matters of state, economy, psychology and politics.

The latter maintain that a gradual evolutionary process is in the interest of both the developed and under-developed.

It is also true that with all the glamour of freedom and so-called majority rule, the African picture today looks as follows:—

Out of the 49 independent states, 7 are considered as having multi-party, more or less democratic, forms of government. They are South Africa, Botswana, Rhodesia, Gambia, Morocco, Mauritius and Senegal.

Another 20 have partly-elected one-party governments; and 20 states fall under military regimes or dictatorships.

Two governments—Comora and Lesotho—are transitional at present, changing from multi-party to single-party states.

The Homelands concept in South Africa.—In South Africa itself, it was foreseen by certain leaders such as the late Dr. H. F. Verwoerd, that majority rule might be demanded before it could be practical. And therefore, the homelands concept was devised.

Now basically one might reason that there is absolutely nothing wrong with the homelands concept provided it is planned and developed in a just manner. It is really not at all different from what happened for instance with the former British Protectorates and in many other parts of the world.

What went wrong?—Personally, I believe that the main issue that went wrong was that in South Africa, in addition to the homelands concept, existing forms of discrimination were legalised and new ones were introduced as they were considered necessary to bring the homelands plan to fruition and to eliminate friction and incidents in the interim. Furthermore, the whole plan left some obvious, serious questions unanswered. For instance, the specific future position of the Asians and the Coloureds as well as the future of the obviously irreducible number of urban Blacks; i.e. those Blacks permanently settled for a long, long time in the White or mixed areas and for whom very little justification if any can be found for making them citizens of a country they have never known.

Well, again in my personal humble view, all this set the ball rolling for innumerable racial "incidents", exactly the ammunition the enemies of the West needed to blow up around the world through the overseas media and other important bodies, thereby estranging millions of people from us in South Africa and making it more and more difficult for our friends to stand by us or to be seen in our company.

Having said all that, I do not want to leave the impression that there are not many forms of discrimination which cannot be justified in any way and which we simply must abandon.

But, in any case, in the unfolding of this pattern much fertile ground was created for the enemies of the West to plan the take-over of the resources and the strategic situation in South Africa.

Soweto.—There is not one, but many reasons—for events such as the riots in Soweto and I for one, have been advocating many changes over the last 25 years many of which have not been implemented or listened to. Serious and urgent attention to many of the issues involved is vitally necessary.

I believe, for instance, that a clear vision of their future must be created for the three groups I have mentioned, and that with some modifications and adjustments, the homelands programme, or a new version of the homelands programme, can be a saleable product to the Western World.

I believe that the Coloureds, the Asians and the irreducible number of urban Blacks must, over a period of time, be totally accepted and become part and parcel of the future South Africa proper.

Discrimination on colour in all its various forms must be eliminated. Merit must take its place.

Furthermore, I believe the homelands concept, in some form or another, is for the foreseeable future irreversible and that it does provide the valid advantage of allaying the fears of the Whites and several other groups of being swamped, kicked out or wiped out as has traditionally happened in other parts of Africa.

The South Africa Foundation.—I am wearing for this occasion also my South Africa Foundation hat.

The South Africa Foundation is a quite unique body. I believe really the only one of its kind in the world.

Its members (5,000), its Board of Trustees (350) and its Council (35) represent all shades of political viewpoint, from the extreme right to the extreme left in the South African context; it is multi-racial on all three levels; and furthermore not only trade and industry, but all sectors of national life in South Africa are represented, such as the academics, the clergy, the various professions, agriculture, even sports organisations.

I consider the Foundation the most representative organisation in South Africa.

It is basically a research, fact-finding and fact-distributing organisation; projecting outwards to the rest of the world the facts about South Africa, be they good or bad; and projecting inwards to and among South Africans the facts of life both in South Africa and elsewhere; and how all these are related and interrelated.

The Foundation stays out of active party politics.

The basic concept is "to bring light into dark minds", in the belief that knowledge, perspective and wisdom will lead to understanding and the wisest and most logical and mature policies.

I would like to recommend to all of you who are interested in South Africa to join the Foundation as members. There are no obligations but very important advantages. For instance, receiving the monthly South Africa Foundation News, the quarterly South Africa International and many other regular mailings of the Foundation will keep you informed, in an entirely unbiased and unprejudiced manner, about events and trends in South Africa—in fact, the facts of life in, and how they relate to, South Africa.

In my position as President of the South Africa Foundation, I can highlight what the indicators indicate, what the vital issues are, what the trends and events are and how they are related and interrelated. I can also tell you to some extent what the components of a future specific blueprint for South Africa obviously must be. I cannot, however, spell out in technical detail my own ideal blueprint without getting involved in South African party politics, something the Foundation has to avoid if it wants to continue to exist and play the vital role for which it is known.

I do believe, however, that I have indicated to you at least a few of the obvious essential changes. I am convinced they and many others will take place and that South Africa will, over the next few years, again take its place in the front line of leading Western nations.

A vision of South Africa towards the year 2000.—So, how do I see the trend of events, and what will South Africa look like towards the year 2000?

Well, I do not expect plain sailing all the time. At times it will look like taking two steps forward and then suddenly two and a half steps backward. However, the longer-term evolutionary trend will be towards democratic rights for all.

I also expect our society to remain basically a free capitalistic one, but one with more of a social consciousness than old time capitalism.

I expect the unfolding of a most lucrative home market (50–55 million people) with fascinating trading and investment opportunities.

I expect the Coloureds, the Asians and the "irreducible number of Urban Blacks", i.e. those Blacks that cannot and will not be absorbed in one way or another in the Homelands, to reach practical parity with one another and with the Whites in the political sense in White or rather "mixed" South Africa; and the general average living standard in South Africa should, at that time, be about three to four times what it is today.

The population composition towards the year 2000 will probably be roughly as follows:

South Africa

	Number	Percent of total
Whites[1]	9,000,000	28
Coloureds	5,500,000	17
Asians	1,500,000	5
Urban blacks[2]	16,000,000	[3] 50
Total	32,000,000	100

[1] Given a vigorous immigration effort.

[2] In the "white areas"—outside the independent homelands.

[3] It is possible that an unknown percentage of these will be "quest workers." For instance, those working in the present border industries will in any case live permanently in their respective homelands—giving rise to a lower percentage of blacks in "white" or "mixed" South Africa.

Homelands

Name of homeland	Number	Percent of total
Transkei	4,000,000	19
Ciskei	1,300,000	6
Bophutatswana	2,400,000	12
Lebowa	2,800,000	14
Gazankula	900,000	5
Venda	700,000	4
Swazi	800,000	4
Kwazulu	5,600,000	27
Basotho-Qwaqwa	2,000,000	9
Total	20,500,000	100
Grand total	52,500,000

According to present Government policy it is intended that these nine Homelands must become completely independent. Opposition parties and many other observers believe that a Federal, Provincial or more or less similar system, would be preferable and might be the ultimate pattern; or perhaps the ultimate pattern for some of the intended Homelands.

The new concept of a multi-racial Cabinet Council at persent being introduced could be considered as at least a positive evolutionary step towards the future of South Africa I have visualised for you.

What about now? My message to you!

In the meantime, my message to you and all others who are interested in South Africa is briefly this:

a. Please be aware of the trend towards over-accentuation in practically the whole wide world by everybody—periods of prosperity are fuelled too much in a cumulative manner and the same applies to periods of recession and depression.

South Africa is not being washed down the drain!!

But what about the riots???

Let me try to answer your question as follows:

I believe that the experience of other societies, including the United States, is relevant to our own, particularly to the events of the past few months, in a much more profound way than is usually recognised. It was that great historian of both America and France, Alexis deTocqueville, who was the first to point out that one significance of the French Revolution was that it occurred not at the beginning of the 18th Century, when France was a despotic monarchy and laid heavy feudal exactions on the peasantry, but at the end of that century, when the absolutism of the monarchy had been greatly tempered, when most of the feudal exactions had been removed and when 60% of the French peasantry owned their own land. The paradox was, he wrote, that it was precisely in those parts of France where there had been most improvements that discontent ran highest:

"Patiently endured so long as it seemed beyond redress, a grievance comes to appear intolerable once the possibility of removing it crosses men's minds. For the mere fact that certain abuses have been remedied draws attention to the ills and they now appear more galling; people may suffer less, but their sensibility is exacerbated!"

Indeed deTocqueville's thesis provides an analogy the force of which should be familiar to Americans. For it was not during the years of greatest black oppression in the United States that black Americans rose in revolt. As Professor Edward Banfield has pointed out, for 20 years prior to July 18, 1964, there were few riots by blacks, and none of them was a major riot, involving several hundred rioters and lasting more than a day. Rather the worst riots occurred after the series of decisions and acts—the Brown v. Board of Education decision of 1954, the Civil Rights Act of 1957, 1960, 1963, 1964, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965—which had largely completed the process of reversing the historical discrimination against blacks in America. In 1966, for example, there were 11 major and 32 minor riots and in 1967, there were 25 major and 30 minor riots.

Nor were the riots in America manifestations of wide-spread outrage by blacks, as elaborate surveys of black opinion has indicated.

Nor did the riots generally occur in areas where oppression or racial discrimination or poverty were most prevalent. The worst riot occurred in Detroit which had been regarded as one of the most enlightened cities in its racial policies.

b. Majority rule has become a credo which is void of logic in large parts of the world. Even in the United Nations the super powers appear to have retained some veto rights. Simple democratic majority rule has not worked in any under-developed country in a satisfactory manner. It would mean the same as giving every child a driver's licence. In practise in Africa it usually amounts to only "One Vote once"!!!

Maybe "maturity rule" could be made the new credo in the place of minority and majority rule.

c. As leaders in our world of today, please make a study of the relative moralities and principles of justice and fairplay as applied by major bodies such as the World Council of Churches and the United Nations.

Is it not high time that the civilised world agrees on a new set of moralities and principles that could be applied by all to all in the same manner? One that will exclude the childish and immoral Double Standards.

Abandoning the blatant double standards will have the effect of also eliminating or minimising the miseries of many more millions of people that can be found in South Africa and the rest of Africa.

d. Please ponder the ideal which I believe in, namely that Africa, and especially South Africa, is bound over a shorter or longer period to become the new El Dorado of the future world. Once the tide begins to turn, I expect a scramble of people and capital to get in. Those who are there now and who get in first, are going to reap very, very rich harvests indeed . . . !

Please make a study of South Africa and its potential; and especially come along and have a look with your own eyes.●

FULL VOTING REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—ALONE WITH BRAZIL

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in connection with House Joint Resolution 554—the pending constitutional amendment now on the Senate calendar to provide full voting representation in Congress for the District of Columbia—the Library of Congress has recently completed a survey of the status of capital cities in all nations with a popularly elected national legislature.

According to the study, among 115 nations with elected national legislatures, the United States and Brazil stand alone in denying representation in the legislature for citizens of the Nation's Capital City.

The Library of Congress analysis is an important study in comparative government and a significant source of additional support for the proposed constitutional amendment, which offers Congress the chance to end the serious injustice perpetrated on the 700,000 citizens of Washington, D.C. They deserve a voice in the Senate and the House like any other American citizen, and like citizens in other nations the world over.

The new study provides dramatic documentation of the lonely and reactionary position of the United States in the international community with respect to one of the fundamental and most widely recognized human rights in the world today—the right to vote for elected representatives. The study makes clear that in this important respect the United States, the emperor of human rights, has no clothes. Aside from the authoritarian and repressive regime of Brazil, America stands alone among the nations of the world in imposing this flagrant restriction on the civil and political rights of the citizens of its Capital City.

According to the study, the virtually universal practice in nations with elected legislatures—whether democracies or totalitarian systems—is to accord representation to the Capital City on a parity with other cities in the nation. A key element of the study is its documentation that even in nations with federal systems of government like the United States, this principle of parity is followed.

The study included 16 federal nations, with the following findings:

Nine federal nations: (Australia, Canada, West Germany, India, Nigeria, Pakistan, Switzerland, the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia) have capital cities which are not special federal districts and which receive the same representation in the legislature afforded to other cities.

Seven federal nations (Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Malaysia, Mexico, Venezuela, and the United States) have capital cities which are federal districts with a special status similar to that of the District of Columbia. Only Brazil and the United States deny voting representation in the legislature for residents of the capital cities.

It is clear from this study that opponents of representation in Congress for the District of Columbia cannot hide behind the Federal analogy. Theoretical arguments for denying representation, based on the view that the District of Columbia is not a State, are easily outweighed by the demand of the citizens of the Capital City to participate in the basic rights of democracy. With the exception of Brazil, other federal nations, modeled on our own Federal Government have resolved this issue against discrimination and in favor of representation for the capital. In this respect, the onrushing tide of world democracy and human rights has left the United States sadly in its wake.

Mr. President, I ask that the Library of Congress study, which was prepared by David Nispel and Nina Shafran of the Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division, may be printed in the RECORD.

The study follows:

NATIONAL LEGISLATURES AND CAPITAL CITY REPRESENTATION

(By David Nispel and Nina Shafran, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, May 31, 1978)

INTRODUCTION

This study examines the ways in which different nations provide for electoral representation of residents of their capital cities. A comprehensive survey was made of the 115 countries—16 federal and 99 unitary systems—that have at least one elected legislative body. Basic data on the legislatures themselves—their memberships, bases of electoral districts, suffrage—were collected along with data on how residents of the capital cities are represented. Since comprehensiveness was a primary criterion, countries were included even though their legislative bodies may not have significant independent authority, or the elections of their members may not be "free."

Of the 115 countries studied, 113 were found to provide the residents of the capital city with representation in their national legislatures.* The United States was one of only two countries, the second being Brazil, that do not make provisions for such representation.

The countries examined have been placed into three groups: (1) all countries that have national (elected) legislatures, but are not federal states—a total of ninety-nine; (2) the nine countries that are federal states but do not have "Federal Districts" as their capital cities; and (3) seven countries that are federal states and have specifically designated "Federal Districts" as their national capitals, much like the United States with its capital, the District of Columbia.

The following were the main sources used in conducting this study: the January 1978 issue of the National Basic Intelligence Handbook, put out by the Central Intelligence Agency; The Europa Year Book, 1977, Volumes I and II, which is published in London by Europa Publications Ltd.; the Political Handbook of the World: 1977, edited by Arthur S. Banks; and the Deadline Data on World Affairs series, for the years 1976–1978. In addition, the Inter-Parliamentary Union's study, Parliaments of the World (1976) was consulted, as were most of the foreign embassies and the country desks at the U.S. Department of State.

*For five of the ninety-nine non-federal states examined in Section I, specific information regarding the capital city's representation could not be confirmed by embassies in Washington. Based on all other sources consulted, however, there is no evidence that those five capital cities do not have full and equal representation in their national legislatures.

SECTION I

This section presents data for the national legislatures of countries that do not have federal systems. A total of ninety-nine countries are examined. Included in the comparative study are countries with competitive and one-party political systems. The countries selected for study all have at least one directly elected chamber. The factors considered in examining each country were: size of the legislature, the number of chambers, the number of political parties involved in the process, whether the members were elected or appointed, the basis of representation, and the existence of suffrage. In all cases, the status of the capital city in the legislature is noted.

Albania (Tirana)

One-party system exists. The People's Assembly consists of 250 deputies elected by popular vote. One deputy is elected for every 8,000 people on the basis of universal compulsory suffrage for all over age 18. In terms of representation, the capital city of Tirana is treated no differently from any other city.

Algeria (Algiers)

A single-party system with a unicameral legislature. The National Assembly (which reconvened in March 1977) consists of 261 members elected by direct and secret ballot from districts based on population. The capital city is represented through its electoral district, as are all cities.

Andorra (Andorra la vella)

The General Council is a unicameral body and consists of 24 members with one half elected every two years for a four-year term. Four members are elected from each of the country's six parishes. The capital city has representation in the General Council through its parish. Adults who are third generation Andorrans have suffrage. Traditionally, there are no political parties, only partisans for particular independent candidates for the General Council.

Antigua (St. Johns)

The legislature is a bicameral body with a 10-member appointed Senate, and a 17-member popularly elected House of Representatives. The capital city is treated the same as all other cities. Suffrage is universal. Antigua has a multi-party system.

The Bahamas (Nassau)

A multi-party system exists. The legislature is bicameral, consisting of a 16-member appointed Senate, and a 38-member House of Assembly directly elected on the basis of universal suffrage. The capital city is represented on the same basis as all other cities.

Barbados (Bridgetown)

The legislature is a bicameral body. All 21 members of the Senate are appointed. The 24-member House of Assembly is elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The members represent the 11 parishes, with seats distributed according to voting-population size. The capital city is located in St. Michael's parish, and receives representation as all other cities do. The system is multi-party.

Belgium (Brussels)

The bicameral legislature consists of a Senate and a Chamber of Representatives. The Senate has 181 members, 106 of whom are elected by direct popular vote, according to proportional representation; 50 members are elected by the 9 provincial councils; 25 members are co-opted by the Senate. The Chamber of Representatives consists of 212 members directly elected on the basis of universal suffrage. Administrative districts are based on population, and the capital city is given status equal to that of any other city.

Belize (Belmopan)

Although the country remains a British colony, it is self-governing with a bicameral legislature. The 8-member Senate is appointed while the 18-member National Assembly is elected by popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The system is multi-party. (Further information was not available.)

Botswana (Gaborone)

The Legislative Assembly consists of 36 members, 32 of whom are popularly elected, while 4 are elected by the 32 representatives. The House of Chiefs is a largely advisory body with 15 members, including the 8 principal tribes' chiefs serving ex officio, 4 elected sub-chiefs, and 3 members selected by the other 12. Constituencies are based on population. The capital city is represented on this same basis. A multi-party system with universal suffrage exists.

Bulgaria (Sofia)

The National Assembly is a unicameral body of 400 members popularly elected. Constituency boundaries are based on population. As a result, the caiptal city of Sofia is itself an electoral district. But it does not have any unusual status per se in terms of representation. Suffrage is universal and compulsory over age 18.

Burma (Rangoon)

The People's Assembly is a unicameral body of 451 members, all popularly elected on the basis of universal suffrage. The country is divided into administrative divisions (constituences) based on population. The capital city is represented on the same basis as all other cities. The Burma Socialist Program Party is the only legal party.

Cambodia (Phnom-Penh)

The People's Representative Assembly consists of 250 members popularly elected on both a regional and occupational basis, with universal suffrage. The Communist Party of Kampuchea dominates political life. It is unclear how the regional and occupational divisions are established. (Information on the representation of the captial city was not available.)

Cameron (Yaounde)

The Federal Republic of Cameroon, established in 1961, went through a transition in 1972 to a unitary form of government. The country adopted a new name—United Republic of Cameroon—and adopted a new constitution which provides for a unitary state headed by a strong executive. A single-party system exists. The National Assembly consists of 120 members elected by direct popular vote. Representation for the capital city is based on the same principles which determine representation for all other cities. Suffrage is universal.

Cape Verde Islands (Praia)

A unicameral National People's Assembly consists of 56 members who are elected by popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The Assembly includes only members of the official party (PAIGC). The capital city is represented on the same basis as all other cities.

China, Republic of (Taipei)

Both the National Assembly and the Legislative Branch have some parliamentary functions. The National Assembly is a unicameral body of 3,045 members nominally, but less than half of the seats are now filled. The Legislative Branch is nominally composed of 760 members. All members (both bodies) are popularly elected on a regional and occupational basis, by universal suffrage over age 20. The capital city is treated like any other city in terms of representation. The National Party (Kuomintang) has no real opposition.

Colombia (Bogota)

A multi-party system with a bicameral legislature. The 112-member Senate and the 198-member Chamber of Representatives are all elected on a basis of direct proportional representation with universal suffrage over age 21. The capital city of Bogota is represented on the same basis.

Cook Islands (Rarotonga)

A multi-party system with a bicameral legislative body. The Legislative Assembly has 22 members popularly elected by universal suffrage. The House of Arikis (chiefs) consists of 15 members who are appointed (an advisory body only). The capital city is represented according to its population, as are all other cities.

Costa Rica (San Jose)

The Legislative Assembly is a unicameral body with 57 members representing the provinces in proportion to population. The capital city is treated as all other cities, being represented through its province. All members are elected by direct popular vote. Suffrage is universal and compulsory over age 18.

Cyprus (Nicosia)

The House of Representatives nominally consists of 50 members (35 Greek and 15 Turkish) although Turkish participation has ceased. Elections for the Greek membership were by popular vote. A Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly was organized in 1975, consisting of 40 popularly elected members. A multi-party system. Constituencies are based on population. The capital city is no exception and has equal representation status.

Czechoslovakia (Prague)

The Federal Assembly is a bicameral body, with a Chamber of Nations and a Chamber of the People. The Chamber of Nations consists of 150 members, all popularly elected: the 2 Republics (Czech and Slovak) each select 75 members. The Chamber of the People consists of 200 members directly elected from districts based on population, thus giving the Czech nation a 2 to 1 majority over the Slovak nation in that house. The capital city is represented through its appropriate district. Suffrage is universal in a basically one-party system.

Denmark (Copenhagen)

The Folketing is a unicameral legislature whose 179 members are elected by direct popular vote under a modified proportional representation system: 135 are elected in 17 districts; 2 each from Greenland and the Faroe Islands; 40 additional seats are divided among parties which have secured at least 2% of the vote, but whose district representation does not accord with their overall strengths. The capital city of Copenhagen is included in this representation system. Suffrage is universal, and there are several competing parties.

Djibouti (Djibouti)

A unicameral Parliament consisting of 65 popularly elected members on the basis of universal suffrage. (Djibouti does not yet have an embassy in the United States, and specific information regarding the basis of representation was not available at the time of this study.)

Dominica (Roseau)

The unicameral legislature, the House of Assembly, consists of 21 members popularly elected on the basis of universal suffrage, plus 3 appointed members. (Further information not available.)

Dominican Republic (Santo Domingo)

A bicameral legislature with a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies, both elected by direct popular vote. The Senate consists of 27 members, 1 for each of the 26 provinces, and one for the National District which contains the capital city. There are 91 Deputies elected on the basis of 1 deputy for every 50,000 inhabitants in each province and the national district. Suffrage is universal and compulsory for those over age 18 or married, except members of the armed forces and the police, who cannot vote.

Egypt (Cairo)

The People's Assembly is a unicameral body elected (with exception—see further) by direct popular vote. Of its 350 members, 10 must be Coptic Christian, by appointment of the president if necessary. In 1976, the Coptic Christians secured 7 of 247 elected seats, their remaining 3 seats being filled by appointment. The country is divided into 175 electoral districts, based on population, with 2 representatives from each district. Because of its dense population, the capital city sends 80 representatives. Suffrage is universal. All political parties are banned.

El Salvador (San Salvador)

A multi-party system with a unicameral legislature. The Legislative Assembly consists of 52 members elected by direct popular vote on a proportional basis, with universal suffrage. The capital city has status in the Legislative Assembly the same as all other cities.

Equatorial Guinea (Malabo)

The People's National Assembly is a 60-member body elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. Representation is based on population size, and the capital city is no exception. But the President exercises virtually unlimited power. The National Unity Party of Workers is the only legal party.

Fiji (Suva)

The bicameral legislature consists of an appointed 22-member Senate, and a 52-member House of Representatives elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The seats are distributed as follows: 22 Fijian, 22 Indian, and 8 "general" seats. The capital city is treated as all other cities. A multi-party system exists.

Finland (Helsinki)

The 200-member Parliament (Eduskunta) is elected by direct popular vote from 15 districts under a system of proportional representation. Because of its dense population, Helsinki is heavily represented. Suffrage is universal. A multi-party system exists.

France (Paris)

A multi-party system with a bicameral legislature. The 490-member National Assembly is elected by direct universal suffrage from constituencies based on administrative units. The Senate consists of 283 members, 277 of whom are indirectly elected by electoral colleges, while the remaining 6 are co-opted by the Senate. Paris is represented in both chambers based on those same principles which apply to the rest of the country.

Gabon (Libreville)

The unicameral 70-member National Assembly has limited powers, but is elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. Electoral districts are based on population, and the capital city is included in this representation system. The Gabonese Democratic Party is the only legal party.

The Gambia (Banjul)

The House of Representatives is a unicameral body with 41 members: 4 chiefs are elected by secret ballot from among their own number; 3 non-voting members are appointed; the Attorney General sits ex officio and without a vote; 32 members are popularly elected by universal adult suffrage; there is also an appointed speaker. The country is divided into 35 electoral districts, based on population. The capital city constitutes a single district, and sends one representative to the House. A multi-party system exists.

German Democratic Republic (Berlin)

The People's Chamber is a unicameral body of 500 members, elected directly from a list of candidates presented by the Communist-controlled National Front. Suffrage is universal. There is essentially one party, with 4 token parties. The capital city receives status equal to all other cities in terms of representation in the Chamber.

Greece (Athens)

The unicameral Parliament consists of 300 members elected by direct, universal suffrage. The country is divided into 56 electoral districts. The capital city comprises two districts because of its dense population and sends 50 representatives altogether. A multi-party system.

Grenada (St. George's)

The bicameral legislature consists of a 13-member Senate appointed by the governor, and a 15-member House of Representatives, popularly elected on the basis of universal suffrage. The 15 House constituencies are based on population, and each constituency sends one representative. The capital city constitutes one of the constituencies. A multi-party system.

Guatemala (Guatemala City)

The unicameral National Congress consists of 61 members elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage, compulsory for literates, optional for illiterates. Each of the country's 23 districts sends at least 2 representatives to the Congress, depending on population. The capital city is represented through its district.

Guinea (Conakry)

The Democratic Party of Guinea is the only legal party. The unicameral National Assembly consists of 150 members, popularly elected on the basis of universal suffrage. The capital city is represented in the same manner as all other cities. The legislature has little independence.

Guyana (Georgetown)

The National Assembly is a unicameral body consisting of 53 members elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The whole country comprises one electoral body. The capital city has status equal to that of any other city.

Haiti (Port-au-Prince)

A single party system. The unicameral legislature is known as the Legislative Chamber for purposes of ordinary legislation, and as the National Assembly for more formal purposes. All 58 members are directly elected by universal suffrage. Electoral constituencies are based on population. The capital city is by itself a single constituency.

Hungary (Budapest)

The National Assembly is a unicameral body consisting of 352 members elected by direct, universal suffrage. The capital city has representation in the national legislature like any other city. The Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party is the only legal party.

Iceland (Reykjavik)

The Parliament consists of 60 members elected by a mixed system of proportional and direct representation. The members elect one third of their number to constitute the Upper Chamber, while the remainder make up the lower Chamber. The capital city has representation like all other cities in the legislature; currently, it sends a minimum of 12 representatives, based on its population. Iceland has a multi-party system.

Indonesia (Jakarta)

There are two legislative bodies. The People's Representation Council (DPR) is a partially elected body. Of its 460 members, 100 are appointed, 9 indirectly elected, and 351 directly elected under suffrage which is universal for all over age 17 and for all married persons regardless of age. The People's Consultative Assembly includes the 460 members of the DPR, plus 460 other members (chosen by several processes, but none directly elected). The capital city is represented in both chambers on the same principles that apply throughout the country. A multi-party system.

Iran (Teherán)

A single-party system with a bicameral legislature. The Senate has 60 members, of whom 30 are directly elected and 30 are appointed by the Shah. The National Consultative Assembly consists of 268 members, all elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The capital city is represented in both chambers on the same basis as any other city.

Ireland (Dublin)

The bicameral legislature consists of a Senate and a House of Representatives. The Senate has 60 members of whom 11 are appointed by the Prime Minister, 43 are indirectly elected from 5 panels of candidates established on a vocational basis; 6 members are elected by University electoral colleges. The House of Representatives has 144 members elected under a mixed system of direct universal and proportional representation. There are several political parties. As the capital city, Dublin does have representation in the legislature like that of any other city.

Israel (Jerusalem)

A multi-party system with a unicameral legislature. The Knesset consists of 120 members elected by direct universal suffrage on the basis of proportional representation from national party lists. The capital city enjoys equal representation in the legislature.

Italy (Rome)

The bicameral legislature consists of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies. The Senate currently has 323 members. 315 members are elected by direct popular vote; 5 are appointed by the President; former presidents are Senators by right. The Chamber of Deputies has 630 members elected by popular vote on a proportional basis. Suffrage is universal over age 18, except in Senatorial elections where minimum age of voter is 25. The capital city's representation is determined by the system employed throughout the rest of the country.

Ivory Coast (Abidjan)

A single-party system with a unicameral legislature. The National Assembly consists of 120 members elected by direct popular vote on the basis of universal suffrage. The capital city is represented in the legislature as all other cities are.

Jamaica (Kingston)

The bicameral legislature consists of a 21-member appointed Senate, and a 60-member House of Representatives, elected by direct and universal suffrage. The capital city sends representatives through the "parish" in which it is located. There are 2 political parties.

Japan (Tokyo)

A multi-party system with a bicameral legislature (Diet). The House of Councillors has 252 members, all of whom are popularly elected, based on population of the constituencies. Likewise, all 511 members of the House of Representatives are directly elected on a proportional basis. The capital city, because of its dense population, sends many representatives to each chamber. Suffrage is universal over age 18.

Kenya (Nairobi)

The unicameral National Assembly consists of 171 members, of whom 158 are elected by direct universal suffrage from single-member constituencies; 12 members are nominated by the President; the Attorney General is a member ex officio. The capital city of Nairobi enjoys status equal to that of all other cities in terms of representation. The Kenya Africa National Union is the sole party.

Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (P'yongyang)

The Supreme People's Assembly, a unicameral body, is composed of 579 members—one member per 30,000 people. Nominees for the Assembly are drawn from the dominating party, the Korean Worker's (Communist) Party. Elections to the Assembly are by universal suffrage and are to be held every four years. The last election was in November 1977. Members represent nine provinces, two special cities. P'yongyang is one of the special cities and has 73 delegates. This number is based on the population of P'yongyang metropolitan area.

Korea, Republic of (Seoul)

The legislature consists of the unicameral National Assembly, numbering 219 members. Two thirds of that total are elected by universal suffrage for six-year terms. There are 73 members appointed by the president and approved by the National Conference for Unification. A multi-party political system exists. Members represent nine provinces, two special cities. Seoul is one of the special cities and has 17 representatives. The number of elected members for each province and city is determined by population.

Liberia (Monrovia)

The Liberian Congress includes an 18-member Senate and a 74-member House of Representatives. All Senators serve for six year terms; there are two senators for each county. Monrovia is represented on the same basis as all other cities. Representatives are elected for four-year terms. Only one party exists, the True Whig Party. Universal suffrage prevails.

Liechtenstein (Vaduz)

The Diet is a unicameral body of 15 members directly elected on the basis of male suffrage and proportional representation. A multi-party system prevails. Vaduz is given full representation in the Diet.

Luxembourg (Luxembourg-ville)

Although the appointed 28-member Council of State retains some vestigial legislative functions, actual legislative responsibility is centered in the elected Chamber of Deputies. All 59 members are elected by direct popular universal suffrage on the basis of proportional representation. The capital city is treated in the same manner as all other cities in regard to electing representatives. A multi-party system exists.

Macao (Macao)

A unicameral Legislative Assembly consists of 17 members serving four-year terms. The Assembly includes the Governor, 5 appointed representatives, 10 elected representatives, and 1 member specially nominated. The 10 representatives are elected nationally and represent the entire State of Macao. The capital city is treated no differently from any other city. Many parties exist. Suffrage exists for adult Portuguese, Chinese and foreign residents.

Madagascar (Antananarivo)

A unicameral People's National Assembly of 137 members was elected through universal suffrage in June 1977. Only one party was permitted to slate candidates. However, six groups are now allowed to engage in political activity. Representation is based on population and the capital city holds status in the National Assembly just as all other cities do.

Malawi (Lilongwe)

A unicameral National Assembly is composed of 15 nominated and 60 elected members. All members are elected on the basis of population, the capital city included. One political party exists. Suffrage is universal.

Maldives (Male)

The Majlis is a popularly elected unicameral body. All 56 members are elected for five-year terms: two members are elected by the people of Male, and two each by the people of each atoll. The remaining 8 members are appointed by the president. No organized political party exists. Suffrage is universal.

Malta (Valletta)

The House of Representatives is a unicameral body consisting of 65 members. There are 13 electoral districts, 5 members for each district. Valletta is represented through its electoral district. Elections must be held within a five-year period for every new House. A two-party political system exists. Suffrage is universal.

Mauritania (Nouakchott)

The unicameral National Assembly consists of 70 members, including 7 representatives from the Western Sahara. Each member is elected directly for a five-year term. The Mauritanian People's Party approves a single list of national candidates for election. Suffrage is universal. Nouakchott is treated the same as all other cities in the National Assembly.

Mauritius (Port Louis)

The National Assembly consists of 62 directly elected members and 8 specially selected members. It is a unicameral body. There are 20 three-member constituencies, and one two-member consistuency. Seats are distributed on the basis of population. The capital city is represented on this same basis. A multi-party system exists. Suffrage is universal.

Monaco (Monaco-Ville)

The National Council consists of 18 members, who are elected nationally. Elections are held every five years. A multi-party system exists. Suffrage is universal. Monaco-Ville is given status in the National Council equal to that of all other cities.

Mongolia (Ulan Bator)

The national assembly is designated the People's Great Hural. This unicameral body contains 354 members, who are elected for four-year terms. Representation is based on population and Ulan Bator elects members on this same basis. Universal suffrage prevails. Assembly members are all from the sole existing party.

Morocco (Rabat)

The unicameral legislature, the House of Representatives, includes 264 members, each elected for four-year terms. Two thirds of the House are elected directly by universal suffrage, the remainder elected directly by workers, employers, and government representatives. A multi-party system exists, but parties function largely outside of the government. The capital city is treated no differently from any other city.

Nauru (Yeran: Administrative District)

The Parliament consists of 18 popularly elected members and is unicameral. Political parties have developed only since 1976. Two parties now compete for government control, and elections are to be held every 3 years. The Assembly elects Nauru's President. Suffrage is universal. Representation in Parliament is based on population and the administrative district of Yeran is represented on the same basis.

Netherlands (Amsterdam)

The legislature (States General) consists of an indirectly elected First Chamber and a directly elected Second Chamber. The first house was 75 members who are elected by the provincial legislatures. The second house contains 150 representatives each elected directly on the basis of proportional representation. Amsterdam enjoys representation status equal to that of all other cities. Universal suffrage and a multi-party system exist.

New Zealand (Wellington)

The legislature is a unicameral body including 87 members. Representatives are elected for three-year periods. Constituency boundaries are based on population. Wellington is represented through its electoral district. A multi-party system prevails, with candidates elected by universal suffrage.

Nicaragua (Managua)

The Nicaraguan Congress is a bicameral body. The Senate consists of 30 representatives who are elected from the sixteen "departments." The Chamber of Deputies is composed of 70 members elected from four regions. Representation is based on population. Representation for the capital, Managua, is determined on the same basis as other cities for both Chambers. There is suffrage for the married and literate at age 18, otherwise the voting age is 21. One major party dominates the System.

Norway (Oslo)

The parliament (Storting) is a modified unicameral body. Immediately after the general election, the Storting separates into two chambers (the Lagting and the Odelsting). There are 155 representatives, of which one fourth serve in the upper house and three fourths serve in the lower house. A competitive party system prevails. Parliament members are elected on the basis of proportional representation. The capital city of Oslo is represented on this same basis. Universal suffrage exists.

Panama (Panama City)

The National Assembly of Community Representatives is a unicameral popularly elected body. There are 505 representatives, one from each of the electoral districts. Panama City is represented like the rest of the country. The Assembly meets only one month each year. Political parties have been suspended. Suffrage is universal and compulsory.

Papua New Guinea (Port Moresby)

The House of Assembly is a unicameral body with 109 members. A maximum of 3 members may be appointed from that total. Papua New Guinea is divided into 20 provinces. Each province has 1 regional representative and "open electorate" representatives. The number of "open electorates" for all provinces, including the capital, is based on the population. Port Moresby comprises 2 provinces—the central province and a newly created national capital district. Members serve for four-year terms by virtue of preferential-type elections. A multi-party political system prevails. Suffrage is universal.

Paraguay (Asuncion)

The National Congress is composed of a Senate (30 members) and a Chamber of Deputies (60 members). All representatives are elected for five-year periods. Representation is based on population and Asuncion holds equal status in the National Congress. A multi-party system exists; however, the party which wins the election is automatically awarded two-thirds of the seats in Congress. The remaining seats are divided proportionately among the other parties. Suffrage is universal; it is compulsory for persons between the ages of 18 and 60.

Philippines (Manila)

In April 1978, elections were held for a new 200-member National Assembly. This was the first election conducted since martial law was imposed in 1972. Of the 200 Assembly members, only 165 were actually elected, the remainder being appointed (1 seat reserved for President Marcos, 16 seats reserved for various interest groups, and 18 seats reserved for the cabinet members). Manila elected 21 members to the Assembly. All Assembly members are elected on the basis of population by universal suffrage. A multi-party system exists, with one party dominant.

Poland (Warsaw)

A unicameral National Assembly is elected by direct compulsory universal suffrage. Each of the 460 members is elected for a four-term. Voters are presented with a single list of candidates approved by the National Unity Front. The Front also awards the number of seats in the legislature to the various eligible groups. Constituency boundaries are based on population. Warsaw enjoys the same level of representation as other cities.

Portugal (Lisbon)

The parliament consists of a unicameral Legislative Assembly with 263 members. Representation is on a proportional basis throughout the country, including the capital city of Lisbon. Elections are to be held every four years. Presently, there is military oversight of the legislative and political process. A multi-party political system prevails. Suffrage is universal with the exception of those persons who had previously participated in "undemocratic" groups.

Rhodesia (Salisbury)

The Rhodesian political situation is fluid. The current National Assembly is scheduled to be replaced by one reflecting majority rule on December 31, 1978. The current legislature is composed of 66 members, 50 white members elected by the white population, and 16 blacks appointed by the government. The country is divided into electoral districts; the capital city is represented through its district. The new National Assembly will be unicameral and contain 100 elected members. The white population will be reserved 28 seats for a period of ten years. Suffrage will be universal and a multi-party political systems will exist.

Romania (Bucharest)

The Grand National Assembly is a unicameral body of 349 members. Representatives are elected from single-member constituencies by compulsory universal suffrage. Most recent election was in 1975 when 139 of the total legislative seats were contested by two candidates. A Unity Front nominates all candidates. Bucharest receives the same degree of representation as other cities.

San Marino (San Marino)

The Grand and General Council is a unicameral body elected by popular vote. The 60 members are elected on a basis of proportional representation. The capital city is represented on the same basis as the rest of the country. A multi-party system exists. Suffrage is universal.

Senegal (Dakar)

The National Assembly is a 100-member unicameral body elected for a five-year period. One major party (Socialist) exists. Two other parties have been legalized, however. Assembly members are directly elected by adult universal suffrage. Dakar is treated as all other cities in terms of representation.

Sierra Leone (Freetown)

The House of Representatives is unicameral and consists of 100 members. The majority of seats (85) are filled by elected constituent representatives, while 12 seats are allocated to Chiefs, and 3 seats are filled by presidential appointment. Freetown is treated similarly to all other cities regarding representation. Two political parties exist. Suffrage is universal.

Singapore (Singapore City)

The Parliament is composed of 69 members and is unicameral. There is one major party, the ruling People's Action Party. It won all the seats in the last three elections. Four parties served as the opposition in the most recent election. Members to Parliament are elected by direct universal compulsory suffrage, on the basis of each electoral district's population. No district is given special status. The capital city is represented through its district.

South Africa (Pretoria)

The Parliament is a bicameral body composed totally of white members. There are 54 members in the Senate, 44 of whom are elected by provincial assemblies. The final 10 members are all appointed by the president. White voters directly elect the 171 members of the House of Assembly. A multi-party political system exists. General suffrage is restricted to the white population. Pretoria enjoys the same level of representation as all other cities.

Spain (Madrid)

The bicameral Cortes was popularly elected in June 1977. The Congress of Deputies, the more powerful body, is composed of 350 members elected by proportional representation. The Senate consists of 248 members, 207 of whom are directly elected. The King appoints the remaining 41 representatives. Because of dense population. Madrid constitutes a single electoral district, electing 32 deputies and 4 Senators. Universal suffrage and a multiparty system exist.

Sri Lanka (Colombo)

The unicameral National State Assembly has 168 representatives, all elected by direct universal suffrage. The capital city has status in the assembly on the same basis as all other cities. A multi-party system exists.

Sudan (Khartoum)

The Sudanese legislature consists of a 250-member unicameral People's Assembly. One-half of the members are elected directly by the people, 100 elected by various mass groups, and 25 appointed by the president. All members are elected from the various provinces and districts. Khartoum receives representation on an equal basis with other cities. Universal adult suffrage exists. All political parties, other than the Sudanese Socialist Union, have been banned since 1969.

Surinam (Paramaribo)

The 39-member Parliament is a unicameral body. All members are popularly elected for four-year terms. The capital city of Paramaribo enjoys equal representation in the Parliament. A multi-party system exists. Suffrage is universal.

Sweden (Stockholm)

The parliament, or Riksdag, is composed of 349 members. Proportional representation is responsible for the election of 310 of the members. Stockholm receives the same degree of representation as all other cities. The final thirty-nine seats are distributed among the contesting parties to insure definite proportionality. Numerous parties contest the elections. Suffrage is universal.

Syria (Damascus)

The People's Council is a unicameral body of 186 members. Members are directly elected, serving four-year terms. Damascus is one of 14 electoral provinces. Its status is the same as that of other provinces for purposes of representation. While four other parties are permitted to exist, the Baath Party is the dominant organization. Suffrage exists on a universal basis.

Tanzania (Dar es Salaam)

The National Assembly is organized on a unicameral basis. Members serve for a term of five years. The 218 representatives come from three sources: 57 are appointed from Zanzibar, 65 are appointed from the mainland, and 96 are directly elected from the mainland. All members are selected on the basis of their respective area's population. Dar es Salaam is represented through its electoral district. A single party exists. Suffrage is universal.

Tonga (Nukualofa)

The Legislative Assembly is composed of 21 members. Nobles elect 7 peers, the populace elects 7 members, and 7 representatives are Ministers of the Crown. Suffrage is granted to all adults who are literate and pay taxes. The capital city of Nukualofa is given equal representation in the Legislative Assembly. There are no political parties.

Trinidad and Tobago (Port of Spain)

The legislature is bicameral consisting of a 31-member Senate and 36-member House of Representatives. The former body is appointed, while members of the House are elected on a proportional basis. The capital, Port of Spain, is represented on this same basis. A multi-party system prevails. Suffrage is universal.

Tunisia (Tunis)

The National Assembly, a largely advisory body, is composed of one chamber and contains 112 members. Representatives are elected for five-year periods, from electoral districts based on population size. Tunis is represented with status equal to that of any other city. The political system is dominated by a single party which holds all Assembly seats. Suffrage is universal.

Turkey (Ankara)

The Grand National Assembly consists of the Senate of the Republic and the National Assembly. The Senate gains its membership from three sources: 150 members are directly elected for staggered six-year terms, 15 are appointed for staggered six-year terms by the president, and 18 members are given life terms. The National Assembly contains 450 members elected for four-year periods on a proportional basis. The capital city is represented under this proportional system. Many parties exist, and suffrage is universal.

United Kingdom (London)

The UK Parliament consists of two chambers, a House of Lords and a House of Commons. The former is selected partly by heredity, with the remainder appointed to service. Total membership is about 11,000. Only about 200–300 members regularly attend House of Lords sessions. The House of Commons has 635 members. Each representative is directly elected from single-member constituencies for a period of five years. The UK has a multi-party political system with universal suffrage. London, because of its large population, comprises 92 constituencies, and therefore sends 92 representatives to the House of Commons.

Vietnam (Hanoi)

The National Assembly is unicameral and contains 492 members, 249 from the northern part of the country and 243 from the southern part. Representation is on a proportional basis, and the capital city appears to be included in this system. One major party dominates. There are approved minor parties, however. Suffrage is universal.

Western Samoa (Apia)

The Legislative Assembly is a unicameral body elected for a period of three years. It is composed of 45 members elected by the heads of families and 2 members elected from universal suffrage. The 45 tribal chiefs represent no particular cities or regions. The other 2 Assembly members represent the country at large, including the capital city. There are no political parties.

Zaire (Kinshasa)

The National Legislative Council consists of 210 members and is a unicameral body. There is one deputy in the Council for every 100,000 voters. Kinshasa is treated no differently from other cities in terms of representation. Suffrage is universal and compulsory. Only one party is legalized.

Zambia (Lusaka)

The National Assembly is a unicameral body composed of a maximum of 136 members. Of that total, 125 are elected by universal adult suffrage. The president is allowed to appoint ten additional members. Lusaka has full representation status in the National Assembly. Only one party is legally recognized. All candidates must be party members. Suffrage is universal.

Sections II and III provide information on the national legislatures of countries which are "federal" and have at least one elected body, with particular attention to how their capital cities are represented in the legislature. The definition of "federal" used to select countries for study was that given by the 1960 edition of the Dictionary of American Politics, Edward C. Smith and Arnold J. Zurcher, editors, which reads as follows:

"Pertaining to the division of public powers in a state between one central government with authority to legislate on certain subjects and to enforce its will upon individuals, and numerous regional governments each having authority in other matters within its restricted territorial jurisdiction . . ." (pp. 148–149).

The authors of the present study made no attempt to distinguish between those countries in which provincial governments have actual and significant authority over local affairs, and those countries in which the states have authority in name only. On this basis, sixteen federal states are treated in this study:

Argentina	Mexico
Australia	Nigeria
Austria	Pakistan
Brazil	Switzerland
Canada	U.S.S.R.
Germany, Federal Republic of	United States
India	Venezuela
Malaysia	Yugoslavia

Nigeria, Pakistan and Argentina are included as special cases. Although their national legislatures have been temporarily dissolved, parliamentary elections are promised in the near future.

SECTION II

Of the sixteen federal countries named above, nine have capital cities which are not special Federal Districts. Section II compares these nine federal legislatures, which include: Austria, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Nigeria, Pakistan, Switzerland, U.S.S.R., and Yugoslavia. (The countries with Federal Districts are treated separately in Section III.) Factors considered in examining the legislatures were the same as in Section I, with additional emphasis placed on capital city representation to the national legislature, and local governmental structure.

Austria (Vienna)

A multi-party system with a bicameral legislature. The size of the Federal Council varies. At present, it consists of 58 members elected by provincial legislatures (the 9 Land Assemblies). The 183-member National Council is popularly elected by a system of proportional representation. Austria consists of 9 provinces (Lander), of which Vienna is one. Thus, the capital is both a province and a municipality at the same time. Each province elects a provincial assembly (by direct popular vote). Each provincial assembly then elects a governor and representatives to the 58-member Federal Council; Vienna sends 12 representatives. Vienna also elects representatives to the 183-member National Council, according to Austria's system of direct and proportional representation. Suffrage is universal.

Canada (Ottowa)

The legislature consists of a Senate and a House of Commons. All 102 members of the Senate are appointed by the Governor-General on the basis of 24 Senators per each of the four regions, plus 6 from Newfoundland. The lower house consists of 264 members, directly elected by universal suffrage from single-member districts. House seats are distributed on the basis of population. Canada is divided into 10 provinces and 2 territories. The capital city is located in Ontario, the most populous of the 10 provinces. Ottowa is mainly controlled by the government of Ontario. Under Canada's constitution, the federal government has no authority over local governments; the capital city is no exception. As representatives to both the Senate and the House of Commons are on regional and provincial bases, Ottowa has status in the national legislature equal to that of all other cities.

Germany, Federal Republic of (Bonn)

West Germany has a multi-party system with a bicameral legislature. The Federal Assembly consists of 45 appointed members, including 4 non-voting representatives from West Berlin. The National Assembly consists of 518 members elected by universal direct suffrage under a mixed system of direct and proportional representation. It includes 22 non-voting representatives from West Berlin. West Germany is divided into 10 states (Laender). Each state has its own constitution and an elected legislature which is empowered to legislate in all matters not expressly reserved to the federal government. Bonn was selected in 1949 to be the provisional seat of the government. Although there is some federal oversight, Bonn has no special constitutional status. Constituency boundaries are based on the Laender and population size. Thus, the capital city is like any other West German city with regard to legislative representation.

India (New Delhi)

India is comprised of 22 self-governing states and 9 Union Territories administered by the central government. The Parliament is a bicameral body consisting of a Council of States and a House of the People. The Council has 243 members, 231 of whom are indirectly elected by the Legislative Assemblies of the States and Union Territories; 12 are appointed by the President. The House of the People has 545 members of whom 542 are directly elected by universal suffrage (not more than 525 from the 22 states plus not more than 20 from the Union Territories). If the President is convinced that certain minorities are not adequately represented in the House, he can nominate additional members. The national capital, New Delhi, is located in one of the Union Territories (Delhi). (For this reason, New Delhi is not considered to be a separate "Federal District.") Electoral constituencies are based on population. New Delhi is one of 522 such districts, and popularly elects one representative to the House of the People. New Delhi is also represented in the Council of States according to India's system of indirect election.

Nigeria (Lagos)

The Federal Parliament was abolished following the 1966 military coup. The legislature had consisted of two chambers. The upper house, comprised of 56 Senators, received its membership from three sources. Each of the four regions was represented by 12 Senators, elected by the regional legislatures. The Federal Territory of Lagos, with a population of roughly one ninth the regional average, received 4 Senators elected by its legislature. The President appointed the remaining 4 Senators. The lower house contained 312 members, elected directly from single-member constituencies. A Supreme Military Council currently exercises both legislative and executive powers. All political parties have been banned since the 1966 coup.

Since 1976, the federal republic has consisted of 19 separate states. Lagos, the capital city, is considered to be one of those states. A return to democratic civilian rule has been promised by the current military government. The date for the leadership change is October 1979.

A series of steps are being taken to transform Nigeria into a new federal republic. A new capital city, to be called a Federal Capital Territory, is currently being constructed. Lagos will remain the capital until completion of the new District in 1986 or 1987. An elected constituent assembly is currently debating provisions for a new constitution, which will provide the Federal District with representation in both chambers of the legislature. The assembly has approved a provision granting the new District representation in the Senate. The states will each elect 5 Senators, while the District will elect one Senator (a total of 96 members). The proposed House of Representatives consisting of 450 members is to be elected on the basis of population. The new Federal District will be represented in the House on this basis. The new District is scheduled to have approximately 150,000 people, roughly one tenth the figure for the lowest-populated state.

Pakistan (Islamabad)

The federal republic consists of 4 provinces, the administered "Tribal areas," and the federal capital of Islamabad. The bicameral legislature was dissolved in July 1977, when the military assumed government control. Since the coup, Pakistan has operated under martial law. The former legislature was bicameral. The National Assembly was composed of 200 members who were directly elected on the basis of proportional representation. In addition, ten women were elected to the chamber by the National Assembly. The federal capital of Islamabad was represented on the same basis as all other cities. The upper house, the Senate, was permitted 63 members by the constitution. Islamabad was fully represented here, as well. Suffrage was universal. Numerous political parties remain in existence. The military leaders have promised that national elections will be held. However, no date has been firmly established.

Switzerland (Bern)

The Swiss Confederation is composed of 22 cantons, 3 of which are subdivided. Bern, the capital city, comprises one of the cantons. The Federal Assembly is bicameral, and consists of a Council of States and a National Council. Each of the cantons elects 2 representatives to the Council of States (a total of 44). The second chamber, the National Council, consists of 200 members. Representatives to the National Council are elected on the basis of proportional representation. Bern is represented on this same basis. The total membership from Bern will vary from one election to the next, keeping in step with its changing population figures. Universal suffrage and a multi-party system exist.

U.S.S.R. (Moscow)

The Soviet Union is composed of 15 Union Republics. The Supreme Soviet, which has exclusive legislative authority, is composed of two chambers, the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities. Moscow, as the capital city of both the R.S.F.S.R. and Soviet Union as a whole, is represented in each chamber. The Soviet of the Union is elected on the principle of one deputy for every 300,000 residents in an election district, and has 760 members. The Soviet of Nationalities is elected on the basis of territory. Each Republic, Region, and National Area is awarded a definite quota of seats. It has 750 representatives. The total membership in the two chambers, from Moscow, is 23. The capital city is treated the same as all other cities. Suffrage is universal, and one party prevails.

Yugoslavia (Belgrade)

The Yugoslav Socialist Federal Republic consists of six republics and two autonomous provinces. Belgrade is the capital city. A bicameral Federal Assembly exists. There are 30 delegates from each republic, and 20 delegates from each province, seated in the Federal Chamber. The second house, the Chamber of Republics and Provinces, consists of 12 representatives from each republic's assembly and 8 members from each provincial assembly, with a total of 88 members. Belgrade is represented in each Chamber of the Federal Assembly through the Republic of Serbia. Suffrage is universal, and a single party exists.

SECTION III

This section offers an analysis of the national legislatures of seven federal countries which now have Federal Districts as national capitals: Argentina (Buenos Aires), Australia (Canberra), Brazil (Brasilia), Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur), Mexico (Mexico City), Venezuela (Caracas), and the United States of America (Washington, D.C.). These seven legislatures are examined, considering those same factors as were mentioned in Sections I and II, with particular reference to the representation of the Districts in their respective national legislatures.

Argentina (Buenos Aires)

In March 1978, a military dictatorship took control of Argentina. The military junta has curtailed political activity by all parties, and has disbanded Congress. The Statute of the Revolution supercedes the constitution (although certain sections of the constitution remain in effect). The country is divided into 22 provinces, one National Territory, and one Federal District (Buenos Aires), the capital of the country. At the present time, authority over local affairs rests with the central junta. Prior to the takeover in 1976, the legislature was bicameral, consisting of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies. The Senate had 69 members, all popularly elected; 3 from each of the 22 states, and 3 from the Federal District. The Chamber of Deputies had 243 members, also popularly elected, from the 22 provinces and the Federal District on the basis of the population. According to this system, Buenos Aires had elected one seventh of the deputies to the Chamber. However, even under the constitution, Buenos Aires had few elements of home rule; the president was designated as "the immediate and local chief of the capital of the nation."

Australia (Canberra)

The country is divided into 6 federal states, plus 2 territories—The Northern Territory, and the Australian Capital Territory (Canberra). The bicameral legislature consists of a 64-member Senate which is popularly elected (10 Senators from each of the six federal states, and 2 from each of the territories; Canberra, the Capital Territory, has a population size only half as large as the smallest of the six states). The 124-member House of Representatives is popularly elected from constituencies based on population size. On this principle, Canberra sends 2 representatives to the House. As the capital of Australia, Canberry has no form of local government. The national Parliament has exclusive power to make laws for the peace and order of the Commonwealth regarding the seat of the government. The territory is governed by centrally-appointed officials who are advised by an 18-member elected assembly. Suffrage is universal.

Brazil (Brasilia)

Brazil consists of 22 states, 4 territories, and 1 Federal District as capital, Brasilia. Originally the capital of Brazil had been Rio de Janeiro. As part of the government's development plans for Brazil, a section of the dense jungle territory in the country's interior was designated as the site of a new capital, and actual work began in 1957. The new Federal District, named Brasilia, was inaugurated as the nation's capital on April 21, 1961.

The bicameral legislature consists of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies. The Senate has 66 members, all of whom are popularly elected: each of the 22 states elects 3 Senators. The size of the Chamber of Deputies varies but there are a minimum of 7 deputies from each state and 1 deputy from each territory. All are elected by direct popular vote. Currently there are 310 deputies. Brasilia does not send representatives to either House of the legislature, although, with its population of over one million, it is larger than two of Brazil's states and all four territories. The constitution had provided for full representation in the legislature for the capital, Rio de Janeiro. It provided for 3 Senators, as for each of the states, and a number of deputies to be determined by the same proportional system applied throughout the country. The Brazil constitution of 1946 contained provisions regarding the political organization of the new Federal District, stating that the federal legislature would govern the administrative and judicial powers.

Suffrage in Brazil is universal and compulsory over age 18, except illiterates and those stripped of their political rights.

Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur)

Malaysia is comprised of 13 states plus a separate Federal Territory—Kuala Lumpur—which serves as the national capital. Originally, Kuala Lumpur was both the seat of the government and the capital of the state of Salangor. A constitutional amendment in 1974 made Kuala Lumpur a separate Federal Territory, and the capital of Selangor was replaced by Shah Alam. Precise delimitation of the Federal Territory has yet to be made. The legislature of Malaysia is bicameral with a Senate and a House of Representatives. The Senate has 58 members; 32 of these are appointed by the Paramount ruler, and the remainder are elected by the thirteen state legislatures (2 from each state). Kuala Lumpur is administered directly by the federal government and has no elected legislature. It does not send representatives to the Senate which is not a popularly elected body. It does send representatives to the House, the dominant legislative body, which has 154 members elected by direct popular vote from constituencies based on population. On this basis, Kuala Lumpur sends 5 representatives. A multi-party system exists, and suffrage is universal.

Mexico (Mexico City)

The Mexican National Congress is composed of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies. The Senate contains 64 members, each elected for six-year terms. The lower house, as of 1976, had 230 members elected for three-year terms. Members are elected on the basis of population, each deputy representing about 200,000 people. All are popularly elected by universal suffrage. A multi-party system exists, with one party as dominant.

The Mexican federal republic comprises 31 states and a Federal District. Mexico City is the capital of the republic. The District consists of Mexico City itself, and nearby towns and villages. Since 1928, the Federal District has directly elected 2 Senators, just as each of the 31 states do. The District elects a number of deputies based on population of the area. The 1917 Constitution designates the President to be the "Chief Executive of the Federal District." A Governor is appointed by the president.

U.S.A. (Washington, D.C.)

The United States Congress is a bicameral body composed of a 100-member Senate and a 435-member House of Representatives. All members of Congress are elected directly by the people. Each state is awarded two seats in the Senate, while the House receives its membership according to the population of each state. Universal suffrage exists. A multi-party system, with two parties dominant prevails.

The United States is a federal republic composed of 50 states and a Federal District, Washington, D.C. There are also several U.S. territories. Washington, D.C. is the national capital. The District currently has no voting representation in either house of Congress. Washington does send one non-voting delegate to the House of Representatives.

Venezuela (Caracas)

The National Congress is a bicameral body with members of each chamber elected for five-year periods. Direct popular elections are held for each house. The Senate consists of 49 elected members. Each state and the Federal District elect 2 members. Seven additional Senators are allotted for the representation of minorities. The Chamber of Deputies has 203 members, all elected from constituencies based on the population. Suffrage is universal and compulsory. A multi-party system prevails.

The Federal Republic of Venezuela consists of 20 states, 2 Federal Territories, 72 Federal Dependencies, and the Federal District—the capital city of Caracas. Caracas has full representation in each house of the bicameral National Congress. There are two senators representing the District, and an indefinite number of deputies in the Chamber of Deputies (based on the District's population). The president appoints the Governer of the District. Federal and local jurisdictions are coordinated, but the District does enjoy some autonomy through a local council.●

THE F–15 SALE: A FAILURE OF AMERICAN POLICY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post contains a thoughtful article by Rita Hauser on the longer term significance of the administration's decision to sell F–15's to Saudi Arabia. Departing from other analyses of this subject, Ms. Hauser sees as the major mistake in administration policy its failure to use the sales to extract more meaningful commitments from the Saudis. Rather than commitments not to use the planes for offensive purposes or not to station them at Tabuk, she argues, the President should have "insisted that the Saudis commit themselves finally and publicly to the peace process begun by President Sadat 6 months ago." In other words, we have missed a major opportunity to exchange arms for peace and in the process give the stalled peace negotiations a major push forward.

Mr. President, this is sound—and intriguing—reasoning. I commend this article to my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE JET DEAL: WE FAILED TO USE OUR LEVERAGE

(By Rita E. Hauser)

Now that the sound and fury over the sale of warplanes to Israel and Saudi Arabia has subsided, it is obvious that that was one battle the American people could have been spared. Yet, as has so often been true of President Carter's quest for peace in the Middle East, the administration had the germ of a good idea that was diminished by its poor tactics and its failure to place the matter in the proper context.

The United States and Saudi Arabia have been moving toward a unique relationship since the 1973 war. With arms and patronage, Washington is affording the Saudis the protection they need from radical states allied with the Soviet Union. By turning to the United States, the Saudis are making plain where they stand in global politics.

This unfolding relationship need not be advanced at the expense of American ties with Israel. To the contrary, the building of a military alliance between Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Iran, one based on their common interest in deterring Soviet power, should be the explicit aim of U.S. policy.

The sale of F15s could have been the occasion for the United States to announce its intent to develop such a common strategy. Instead, it degenerated into bickering over the power of the "Jewish lobby," and a battle of wills on the Hill. The president failed to clarify the contours of a sound policy.

To overcome Israel's fears about the sale, fears grounded in strategic considerations and a deeper worry that the Arabs are gaining political influence with Washington at Saudi expense, the United States should have insisted that the Saudis commit themselves finally and publicly to the peace process begun by President Sadat six months ago. For Saudi Arabia has not given open and unequivocal support to the Egyptian goal: a de facto peace between Israel and Egypt in which Jordan and Syria would probably later concur. That, rather than the vague and probably meaningless pledge by the Saudis not to use the F15s for offensive purposes, was the counterpart Carter should have sought. The chance to use arms for peace, in an explicit fashion, was lost.

Instead, the administration insisted it needed the Saudi sale to maintain leverage with the Wahabi Kingdom. But planes are not the real leverage, since other suppliers would take Saudi orders. The dynamic of the U.S.-Saudi relationship lies in the strong need for that Persian Gulf nation to reside within the American military protective orbit and thus to acquire influence in the development of U.S. policy for the broad Middle East area.

Moreover, Saudi Arabia's enormous wealth can cycle safely only through the United States. A huge credit balance tilts the underlying strength to the debtor. The fear of many in Washington that the Saudis must be wooed lest they park their money elsewhere is groundless, for there is no other secure haven. So, too, oil: In the near future, at least, oil prices will be determined not by OPEC but by the glut in the world market. In short, the United States has the net balance of strength in the U.S.-Saudi equation, and should not hesitate to use it to foster a meaningful coming together of Egypt and Israel and the beginning of a real—rather than an apparent—peace process.

Would the Saudis respond to American pressure to aid the faltering Sadat initiative? The Saudis surely fear the prospect of another Mideast war in which, especially after the sale of the F15s, their oil fields would likely become a target. An Egyptian-Israel peace would head off that prospect. But, in a peace, other Arab states might then turn their attention to Saudi Arabia, a bigger and more important prize than Israel by any measure.

A realistic Saudi strategy, one perhaps already in place, would be to forge an American and thus an indirect Israel connection to prevent all-out war in the area but, at the same time, to support the PLO financially to keep the guerrillas alive and nipping at Israel from bases in Lebanon. That would tie down the Syrian army and preclude major subversion in the Gulf. The icing on the cake consists of building up a powerful military force to fend off local adventurers.

That is why Saudis may fear committing themselves to a full Israel-Egyptian rapprochement. They are better off with a tepid Sadat-Begin love affair that freezes the status quo and permits the Saudis to gain strength at home.

The true test of American diplomacy is to persuade the Saudis, and not just the Israelis, to take risks for peace. In exchange, the United States would lead the way to an alliance of Mideast states desiring to safeguard the region from Russian incursion. Israel is central to such an alliance. An astute administration would seek not to break the "Jewish lobby" but to reorient strategy in light of current political realities.

The game unfolding in the Middle East is bigger than the immediate Arab-Israeli conflict. The Israelis did not, in recent months, always give evidence they were aware of geopolitical changes that have occurred since 1973. Or, if they were aware, they may have permitted their fears to overcome their wits in pushing a battle in the Senate that could not be won. But, then, neither did the White House show any sign of a mature political analysis. Unlike Israel, it did not have the excuse of fear.●

THE RESOURCE CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the Senate Agriculture, Rural Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee will soon begin markup of legislation affecting fiscal year 1979 appropriations for the Resource Conservation and Development (R.C. & D.) program. I am concerned that although there is much talk by administration representatives of their commitment to utilizing local programs to combat critical soil erosion that they are, by their recommendations for this program, defeating their stated purpose.

In terms of improving man's ability to coexist with his environment and properly utilize our land and water resources, in terms of man's stewardship of resources, perhaps no other program has been as successful in rural areas as the R.C. & D. program, which the Congress first authorized in 1962.

Under the umbrella of the R.C. & D. program, soil conservation districts, watershed districts, local units of government and individuals work cooperatively to enhance the communities in which they live. The R.C. & D. program is, in this way, unique among other programs. It works under a loose definition of "community" in rural areas where problems are not confined by simple political boundaries.

While the objectives of individual R.C. & D. districts differ depending upon the area they serve and the problems facing their community, local R.C. & D. executive councils are free to interpret the wishes of area residents and find ways to implement them. I have found these councils to be amazingly resourceful in working with limited funds and drastically fluctuating budgets in tackling the problems confronting them.

I want to take this opportunity to review what is actually being accomplished by South Dakota R.C. & D. programs and contrast it with what the administration claims they should be doing. I think you will find the program to be justified within the administration's own rationale.

Prior to his ascending to the Presidency, candidate Jimmy Carter issued a position paper purporting to set out his views on conservation matters as follows:

As more land is brought into production, soil erosion has dramatically increased. This problem demands new emphasis on our stewardship of land, water and forest resources . . . The Carter Administration will once again utilize local soil and water conservation districts to fight erosion.

At first blush it might appear the administration is following through on Jimmy Carter's promise to rural Americans. Assistant Secretary of Agriculture for Conservation Research and Education Rupert Cutler told the Senate Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee on April 11:

The budget proposed for the Soil Conservation Service in fiscal year 1979 totals $442-million. This includes funds for strengthening our basic mission of assisting farmers in cooperation with conservation districts and for additional conservation assistance directed towards improving water quality, solving critical area erosion problems and agricultural waste management problems, and for providing conservation assistance on Indian lands.

According to Soil Conservation Service Administrator R. M. Davis on that same day, the technical assistance budget has been increased to provide emphasis on public interest activities specifically dealing with water quality and treatment of critically eroded lands. Yet, at the same time, I find that the watershed planning budget was proposed to be cut in half by the administration. The Great Plains program has been cut by about two-thirds. The R.C. & D. program has a "phase out" budget cut by nearly three-quarters.

I fail to understand how this administration can square its commitment to stewardship of land and water resources, water quality, and critical erosion problems with their proposal for decreasing the budgets of programs which accomplish those ends.

Mr. Cutler tells the subcommittee he is concerned that the R.C. & D. program is not generating measurable economic impacts and claims USDA is "currently examining several alternative program designs" to better meet soil and water conservation needs. Mr. Davis says the program's earlier objectives directed toward economic development can better be addressed by other projects and that the R.C. & D. program should be redesigned to address current natural resource concerns.

I think it is worth noting that the R.C. & D. program has not been static. It has evolved over the years since 1962 and if my constituent mail is any indication it may be that the R.C. & D. program has already arrived at the point USDA hopes to bring it to under a new name. Perhaps it would be better for USDA to reanalyze its criteria for the program rather than "phasing out" a program which seemingly is already meeting their hoped for new goals.

One of my constituents put it this way:

One measure of the RC&D's success is the number of people serving without pay on the local Executive committees. They represent all the diverse interests brought together through the RC&D program to meet conservation needs. This type of success is not susceptible to the USDA's benefit-cost analysis.

I was overwhelmed by the volume of mail I received from my constituents when they learned the USDA proposed phasing out the R.C. & D. program. The concern for the R.C. & D. program is unprecedented. They have quietly accepted whatever budget was proposed in the past. But this year is different. Let me quote several portions of my constituent mail on this matter:

The RC&D has proved they are able to work with many different landowners, local units of government plus SCS and local sponsors. We only use RC&D projects for conservation practices that are too large and too expensive for private landowners or local units of Government to finance. We have already done much with critical erosion areas with the RC&D program. . . . Work done in local water development would alone justify the program.

I accept the challenge of those who say RC&D programs have not met their goals. We have the proof they have and could even show greater progress could have been made except for the fact budget cut-backs force us into priorities and we can only move as fast as money becomes available.

The Randall RC&D area has completed one hundred and eleven measures since we were authorized for operation. A large number of these measures were for critical erosion area control. These critical areas control measures are implementing non-point pollution control.

Across the nation we have "208" non-point planning occuring. One of the main thrusts of the "208" planning effort in South Dakota is the reduction of soil erosion and siltation. The planning effort is only as good as the implementation that follows. . . . It is our opinion that the RC&D is one of the very important tools that can be used to stop erosion. . . . With adequate funding in conservation, we will not need "208" in the future.

Such a reduction in RC&D programming would create a hardship which no one in our community can afford in seeking the completion of RC&D projects. There are many critical erosion areas which cannot be corrected without RC&D funds. . . . Rather than cutting the budget, there is a need to increase it in order to properly finance RC&D.

This program is doing a good job in South Dakota in helping the farmers and ranchers to protect our most important resource, our agricultural lands. If American agriculture is to continue to produce at its present level or to increase production in the future, those programs which help the farmer to protect his land must be retained.

We feel the RC&D program is essential for the protection of the Hutchinson County resource base. Our county presently has 13 critical area projects in the development stage. These projects are necessary to protect the water quality of our rivers and lakes and to protect against severe soil erosion. We feel that there is a need for the RC&D program in our county.

It is hard to believe that at a time when one of the nation's greatest concerns is to clean up our lakes and streams that our President sees fit to slash those programs which are working towards the goal of clean water and clean air."

I suggest that while this administration is working so diligently to come up with a new program to address the needs they envision from here in Washington and that the R.C. & D. program should be "phased out" to make room for it once they have devised it, that what in fact will happen is that the administration's new program will in essence be the R.C. & D. program the way it has evolved in rural areas.

I would also suggest that until such time as the administration presents us with their plans for a new program to replace the R.C. & D. program so that we have an opportunity to examine it and see in what way it differs from the R.C. & D. program as we know it, that we keep up our momentum by funding the program at its present level at a minimum and that we give serious consideration to increasing its budget to $50 million.

The new direction this administration seeks is already underway in the field. It is the USDA, not the American farmer, who has been slow to recognize this fact.●

FOREIGN TAX CREDITS FOR OIL—THE NEED FOR A RESERVATION TO THE UNITED STATES-UNITED KINGDOM TAX TREATY

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in recent weeks, most of the controversy over Senate ratification of the pending tax treaty between the United States and Great Britain has concerned the section of the treaty that prohibits American States from using certain procedures for taxing the earnings of multinational corporations with operations within their jurisdiction. I have joined Senator CHURCH and others in opposing this provision of the treaty—article 9(4)—as an arbitrary and unnecessary infringement by the Federal Government on the taxing powers of the States, and I am hopeful that the Senate will adopt a reservation to this provision.

But there is an additional objectionable provision of the treaty, a provision which has received too little attention and which is clearly undesirable as a matter of our national energy policy. that provision is article 23, which would make Britain's petroleum revenue tax—the so-called PRT—eligible for "foreign tax credit" treatment under the U.S. income tax. The result of the provision is to offer a potential $500 million a year windfall to U.S. multinational oil firms drilling in both the North Sea and in OPEC countries.

In 1975, the Internal Revenue Service informed the Treasury that it regarded the PRT as a form of royalty or excise tax, not an income tax. Under this interpretation, the PRT would not qualify for the foreign tax credit. Instead, it would be a deduction from income, not a credit against taxes. Article 23 was included in the treaty as a device to neutralize the IRS interpretation and to reward firms drilling for oil in the North Sea with the more lucrative U.S. tax treatment available under the foreign tax credit provisions.

The principal U.S. firms operating in the British sector of the North Sea are major oil companies like Exxon, Mobil, and Texaco, and independent companies like Occidental, Getty, and Allied Chemical. It is these firms which would be the primary beneficiaries of this treaty provision.

Article 23, however, is seriously flawed, because it does not limit the benefits of the foreign tax credit to oil produced in the United Kingdom. Instead, the article is open-ended, and will allow oil companies to shelter oil income from U.S. taxes whatever the source of the oil—even if, for example, the oil is produced in the OPEC countries. The end result of article 23, therefore, may well be to subsidize oil firms for their OPEC drilling and development—precisely contrary to the intended purpose of article 23 as an incentive for North Sea drilling.

The reason the multinational oil companies are anxious to have article 23 has little to do with the PRT and a great deal to do with the politics of OPEC oil.

In addition to the PRT, U.S. firms drilling in the North Sea also pay Britain's normal corporate income tax, which is eligible for the foreign tax credit. Therefore, even if the foreign tax credit is denied for the PRT, U.S. firms will owe only small amounts of U.S. tax on North Sea oil. In large part, the effect of article 23 will be to enable the firms to store up excess foreign tax credits to reduce their U.S. taxes on oil income from other sources.

At the present time, payments to OPEC countries are claimed as eligible for the foreign tax credits, so that the firms have little or no current use for excess tax credits generated from North Sea oil.

What the oil firms fear, however, is a successful challenge by the IRS to the eligibility of their OPEC payments for the foreign tax credit. In recent years, under pressure from Congress, the IRS has begun to reexamine the status of oil payments traditionally allowed as foreign taxes, but which in reality are royalties. In actions affecting payments to Saudi Arabia and Libya, for example, the IRS has recently denied tax credits for such payments. In effect, the oil firms want article 23 as a hedge against these IRS challenges.

Equally undesirable is the disincentive effect of article 23 for U.S. oil production, which is subject to U.S. tax to the extent that firms are encouraged by tax breaks like article 23 to drill in OPEC countries and other foreign locations, they may forego efforts to expand drilling and development of oil reserves in the United States.

The Treasury claims that the revenue loss from article 23 will be negligible. But this claim is based on the assertion that OPEC payments will continue to be treated as taxes for purposes of the foreign tax credit, or that the OPEC countries will be willing to restructure the payments to make them eligible for the credit, or that the oil firms will be able to tie up the IRS in litigation over the issue for the foreseeable future.

In fact, it is estimated that PRT payments will total over $1 billion a year in the early 1980's, which represents a potential revenue loss of about $500 million a year if PRT payments are fully shifted into foreign tax credits. By contrast, if these credits are limited to British source oil, it is estimated that the potential revenue loss will be no more than 75 million.

The defect in article 23 can be easily remedied by a reservation to the treaty that limits PRT tax credits to British oil income, instead of allowing such credits for all foreign oil income. I intend to offer such a reservation at the appropriate time on the Senate floor, and I hope that it will be accepted by the Senate.●

THE MISSOURI RIVER RESOURCE

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the Missouri River mainstem impoundments are one of South Dakota's most valuable potential assets. I say "potential" because that tremendous water resource must be first put to use in South Dakota before it yields very much benefit.

This is not to deny that impoundments are not already benefiting South Dakota and surrounding States. They are providing flood control, low-cost hydroelectricity to cities and farms, a source of municipal water supply, water for irrigation, water-based recreation, and fish and waterfowl benefits. But the question of benefit to South Dakota is one of scale.

South Dakota gave up nearly a half million acres of some of its most fertile river bottom land to those impoundments. We surrendered valuable wildlife habitat which has yet to be mitigated. In return, we were tacitly promised a share of that water for our use. Part of that promise was Federal development of large-scale irrigation projects.

The projects which were first to utilize Federal development ability were removed from the side of the Missouri, being some distance away from the source of water supply. While this concept is being questioned by many South Dakotans, the idea of "getting water to where the land and people are" is still valid.

The fact of the matter is, however, that many South Dakotans are farming right alongside the Missouri River. For them to have such a tremendous resource so close and yet not enjoy its benefit has been a particular frustration.

Irrigation Age editor Ron Ross tells the story of what several South Dakotans have done to overcome that problem on their own in a recent article entitled "Bootstraps Development on the Missouri." It is a story of people's initiative, pluck in the face of adversity, cooperation among Federal, private and State interests, frustration in the face of bureaucratic redtape, but mainly, perseverance of the sort which characterize South Dakota's pioneer heritage. In its own way it is a rather dramatic story and I believe worthy of being shared.

Therefore, I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

BOOTSTRAPS DEVELOPMENT ON THE MISSOURI

(By Ron Ross)

Imagine yourself on a high plateau dying of thirst. Below you a few hundred feet sits a pail of water; a single cup could save you. But you can't get it up the hill.

That situation faced Dick Lloyd and Bob Priebe and other dryland farmers near Chamberlain, S.D. in 1975. They weren't dying, but their crops were.

Their farms nearly overlook the gigantic Fort Randall Reservoir (Lake Francis Case) on the Missouri River. The reservoir contained nearly 20 million acre-feet of water, every drop suitable for irrigation. But the water might just as well have been 100 miles away.

Yields were zero or near zero. As the rainless summer wore on, farmers desperately cut and stacked every dusty stalk of corn they could find and finally turned to fireweed to prevent their cattle from starving. Everything except foundation cows were sold, and eventually most of them, too.

The drier it got, the more they looked longingly at the reservoir's water; a tiny fraction of it could have saved their crops and cattle. But their fields were 400 feet higher than the reservoir. They knew that kind of lift was technically possible, but also knew it represented a costly proposition. Others who had already developed irrigation on the Missouri had learned that.

But the tremendous development costs seemed much more feasible as weeks without rain continued and it appeared that 1976 would be a repeat of '75.

"When you are going broke anyway, you think of doing things that you didn't think you could do before," Priebe told me as he, Dick Lloyd, lawyer Leonard Andera and consulting engineer Ron Gebhart and I sat in a Chamberlain restaurant recently.

During the late summer of 1975, Priebe began talking to neighbors about the possibility of attacking the problem together and developing a multi-owner irrigation project.

About 14 landowners with some 5,000 acres seemed interested. And in August, an application in the name of Hilltop Irrigation District was made to the board of county commissioners of Brule county. With the board's approval, they then had the legal entity—an irrigation district—to allow them to proceed.

It would be easy to end the story right there. To simply report that everything went smoothly and that the farmers harvested 150-bushel corn last year. Because the last part of that rosy tale is true. They were the first irrigators to pump from the reservoir as a district. They did harvest good irrigated corn yields in 1977, in spite of a few hail storms. They did win their battle for feed stability, which was their original goal.

All fine and good. But then Lloyd and Priebe started to talk about the many frustrating roadblocks that they had to go through before a drop of water was pumped. It became apparent that what they did could only have been accomplished with an extreme amount of determination—the kind that boils to the surface when you face going "belly up".

"We didn't know we'd be hitting so many hurdles until each one came along. Otherwise, I don't know . . . ," Lloyd stated.

"Some of the problems resulted because we're faced with irrigation laws that date back to pre-mechanized agriculture," said Andera, the irrigation district's legal counsel. "To give you an idea of how antiquated they are, there is one section still in the state irrigation code that says members can build a project with their own teams of horses, rather than advertise for bids."

Another section of the irrigation code states that irrigation districts must post notice for hearings and special elections. Dick Lloyd has photos of his wife, Dixie, nailing election meeting notices to REA poles—though a few phone calls would have been quicker.

So, with memories of such nonsense occasionally creating a laugh or two, Lloyd and Priebe drank their coffee and gave their own version of how to build an irrigation district.

JANUARY 1976

The hopeful irrigators learned that money was available from the Ft. Randall Conservancy Sub District to be used for forming irrigation districts. By this time, the project was down to 10 landowners—less than 4,000 acres. Application was made to the Sub District for money. They got $1,618.24, which gave them their start.

FEBRUARY 1976

The first organization meeting was held in Andera's office. Three directors were elected—Priebe (president), Lloyd and another landowner, Jim Satterlee. Talk of bigger money surfaced. A resolution was passed authorizing the district to negotiate a loan with the state of South Dakota. The legislature was in session and approved sale of bonds for the Hilltop project for $713,148. Members were elated. An earlier state project had been funded similarly at a modest 3% interest rate!

MARCH 1976

The first clinker. The Hilltop gang learned that the state legislature had approved sale of bonds, but the lawmakers had failed to approve a guarantee for the sale of the bonds. Without the guarantee, bond buyers wouldn't look at them.

The district also learned that the Soil Conservation Service could not provide engineering service assistance until 1978, a year after the farmers hoped to be irrigating!

MAY 1976

Application was made to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' Omaha, Neb. office for a Section 10 Permit, required before any construction could be started. They were told a Section 10 Permit usually requires about 90 days.

AUGUST 1976

Board members, anxious to get started on a feasibility study, contracted with Benjamin, Kasl and Associates, McCook, Neb., a consulting engineering firm.

After 3 months, no Section 10 Permit had been received. Board members realized that patience is required when dealing with government agencies.

SEPTEMBER 1976

A road was built to the site and the board approved the final feasibility study and directed the consulting engineers to proceed. So far, no funding had been approved. No Section 10 Permit had yet been received. Irrigation district members began to worry in earnest.

About this time, two "part-time" archaeologists associated with the University of South Dakota, and hired by the Corps of Engineers, dropped in to do a survey at the construction site. It is a requirement before a Section 10 Permit can be issued.

"After walking down to the site of the intake structure, one of them came back up carrying a bone," said Lloyd. "As it turned out, it was from one of my neighbor's departed cows. But she told us that we would have had a problem if it had had tomahawk marks on it!" This bit of information cost the district $100.

(Note: The archaeological survey is a necessary and serious step in the process. If burial grounds are found, work is stopped until the graves can be removed.)

OCTOBER 1976

Directors started looking for other sources of money. At this point they got lucky. Explains Lloyd: "We didn't think that FmHA had money available for us. But one day, more or less out of desperation, I encouraged our local office to call the state director. The unbelievable happened. The state called Washington, D.C. There was a special fund for $3 million, for loans of the type we needed. In five minutes they gave us verbal confirmation for $750,000 to finance the water distribution system, at 5 percent interest, with a 40-year repayment schedule.

"To show how lucky we were, all the money was gone when we checked back a couple days later to see if the loan could be increased by $100,000. The money was gone, but we had our $750,000."

No Section 10 Permit was forthcoming. After 6 months the Corps of Engineers did report that the application had been lost. A new application was made.

NOVEMBER 1976

By now delays in development and uncertainty of funding had taken its toll. Interest had waned, and revisions were made in the district boundaries. Seven members remained. The project now totaled 1906 acres.

Still no Section 10, after 7 months.

DECEMBER 1976

The district obtained easement rights of way and set up a procedure to meet requirements for an FmHA loan. Changes were made by the consulting engineers in the final design. It was decided to advertise for bids Dec. 30. Bids were to be opened on January 18 and a completion date set for June 1, 1977.

Things looked good, until it was determined that an irrigation district must issue bonds to obtain money from a federal source. That meant that it would cost another $5,000 for bond consultants and attorneys and more delays before the money would be available. This delayed completion of the project 30 days.

Because of annual drawdown of the reservoir, an emergency resolution was passed so construction of the intake structure could be made during low water time.

After 8 months, still no Section 10.

JANUARY 1977

On January 18, bids for a contractor were opened. Successful bidder, Sandhills Implement, came in at $756,812.38.

The Section 10 had not arrived after 8 months. Work on the intake structure could not be started. Pressure on Senator George McGovern's office was passed on to the Corps of Engineers. Finally, verbal confirmation was given for the Section 10 Permit. By that time water was coming up in the reservoir. Construction on the intake structure was begun on January 18.

FEBRUARY 1977

The Section 10 Permit finally arrived and was framed by the board of directors.

It was decided that assessment percentages of the project be based on the gallonage of water delivered to each farm. Amounts ranged from 8% to 18.1%.

The board voted to apply for another $100,000 from FmHA, and agreed to support this loan with another $75,000 of their own money to cover the estimated total cost of $925,000. The board met to decide whether or not to sell bonds. Approved. Completion date was extended one month, to July 1, 1977. The intake structure was back-filled March 16.

Problems encountered in obtaining the Section 10 Permit had delayed construction of the intake structure. Rising water level of the reservoir had further hampered work on the project.

APRIL 1977

The contractor began unloading pipe on April 4 and started trenching April 25.

No interim financing was yet available. The contractor said the crew would only continue construction for 10 days from the billing date, or until May 6.

Approval on the District Transcript was needed from a circuit court judge, the Department of Natural Resources (DNR) and attorney general before interim financing could be released. The transcript was approved with no objections in circuit court and sent to the DNR on April 15.

By April 28 no action had been taken by the DNR. Calls were made daily until May 3, when it was learned that the DNR would not approve the transcript. A new DNR lawyer had found it lacking.

The race was on. Changes in the transcript were made. The circuit judge was holding court in a small town 100 miles away. Andera drove the transcript to the judge for another approval, which was granted on Thursday morning, May 5. Then three board members flew to the state capitol to hand-deliver the transcript. At this point, a bit of gentle persuasion paid off. The board members pointed out they weren't leaving without the DNR's approval.

The First National Bank of Lincoln, Neb. accepted verbal confirmation from the attorney general's office and wired $841,166.67 the following morning. A $202,258.80 payment was made to the contractor on the last day of the grace period. The workmen didn't have to stop.

Corn was planted.

JUNE 1977

Work continued on the project. Installation of three huge 400 horsepower electric motors and two 200 horsepower motors was made. Booster stations were installed on each farm. Fifteen miles of pipeline was laid, ranging in diameter from 22 inches to 6 inches. The system has the capacity to pump 14 million gallons a day, or 10,000 gallons a minute. Center pivots were readied for water. For the first time in three years, the area got a good rain. Without it there wouldn't have been a crop to irrigate.

JULY 1977

On July 5, their dream came true. Water moved through the system to 1,325 acres of corn. At harvest, neighbors couldn't believe the corn being taken from the irrigated fields.

Total project cost was $920,215.71, or $482.80 per acre, plus $200 per acre for the sprinklers. The first payment to FmHA of $18,514 was made Jan. 1, 1978.

End of the story? Note quite. All the irrigators face now, as a district, are 39 annual payments of $49,955.●

INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION INVESTIGATION OF INJURY CAUSED BY INCREASED COPPER IMPORTS

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on May 22, the U.S. International Trade Commission began its investigation of whether increased imports of unalloyed, unwrought copper are causing serious injury or the threat of serious injury to the domestic industry. The Commission's hearing was called in response to a petition filed on behalf of nearly all of the principal domestic copper producers under section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974.

The hearings were held in Tucson, Ariz., the county seat of Pima County, which is the source of nearly half of the total copper production in Arizona. Unfortunately, Tucson and Pima County are also the location of most of the unemployment in the copper industry, which unquestionably has been caused by a massive flood of imports.

Mr. President, copper is something we cannot do without. It is one of the critical resources which any developed nation needs and it would be extremely shortsighted of any country to fail to take whatever action is needed to prevent the virtual destruction of such a vital industry. Yet, this is the future that the United States faces unless prompt action is taken to revive our copper industry.

This is no exaggeration. No less an authority than Dr. William Dresher, dean of the College of Mines at the University of Arizona, has predicted that there will be no U.S. copper industry to speak of by the mid 1980's unless strong measures are taken to solve the overwhelming problems facing the industry.

One of the major problems, and so far an irremovable one, has been the huge buildup of worldwide copper stocks in amounts twice as high as the normal overhang. Due to the calculated, maximum production efforts of foreign producing nations during recent years, this situation has continued to persist even though domestic copper production has declined.

For example, in 1977, U.S. copper mines operated at a rate of 77 percent of operating capacity. Foreign copper mines were producing at a rate of 92 percent of capacity.

As far as the United States is concerned, the majority of foreign production imported here has come from the developing producer nations. Chile, Peru, and Zambia, in particular, have increased their exports to the United States.

The significant thing about this is that so many of the developing nations exercise control over both the marketing and production of copper within their borders. These are the very nations who face greatly increased foreign exchange demands in order to finance growing external debts and pay for their constantly increasing energy imports.

They are not subject to the same ground rules of the free enterprise system as our own producers are. Most signs from the developing countries point to the continued production and export of copper by them at full capacity with little regard to normal market conditions.

Moreover, large reserves of copper are known to exist in the same nations. Thus, both the capacity and purpose are present in those nations to continue to flood the United States with copper imports.

The message is clear. Unless strong and immediate action is taken to avert the growing injury to the domestic industry caused by imports, U.S. copper producers will become a mere residual supplier of copper in their own home market.

Mr. President, the evidence is clear. Imports of refined copper were double the normal rate last year and are presently three times the historic rate. The recent flood of imports is unprecedented except in years of exceptional demand such as wartime or a very prolonged strike.

Rising copper imports have caused massive unemployment in the United States. In Arizona alone, unemployment in the copper industry ran as high as 10,000 persons last year and still stands at about 8,000 below the usual work figure.

The record presents a classic and tragic case of import injury. First, there has been a significant idling of productive facilities. Second, imports have prevented firms from operating at even the cost of production.

As discussed by Theodore Gates before the ITC, the stark facts are, based on questionnaire responses to the Commission, that the U.S. copper industry, "had operating losses in excess of $100 million in 1977—far more than its 1975 recession year loss. * * *"

Third, domestic unemployment has run into the several thousands.

These facts leave no doubt that serious harm has already been done to the domestic industry, both to producers and workers.

As to the threat of serious injury, I would point out that one of the world's leading specialists of the metals and minerals industry, Simon Hunt, warned the ITC that mine capacity utilization in the United States would fall to about 62 percent in 1980. This, of course, would be a calamity.

It would put the developing copper nations in the same strong position as the OPEC nations at the time of the oil crisis. We might remember that in 1973, the year of the Arab oil embargo, imports of oil represented 36 percent of domestic demand. In 1977, refined copper imports were 20.8 percent of domestic demand. And, according to the latest statistics, they have reached 30 percent.

If this trend continues and if domestic production falls as much as Mr. Hunt has projected, the foreign copper producing countries will have the power of control over copper supplies and prices and be able to exercise a tremendous political influence on the free world.

Thus, strong action is needed now to prevent this situation from worsening—not later—when the domestic industry is so far gone that the national security is jeopardized.

Mr. President, I submitted a statement on this matter to the ITC urging favorable action on import relief as requested by the domestic copper industry, which goes into the subject in greater detail. I ask that my statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR BARRY GOLDWATER

I. INTRODUCTION

This statement is filed for Senator Barry Goldwater by counsel, in response to the notice of investigation and hearings under section 201(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 to determine whether unwrought copper, other than alloyed, is being imported to the United States in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of serious injury, or the threat thereof, to the domestic copper industry. In view of the importance of the copper mining industry in Arizona as the major component of the United States industry and, in particular, as a leading source of employment and income in Arizona, the statement includes specific information with respect to the economic and human impact of imports on Arizona and her people.

II. COPPER'S CONTRIBUTION TO ARIZONA

Over half of our nation's mined copper comes from Arizona, about 61% in 1977.[1] This is not only more than all the other States combined, but exceeds the production in any other country in the Free World, except Chile.[2]

Of the 25 leading copper producing mines in the United States, 16 are located in Arizona.[3] Arizona mines produced 932,005 tons of copper in 1977 from less than one-quarter of one percent of Arizona's land surface.[4]

In recent years, employment in the Arizona copper industry has averaged about 25,000 workers annually.[5] In 1975, for example, this was about 12% of the State's basic work force.[6] This means that, directly and indirectly, Arizona's copper industry accounted for one of every eight jobs in the State in 1975. In the Tucson metropolitan area, where one-third of Arizona's copper workers live, the figure was one in six jobs.[7]

In terms of personal income, the copper industry was responsible for one out of every eight dollars received in Arizona in 1976. Personal income from copper in Arizona during that year totaled $412.5 million. This represented nearly 12% of the State's basic personal income from such sources as agriculture, mining, export manufacturing, tourism and the federal government.[8]

Copper mining is one of the highest paid jobs in Arizona. Wages and fringe benefits combined amounted to an average of $15,700 in 1975[9] and an average of $17,980 in 1976.[10] In the context of the Commission's hearings, this is especially important because there is little alternative employment available in Arizona where unemployed copper workers can find alternative employment of a comparable pay level.[11]

Moreover, the copper industry has a major indirect influence on the Arizona economy. Over 70% of the mines' equipment, fuel, supplies and other goods and services are purchased in Arizona.[12]

In 1976, copper mining industry purchases in Arizona totaled $379 million. This meant $147 million to the wholesale trade business, $127 million to public utilities, and $52 million to Arizona manufacturing businesses.[13]

In addition, the Arizona copper industry normally pays a substantial share of the tax burden in Arizona. In 1976, the industry paid over $114 million to support State, county and municipal governments and school districts. This included mining property taxes, severence taxes, corporate income tax, payroll taxes and sales taxes on Arizona purchases.[14]

Although all sectors of the State benefit economically from the copper industry, the geographical concentration of the industry gives copper mining an overwhelming importance in certain areas, particularly small, rural communities. For example, a survey prepared by the Bureau of Business Economic Research at Arizona State University in December of 1977 reported that nearly 55% of total civilian employment is provided directly by the mining industry in Greenlee County, consisting of about 12,000 persons.[15]

Thus, the injury caused by imports swells to major proportions in selected communities of the State. Moreover, the adverse effect of imports is concentrated in a single area of the nation, consisting of five Western States, Arizona, Utah, New Mexico, Montana and Nevada, which account for over 80% of total United States copper mining production.[16]

III. COPPER PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

From 1973 to 1978, domestic new copper production decreased by 11%, from 1,718,000 short tons, to 1,518,000 short tons.[17] Total domestic production of refined copper from primary and secondary materials decreased by 18% from 1973 to 1978. Combined production from primary materials and scrap totaled 2,354,702 short tons in 1973 and only 1,880,889 short tons in 1977, including 1,496,184 tons of primary production and 384,705 tons from scrap.[18]

At the same time, foreign production increased. In 1976 and 1977, operating rates at foreign copper mines stood at about 92%.[19] The estimated operating rate of United States copper mines was only 77%, in comparison.[20]

While both domestic mine production and total domestic production of refined copper declined in 1977 over 1976, domestic copper consumption increased in 1977 over 1976. United States refined copper consumption stood at 2,182,036 short tons last year, compared with 1,991,885 short tons in 1976.[21] Thus, even though domestic consumption was increasing, domestic producers suffered a decline in sales.

IV. IMPORTS OF REFINED COPPER

According to the U.S. Bureau of Mines, imports of refined copper for 1977 represented "The highest refined import level since 1969."[22] The total for the year was 390,776 short tons.[23] On the other hand, exports of refined copper were down 54% to 51,529 short tons for 1977, compared to 111,887 in 1976.[24]

Since the total domestic production of refined copper, including production from both domestic and foreign sources and from secondary materials, stood at 1,880,889 short tons in 1977, imports represented 20.8% of domestic production.

As the United States is virtualy self-sufficient in copper in normal years, average annual imports have usually remained well below 10% in recent history. Imports, as a percentage of domestic production, have been under 8% during 11 of the previous 20 years and below 9% in 14 of those years. Except for 1976 and 1977, imports during this entire period have exceeded 8% only in years of exceptional demand, such as time of war or prolonged strike. Thus, the surge of refined copper imports in 1976 and 1977 is unprecedented in recent peacetime experience.[25]

Over half of refined copper imports in 1977 came from government-owned-or-operated mining enterprises in Zambia, Peru and Chile. The respective amounts imported from these countries last year include: Zambia, 77,865 tons, Peru 48,979 tons, and Chile 87,565 tons.[26] The government exercises control over both marketing and production in each of these countries,[27] which is a factor deserving of the Commission's attention.

It is generally recognized that the major copper exporting developing countries face greatly increased foreign exchange requirements in order to finance their growing external debts and pay for constantly increasing energy imports. Most signs from these countries point to their continued production and export of copper at or near full capacity with little regard to market conditions.[28]

For example, exports of refined copper to the United States from Chile were 42,000 metric tons in 1973 and 63,600 tons in 1976, from Peru were 3,503 metric tons in 1973 and 21,519 tons in 1976, and from Zambia were 4,800 metric tons in 1973 and 125,773 tons in 1976.[29]

The over-production by foreign producers has created a surplus of worldwide copper stocks more than one million tons above the normal over-hang. This in turn has depressed prices and been the source of the recent flood of imports or refined copper into the United States.[30]

Notwithstanding this very large over-hang, it is reported that significant expansions in foreign capacity are planned. In fact, the U.S. Bureau of Mines projects that refined copper capacity in South America and Africa, the source of the majority of our copper imports, will increase by 36 percent during the period from 1976 to 1980.[31]

It is not suggested that it is the role of the Commission to condemn these foreign practices, but it is suggested the Commission should take these practices into account as important economic factors which have caused and will continue to cause serious injury to the domestic industry.

The fact that the majority of copper imports originate in countries with nationalized or government-controlled mines that do not operate under the same profit-and-loss ground rules as domestic producers is relevant to the Commission's determination of economic conditions facing the domestic copper industry both in the short-and-long-run.

The fact that significant expansions in foreign capacity are planned raises the real possibility of continued over-supply of copper for the next several years and confirms that imports of copper will remain a substantial cause of serious injury.

Moreover, in carrying out the over-riding intent of Congress as expressed in the section 2 of the Trade Act of 1974, it is relevant for the Commission to note the lack of reciprocity in most of the foreign developing copper-producing nations.

The Congressional statement of purposes in section 2 places great emphasis on achieving "open and nondiscriminatory world trade," assuring "substantially equivalent competitive opportunities for the commerce of the United States," and establishing "fairness and equity in international trading relations."

In this context, it is noted that Chile imposes a 10% ad valorem. Peru imposes a tariff of more than 42% on most refined copper and Zaire sets an 8% tax consisting of a 5% revenue tariff and a 3% statistical tax. Each of these countries applies the taxes on a CIF basis, which further increases their relative weight.[32]

In contrast, the same copper items are subject to a United States duty of only .8c per pound, which is equivalent to 1.3 percent based on the current price of most domestic producers for a pound of copper.[33] Therefore, at least three of the major foreign producing nations impose tariffs on copper imports far above the current United States duty.

In order to implement Congressional intent, it is believed the Commission is authorized to take into account the extent to which these foreign countries have provided equitable and reasonable access to their markets in determining the standard to be met for establishing serious injury. In other words, the Commission may determine to find serious injury, on the basis of a lesser standard than it normally applies, when, as in this case, discriminatory practices exist in the foreign producing country with respect to similar products to those which are the subject of the hearing.

V. ECONOMIC IMPACT OF IMPORTS

The consequences of imports on the domestic copper industry cannot be over estimated. In fact, if relief is not provided, there may be no domestic industry by the mid-1980's.[34]

The impact of copper imports on Arizonans has been succinctly described by the Arizona Mining Association. Referring to the total imports reported for 1977, Mr. J. K. Richardson, President of the Association, has concluded: "We know, here, that had those 390,776 gross tons of copper imported been available to our Arizona mines, we would have had almost 8,500 more jobs within the State and could have produced it all rather than curtailed."[35]

This is a precise estimate of the injury caused by imports to the domestic industry, which leaves no doubt that imports are a substantial cause of serious injury. The fact that 8,500 workers were unemployed because of imports brings to the forefront the human factor, which is even more important than mere dollars and cents statistics.

These 8,500 unemployed workers represent heads of families who suffered a severe disruption of their lives because of imports.

The estimate of the total number of unemployed in Arizona due to imports is confirmed by the growing number of unemployed copper workers who have filed claims with the Arizona Unemployment Insurance Bureau for trade adjustment assistance. From the last week of December in 1977, when the Department of Labor first certified Arizona copper workers as being eligible to apply for adjustment assistance, the Bureau has received almost 7,000 applications. This figure is growing daily.[36]

Unfortunately, the first payments of adjustment assistance, which supplements the regular unemployment compensation, could not be furnished until after Christmas. The uncertainty of the copper industry future caused by constantly growing imports, together with the absence of a pay-check, led to greatly diminished Christmas celebrations for thousands of unemployed workers affected by those imports. The magnitude of the human factor should not be slighted in the Commission's consideration of whether serious injury exists.

At its peak, unemployment in the Arizona copper industry reached 10,000 below the recent average employment level of 25,000. From June to September of 1977, Arizona copper industry employment fell from 22,200 to 15,100. The current employment rate is 17,000, which is 5,000 below last year's peak employment and 8,000 below the normal average.[37]

In small, rural communities, there is nothing else for workers to do. Retraining programs are inadequate even in metropolitan areas, such as Tucson, became copper industry salaries are among the highest in the State. Therefore, there are very little replacement opportunities available comparable to the income level of the copper industry.

Mining employment in Arizona remains 42 percent below the 1974 level. The Statewide loss of personal income due to layoffs is estimated at $140,000,000 for 1977.[38] In three counties alone, Gila, Pima and Pinal Counties, the 1977 loss in personal income totaled $90,000,000.[39] This is the direct result of copper industry lay-offs.

The full impact on employment and personal income is far greater at the Statewide level. The loss of jobs in mining leads to the loss of jobs in other civilian employment, since many businesses supply and serve the copper industry.

According to a recent survey of one-third of businesses in a large area of Arizona from South Phoenix to the Mexican border, over 75 percent of the respondents reported a net decrease in revenues when compared with 1976. Only 20 percent of local businesses reported any kind of growth.[40]

One-fourth of the businesses surveyed were forced to reduce their work force.[41] Thus, the study concluded "that the problems facing Arizona copper mines have had severe financial effect not only on the mines themselves, but on towns and cities throughout the State as well." [42] This financial impact was felt by businesses of all types, such as insurance agents, general consumer goods store, and personal care services.[43]

Therefore, it is suggested that the full extent of injury caused by imports cannot be determined by viewing the impact on the domestic copper industry alone, but can only be determined in the context of the snowballing effect of such injury upon related industries.

VI. FINDING OF SERIOUS INJURY AND THREAT THEREOF

Each of the salient facts on the record meets the criteria of section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 for making an affirmative finding that increased imports have been a substantial cause of serious injury or the threat thereof with respect to the domestic copper industry.

A. Serious injury

First, the significant idling of productive facilities in the copper industry is an all too true development. The record proves that at least two major copper mines in the United States have shut down for an indefinite period of time, and those mines which are still operating are doing so on a curtailed basis designed to minimize losses.[44]

Second, not only does the reduced work schedule caused by imports prevent a significant number of firms from operating at a reasonable level of profit,[45] but the flood of imports has forced domestic producers to lower their prices to levels which prevent them from recovering full production costs.[46]

Third, significant unemployment running into the thousands has been documented as a result of imports.

These three facts prove that serious injury already exists in the domestic industry.

B. Threat of serious injury

The threat of serious injury in the future is proven beyond any question. The domestic copper industry is continuing to experience a decline in sales, a growing inventory of stocks of refined copper, and a downward trend in production and profits. Employment has increased slightly above the steep drop in late 1977, but is still far below normal levels.[47]

Large reserves of copper are known to exist in the same foreign producing countries which have been the major source of increasing imports. Chile, Zambia, Peru and Zaire alone account for 46% of the rest of the world's reserves.[48] It is also known that these countries are planning substantial increases in copper refining capacity.[49]

The will to produce and export at nearly full production, without regard to market considerations, is demonstrated from the recent practice of these countries and other developing nations.[50] In fact, Chile is estimated to have had an operating rate of 106% of capacity in 1977.[51] The need in these nations for increasing amounts of foreign exchange to satisfy growing energy and other development purposes is self-evident.[52]

Thus, the capacity and reason are present in major foreign-producing countries for continuing to flood the United States with refined copper imports. Since the developing country producers have already gained a substantial foothold in the U.S. market, it is only logical and common business sense that they would continue to export refined copper in ever-increasing amounts to this country.

C. Substantial cause

With respect to substantial cause, imports or refined copper in both of the previous years increased to nearly double the average level for the first half of this decade. An increase of 94% in imports is certainly sufficient to warrant a finding by the Commission of substantial cause.[53]

Accompanying this increase in imports, the proportion of the domestic market supplied by domestic producers has fallen from 91% to 82%. Refined copper imports increased to 18% of domestic consumption in 1976 and 1977 from an average of 9% for the period 1970–1975.[54] The resulting increase of 100% in the share of the domestic market held by imports clearly supports a finding of substantial cause.

As discussed in (b), the capacity and purpose to produce and export at even higher levels exists in the developing copper producer countries. Accordingly, the quantity of imports and the proportion of the domestic market supplied by imports will likely increase in the future. These factors demonstrate beyond any doubt that imports are a substantial cause of serious injury and the threat thereof to the domestic industry.

Finally, it is clear that imports are not only an important cause, but the leading cause, of serious injury to the domestic industry. The loss of 8,500 jobs due to imports, which has been calculated by the Arizona Mining Association, is far and above the most serious injury experienced by the industry in 1977. No other problem facing domestic producers can be estimated to have caused unemployment of this magnitude.

VII. CONCLUSION

In summary, the Commission has before it evidence which proves convincingly that increased imports are a substantial cause of serious injury to the domestic copper industry and are a substantial cause of the continuing threat of serious injury to such industry.

It is urged that the Commission act on these facts by recommending to the President the imposition of import restrictions on refined copper sufficient to prevent the domestic industry from becoming merely a residual supplier for copper to the United States market.

A quota on the import into the United States of refined copper is necessary, as distinguished from a mere increase in the small duty on refined copper items, because the major source of imports is in countries whose governments control both marketing and production of copper.

Unless a strict quota is imposed with no loop-holes, government-controlled and government-operated foreign producers are likely to continue their over-enthusiastic copper exports for internal political reasons which are to a great extent immune from normal market constraints. So long as many of the major foreign-copper producers operate under State-controlled economic systems far different from our own free enterprise society, it is believed the only assured method of relief the Commission could recommend is a substantial import restriction on refined copper.

If the domestic industry is allowed to decline to a mere residual supplier of copper in the 1980's, or even if its share of consumption is cut back significantly, the CIPEC copper producing countries of the Third World will be in a similar situation as the OPEC countries are in the Seventies.

In 1973, the year of the Arab oil embargo, imports of oil and oil products constituted 36.1 percent of domestic demand. In 1977, refined copper imports represented 20.8 percent of domestic consumption. If the present trend continues, CIPEC will soon be supplying a similar proportion of our energy needs to that provided by OPEC at the time of the 1973 oil crisis.

The potential of CIPEC countries to capitalize on their control of 2 million tons of copper a year is undeniable. Given the situation in which a badly injured domestic copper industry lacks the ability to respond quickly to fast growing demands, CIPEC will have the power of control over copper supplies and prices and will be able to exercise a tremendous political influence, not only on the United States, but on virtually the entire free world.

Thus, it is suggested the Commission take account of the enormous risk involved in failing to halt the injury being caused by imports and the threat of imports. It is respectfully submitted that the time for positive action on import relief is now, not later, when the domestic industry is so far gone that the national security is jeopardized.

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulated that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the notifications I have just received. A portion of the notifications, which are classified information, have been deleted for publication, but are available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, Room S-116 in the Capitol.

The material follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., May 18, 1978.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding under separate cover, Transmittal No. 78-23, concerning the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to Australia for major defense equipment, as defined in the International Traffic in Arms Regulations (ITAR), estimated to cost in excess of $7 million.

Sincerely,

ERNEST GRAVES,
Lieutenant General, USA, Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency.

TRIBUTE TO NELSON ROCKEFELLER

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the distinguished New York Times journalist, Mr. James Reston, has written a deserved tribute to Nelson Rockefeller on the occasion of Mr. Rockefeller's 70th birthday.

Mr. Reston properly notes that even in political defeat, Mr. Rockefeller has kept remarkably free of rancor and peevishness. As one who has sometimes been tempted to yield to resentment in the face of public criticism and political defeat, I especially appreciate the following words from Walter Lippmann as quoted by Mr. Reston:

Perhaps the highest function of a public servant in a free and democratic society is to preserve its oneness as a community while he fights the battles that divide it . . .

How rare it is in public men to accept public criticism without private resentment. To be free of that kind of resentment is a mark of a thoroughbred.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Reston's piece be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ROCKY AT SEVENTY

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON.—Nelson A. Rockefeller is celebrating, or anyway recognizing, his 70th birthday these days, not because he is 70 just yet (he won't be until July 8) but because, like the Queen in Britain, May is more convenient for his friends than July.

Either way, if you have a taste for the might-have-beens of history, this is something more than a social event. If Nelson Rockefeller had been poor, the chances are he might never have entered politics. If he had been a Democrat, he might have overcome the handicaps of being rich and liberal, and made it to the White House. But being rich, Republican and liberal, he now joins the long list of political also-rans who might have been very good Presidents but didn't quite make it.

It is a distinguished list: Hubert H. Humphrey, Adlai E. Stevenson, Alfred E. Smith, John W. Davis, James M. Cox, Charles Evans Hughes, Horace Greeley, Gen. Winfield Scott, John C. Fremont, and, other observers would no doubt add, Henry Clay, William Jennings Bryan, and Wendell Willkie.

Anyway, these comparisons only invite more controversy. The interesting thing about Mr. Rockefeller is that, winning or losing, he has devoted his life to public service. He came to Washington almost 40 years ago at the invitation of President Franklin D. Roosevelt to head the Office of Inter-American Affairs.

He was Assistant Secretary of State for Latin-American Affairs (1944–45); Chairman of the International Developemnt Board (the Point 4 Program), 1950–1951; Under Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, 1953–1954; Governor of the State of New York, 1959–73; and finally, after the tragedies of Vietnam, Watergate and the Nixon Presidency, Vice President of the United States.

It would be hard to argue that any other Presidential candidate of his own generation had a longer experience of executive responsibility, or a wider training in running large bureaucracies in state or Federal Government, but he was never able to persuade or capture the conservative forces in any Republican Presidential nominating convention.

The heart of the Republican Presidential conventions in his time, if not of the Republican Party as a whole, lay with the Goldwaters, the Reagans, and the Fords, and Mr. Rockefeller had another problem: he was a good manager but a poor campaigner on the national scene, a little ahead of his time on policy, a little behind the time in jumping into the Presidential race.

Yet he had, and still has, certain other qualities that are essential to modern government. He has a gift, rare in these days, for recruiting and using men and women of unusual talents from all over the country. Over the years, he has brought them in from the universities, the press, the city and state governments, and given them more responsibility than most political executives. Henry Kissinger is probably the best example of this capacity to find and pass along exceptional talents.

Mr. Rockefeller also has the unusual personal gift of losing without bitterness. Often he has been tempted, and occasionally he has blown off against his political opponents, but on the whole he has preserved his sense of humor and his sense of history.

This is very unusual among the also-rans. Most of the time, they don't accept political defeat without personal resentment. It is even harder for their wives and children, who love the old man at 70, and tend to rail against the politicians and the press that defeated his ambitions.

Well, you can agree or disagree with Nelson Rockefeller's public record, but on his 70th birthday, it is probably fair to say that in Washington at least, he has no enemies, and even his critics and opponents admire him for his record of public service, especially considering how easy it would have been for him to concentrate on a much easier private life.

It will be interesting to see now where he goes from his 70th birthday, and the guess here is that, liberated from political ambition, he will concentrate on the priorities of the nation.

If you look at his public record, he has been dealing with the fundamental problems of the age: with the relations of the nations of this hemisphere; with the need, as he defined it in his Godkin Lectures at Harvard almost a generation ago, for the defense of freedom within the Atlantic community; with the problems of health, education, and welfare at home; and with the struggles of the poor in the developing nations; and the imperative need for defense against the last of the imperial nations, Soviet Union.

At 40, he was a political accident; at 60 he was a Presidential candidate; at 70, he is coming back to the philosophy of the Republic, and the defense of freedom in the world, and this may be more important in his coming years than almost anything else.●

REDTAPE STRANGLES ENERGY PRODUCTION

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, our Nation's dependency on foreign sources of energy is constantly emphasized by officials of the Carter administration when addressing problems of oil and gas supply. This being the case, you would think that some effort might be made to expedite the search for and development of new sources of supply in this country.

However, if you look closely at some individual cases, you will discover that the Federal bureaucracy is either totally unaware of the Nation's energy needs or is completely inept in its efforts to deal with them. My own impression is that the Federal bureaucracy is both unaware and inept.

In this connection, a shocking story was recently brought to my attention by a constituent concerning efforts to develop new oil sources off the Louisiana coast. It tells of a company literally strangling in Government redtape while trying desperately to add significantly to this country's natural gas production. This story as told by the producers, Hamilton Brothers and partners, is one that I am sure can be repeated many times over by others attempting to do something about our energy needs. I ask that the story told by Hamilton Brothers be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

REDTAPE STRANGLES ENERGY PRODUCTION
A SHOCKING STORY

After five years of exploration and development at our South Marsh Island Field—at a cost of more than one-half billion dollars—Hamilton Brothers and partners (Producers) are so strangled by Federal red tape and bureaucratic inaction that we have not been able to produce critically needed natural gas from this prolific field.

The Producers risked a total of $256 million in bonuses paid to the Government for three blocks with no clear assurance that any reserves were present. After discoveries were made on the Blocks, a total of $164 million had been spent on development necessary for production. In addition, $63 million was invested in the construction of an anhydrous ammonia (AMPRO) plant at Donaldsonville, Louisiana to produce fertilizer, and an additional $18 million in the construction of a gasoline plant at Patterson, Louisiana to remove liquids such as natural gasoline from the gas which, otherwise, would have been lost. All of this investment was made in good faith to bring gas, oil and fertilizer to the American public.

Despite the desperate demand for these reserves, capable of delivery of 150 million cubic feet of gas and 9,500 barrels of oil and liquids daily, we have experienced unbelievable delays in achieving production. The Blocks were acquired in 1972, and the first discovery wells were drilled early in 1973. In mid-1974 the Producers entered into gas sales contracts which were submitted to the Federal Power Commission (FPC) for approval with the request that a portion of the gas be used in the AMPRO plant for the production of fertilizer, the remainder to go into interstate transmission. First hearings by the FPC were not complete until June 1975. The presiding administrative judge then took six months to publish his ruling and recommendation to the FPC that they grant a 35 percent allocation of gas to the AMPRO plant and permit the field to go on production.

After another fifteen month delay, the Commission issued on March 7, 1977 an order so ambiguous that it could not be relied upon. The Producers and the pipeline purchaser requested the FPC clarify its ruling. In the meantime, a new Federal regulatory agency, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) assumed the duties of the FPC. Nearly a year later, in January 1978, FERC considered the matter again but sent it back to their staff for additional clarification.

In March 1978, an order was handed down denying the use of any of this gas for the fertilizer plant. The field remains shut-in and if this order stands, FERC has demolished a long-standing practice which allows Producers to reserve a portion of their gas for processing into fertilizer and other essential products vital to the nation's welfare. Any court appeal will result in additional time consuming bureaucratic procedures.

Federal bureaucracy has thus held up production urgently required for a period of four years. The reason apparently, Federal officials lack either the desire or the competence to resolve an application which was not different from others that preceded it and received approval. The result is that a large flow of gas into homes, industry, hospitals and fertilizer for the growing of crops in America has been totally curtailed.

We and the entire industry are continually thwarted in our efforts to increase domestic supplies of oil and gas by bureaucratic inefficiency. The effect of these delays on the economy is best demonstrated by the $40 plus billion oil and gas balance of payments deficit suffered by our nation in 1977. Had our source of supply and many others like it been allowed to produce during the periods they were bogged down by environmental delays and bureaucratic inaction, oil and LNG imports could have been reduced, thus diminishing the staggering balance of payments deficit this country suffered.

At the same time we have all read that certain oil companies stand accused of withholding gas from the market for their own benefit. The truth is that the FPC, now FERC, has been doing the withholding—by failing to make incisive decisions. This coupled with similar delays experienced by every other American industry today accounts to a great extent for the present state of our economy.●

U.N. APPEAL FOR BANGLADESH REFUGEES

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in response to the increasingly desperate needs among some 150,000 Burmese refugees in Bangladesh, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees issued late last week an urgent appeal for $15.5 million in emergency relief supplies—to meet basic food, shelter and medical needs.

While on a mission to Geneva last week, I had occasion to meet with the High Commissioner, Mr. Poul Hartling, as well as with the Bangladesh Ambassador, to discuss the growing humanitarian crisis among Burmese fleeing violence and chaos across the Bangladesh border. The continued flow of tens of thousands of refugees into Bangladesh over the past several weeks represents not only an immediate humanitarian problem, but a serious diplomatic issue that must be of greater concern to the international community and to the United States.

I am pleased that in the provision of humanitarian assistance the administration has moved rapidly to respond to the United Nations High Commissioner's appeal authorizing an immediate contribution of $500,000 from international disaster assistance funds. I have been assured that more will follow when additional needs are identified. Also, I commend the Agency for International Development for releasing some $2 million in Public Law 480 Food for Peace commodities, providing an immediate food supply for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees' effort, and for diverting ships on the high seas for Chittagong.

However, on the diplomatic front, more clearly needs to be done by all concerned to help resolve the root cause of the massive refugee flow into Bangladesh. I urge the Secretary of State to strongly support United Nations initiatives, and to work directly with other governments in the region, to help bring peace and relief to the troubled area along the Bangladesh-Burmese border.

Without strong diplomatic action, the refugee crisis in Bangladesh may fester into a longer term problem that can only threaten peace and stability in the area.

Mr. President, I want to share with the Senate the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees' appeal which was issued last week while I was in Geneva, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD along with an article in the New York Times.

The materials follow:

AIDE-MÉMOIRE ON THE UNHCR PROGRAMME OF HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE TO NEWLY ARRIVED REFUGEES IN BANGLADESH

INTRODUCTION

1. Since March 1978, refugees from the Arakan state of Burma have been crossing the border into Bangladesh. The main influx began in the second half of April. According to recent estimates by the local authorities, there are now some 150,000 arrivals, of whom 113,000 have been given shelter in eight camps.[1] The remainder are awaiting registration for their entry into the camps. The influx of persons crossing the border continues and the Government fears their number is likely soon to reach 200,000. Almost half of the arrivals are under 15 years of age. Living conditions are extremely difficult and urgent action is required, particularly as pre-monsoon rains have already started in the area.

2. The Government of Bangladesh took immediate steps to meet the needs of these persons, providing food, health services and logistical support. However, in view of the magnitude of the problem and its own very limited resources, the Government addressed a formal request for humanitarian assistance to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, through its Permanent Representative to the European Office of the United Nations, to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The Government requested "whatever assistance possible through the aegis of the United Nations and its subsidiary organs" and expressed the wish that the United Nations co-ordinate all external assistance including bilateral contributions. In order that this assistance should be rendered effectively, the High Commissioner has been requested by the Secretary-General to co-ordinate the response of the United Nations system.

3. Pending the preparation of a detailed programme of assistance, urgent measures were taken to meet the immediate needs of the refugees. The World Food Programme (WFP) has approved food commitments to a value of $2,176,000 comprising 6,336 tons. The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) made available transportation facilities, medicaments and other relief assistance including sinking of tube-wells. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) advanced $500,000. The World Health Organization (WHO) has assessed medical needs and is proceeding with urgent procurement.

4. The High Commissioner sent two senior staff members to Bangladesh to assess the situation, in co-operation with UNDP, UNICEF, WFP and WHO. As a result of these consultations and in close liaison with the Government, a programme of humanitarian assistance to the newly-arrived refugees amounting to $15,565,000 has been drawn up. This covers food, valued at $7,900,000, which the Co-ordinator hopes will be contributed in kind on a CIF basis.

5. After consultation and in full agreement with the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, the High Commissioner has appointed the UNDP Regional Representative in Bangladesh as his Special Representative. The High Commissioner has assigned a senior UNHCR staff member to ensure liaison between the Special Representative and UNHCR Headquarters and is sending another senior staff member to assist the Special Representative as Chief of Field Operations.

[1] The camps are Kutupalong, Anjumanpara, Whylong, Nhila, Ledha, Ghundung, Naikhyonchuri and Dechuapalong. The first five camps are located between Ukhia and Tokna in Chittagong district. The other three are in Chittagong Hill Tracts district.

IMPLEMENTATION AND CO-ORDINATION OF THE PROGRAM

6. The Government of Bangladesh is establishing a special interministerial committee, on which UNHCR will be represented. Within the United Nations system various components of the programme will be implemented by members of the United Nations system in their respective fields of competence.

7. Regular interagency meetings are taking place in Bangladesh. Such governmental and voluntary agencies, in particular the Bangladesh Red Cross Society, with assistance from the League of Red Cross Societies, are already active in bringing assistance to these persons. Close co-operation is being maintained with these bodies as well as with other non-governmental organizations concerned.

8. Noting the wish of the Government of Bangladesh that the United Nations co-ordinate all external assistance, the Co-ordinator would be grateful if Governments, non-governmental organizations and private agencies would keep him informed of their intentions and actions, including details of bilateral contributions.

REQUIREMENTS

9. In view of the continued influx of refugees, the programme provides for the basic needs of an estimated 200,000 persons for the period May through December 1978. It covers five major sectors: food; shelter; health, sanitation, water supply and communal services; clothing and blankets; transportation and vehicles. Details are given below and a summary budget is attached as Annex I. The summary budget covers total requirements, including those presented in the appeal made by the League of Red Cross Societies on 18 May 1978. A summary of assistance so far made available and known to the Co-ordinator is shown at Annex III. The estimated requirements indicated below are based on information available to date. The Co-ordinator will make any budgetary adjustments required, within the limits of the resources placed at his disposal, in the light of the prevailing situation.

(a) Food, $7,900,000.

Some 25,500 tons of food are required to meet the basic nutritional needs of the refugees. It is hoped that food will be contributed in kind, in particular in the form of wheat, soy-fortified sorghum grits (SFSG), rice, vegetable oil, fish protein concentrate and dry skimmed milk, which are not available locally. Requirements are as follows:

(In Metric tons)

Wheat, 7,680.
Soy-fortified sorghum grits (SFSG), 5,520.
Rice, 7,680.
Vegetable oil, 1,656.
Fish protein concentrate, 1,536.
Dry skimmed milk, 672.
Sugar, 288.
Salt, 384.
Tea, 58.

Valued at standard WFP evaluations for overseas markets and the Government's mandatory prices for the local markets, these commodities total $7.9 million.

(b) Shelter, $1,100,000.

The refugees are now living in very precarious conditions, often without shelter. It is planned to build 4,000 communal shelters, each able to accommodate 50 persons. Labour and local materials, in particular bamboo, required for this purpose will cost $1 million. In addition, 16 square feet of plastic sheeting per person will be required, a total of 3.2 million square feet at a cost of $100,000.

(c) Health, Sanitation, Water supply and Communal Services, $2,465,000.

Health and sanitation conditions in the camps are extremely bad and, in view of the prevalence of epidemic diseases such as malaria, intestinal parasites, dysentery and cholera, a comprehensive health programme and adequate sanitation are urgently required. The situation is aggravated by lack of drinking water.

(i) Health. Two temporary hospitals of 50 beds each are needed. Their construction including equipment and supplies will cost $300,000. An initial list of the general drugs and medicaments expected to be required for the whole caseload is attached as Annex II, for the information of donors who wish to contribute in kind. These needs are estimated at $1 million, giving a sub-total of $1.3 million.

(ii) Sanitation. 30 sanitation units will be provided, each to serve approximately 1,000 persons, at a cost of $270,000, plus $20,000 running costs. Trench latrines will be dug for 170,000 persons at a cost of $75,000, giving a sub-total of $365,000.

(iii) Water supply. 1,200 tube-wells are needed at an estimated cost of $400,000.

(iv) Communal Services. These and essential domestic items such as soap and cooking fuel are estimated at $400,000.

(d) Clothing and blankets, $1,500,000.

Many persons arrive without any personal belongings other than the clothes they are wearing. It is planned to provide:

Estimated costs. 100,000 sarees, $240,000; 100,000 lungees, $140,000; 100,000 vests, $100,000; 100,000 blouses, $100,000; 200,000 children's garments, $200,000; 120,000 woolen blankets, $720,000.

(e) Transport and vehicles, $1,900,000.

(i) Overseas food transport. Transport costs for the five items of food supplies not available locally (see (a) above) would amount to $1,080,000 at current rates. It is hoped, however, that these costs will be covered by contributions in kind made on a CIF basis.

(ii) Inland food transport. Costs for this would amount to $440,000 at prevailing local rates, including handling, storage and related expenses.

(iii) Vehicles. The area of locations of the refugees is difficult of access and will become more so when the monsoon breaks. In addition to existing transport facilities in the area, the following will be required:

8 5-6-ton trucks, $100,000; 15 light vehicles (minibuses/4 wheel-drive type), $90,000; 5 ambulances, $50,000.

Running costs are estimated at $140,000, giving a sub-total of $380,000.

(f) Contingency reserve and programme support, $700,000.

Every effort will be made to restrict programme support costs. An amount of $700,000 is estimated to cover the programme support and any unforeseen needs.

BANGLADESH, SAD HAVEN FOR FLEEING BURMESE

(By William Borders)

TEKNAF, BANGLADESH, June 2.—This remote corner of one of the world's poorest countries is straining to feed and sustain 150,000 Moslem refugees who have streamed across the border from Burma in the past few weeks.

Fleeing what they say is religious persecution at home, the refugees, miserable and wretched in the heavy monsoon rains, are huddled in 10 camps hastily thrown together here in the southeast of Bangladesh, and their number is growing by a few thousand every day.

With tears and signs of hopelessness, they tell stories of rape, harassment and plunder by Burmese soldiers and other members of Burma's Buddhist majority, and they say bitterly that now they can never go back.

ENOUGH FOOD FOR NOW

"They don't want us there," said a man sitting with his wife and three young, naked children in a crowded shed of bamboo and palm fronds. "We did not have much at home, but they have taken it all from us and now we have nothing."

Because of a quick response by United Nations agencies and because this has been a rather good crop year for Bangladesh, the refugees have enough food—although just barely. But many are sick from bad sanitation or from exposure on the 20- to 30-mile walks getting here. As of this morning, there had been 303 deaths in the camps since late in April when the trickle of refugees coming in little boats across the sluggish, brown Naf River suddenly swelled to a flood. There have also been 184 births.

Because Burma is all but closed to Western correspondents unless they pose as tourists, it is impossible to know what prompted the exodus into Bangladesh, which is 85 percent Moslem. The Burmese Government says that the refugees are not citizens but people who left this area years ago seeking a better life and are now fleeing to avoid census checks that would expose them as illegal immigrants.

ISSUE OF CITIZENSHIP

"The word spread through the villages that our immigration agents were checking," a Burmese diplomat said. "And then when they would get to the next village, they would find it deserted."

The Bangladesh Government, which insists that the help it is giving is temporary and that the refugees cannot stay, says the refugees are Burmese and are being thrown out simply because they are Moslem and ethnically similar to the Bengalis rather than Buddhist and ethnically Oriental, like 85 percent of Burma's 30 million people.

Bangladesh, which has a population of 85 million in a land the size of New York and New Jersey together, cannot feed itself even in good crop years, like this one, without huge amounts of foreign aid. This year, its people produced 13 million tons of grain but consumed 15 million.

Because wheat, rice and other foods happen to be available in storage, Bangladesh has been able to feed the refugees, but United Nations agencies had to guarantee to replenish the stocks so there would be no loss of food to this country, which is by many economic standards one of the world's most hopeless.

ONE MAN'S ACCOUNT

All of dozens of refugees interviewed today and yesterday said they had been born in Burma, and many produced faded yellow identity cards, carefully preserved in plastic, that they regarded as proof of citizenship. But Burmese law does not automatically grant citizenship to someone born in Burma unless enough of his forebears were citizens, and the Government says that many refugees who think they are citizens actually are not. Burma's reasoning sounds like a fine, legalistic distinction to the thousands of unwanted people streaming down the palm-lined highway searching for a place to put down their loads and unroll their little grass mats.

Aftab Hussain, a wizened old man in a red-checked sarong who was carrying a basket with a few battered cooking pots in it, described the conflict this way:

"For years, ever since President Ne Win came in, they have all been saying to the Moslems: 'You don't belong here. You are not really Burmese. You belong in Pakistan or Bangladesh and you should go there.' "

Mr. Hussain said that two weeks ago, Burmese soldiers stormed into his village, about 10 miles from the border, and told all the Moselms to pack up and leave the Buddhist residents undisturbed. In one of many similar refugee accounts, he said that the soldiers had raped some of the women and taken others away, and that some of the young men had also been taken away.

"Then we knew it was over, and so we left," he said, reaching for his grandson's hand as they resumed trudging down the road toward the camp, a cluster of huts that are makeshift dormitories for fifty or a hundred people each.

After years of tension between religious groups, which is not uncommon in Asia, Burma's timing of whatever official action prompted this mass movement remains a puzzle. Tobarak Hossain, Bangladesh's Foreign Secretary, speculated the other day in Dacca, the capital, that the Burmese might have assumed that his Government would be preoccupied now with the campaign for tomorrow's presidential election.

NOTHING—ON EITHER SIDE

"But whatever the reason, we cannot even contemplate letting these people stay," Mr. Hossain said. "Bangladesh is a very poor country and we cannot absorb this kind of influx. Of course, we will give emergency help now, but they must go back. Every country has minorities, and the Burmese cannot simply throw theirs out." In the latest of several diplomatic exchanges on the subject, the Foreign Secretary is taking a delegation to Rangoon next week to discuss the problem.

Last week, Poul Hartling, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, appealed for what he called a "major international humanitarian assistance effort, urgently required." He asked member nations for $15.5 million, half of it for food to last 200,000 people through December and half for emergency supplies, such as the plastic sheeting that keeps most of the rain out of the bamboo huts.

The refugees are not supposed to leave the camps, and when they do, they are often not greeted kindly. In Bangladesh, it is almost impossible to be out of sight of other people; every tiny plot of land is jealously cultivated and there is no surplus for strangers.

"They say there is nothing for us here in Bangladesh," commented a young woman who sat in the little corner allotted to her, playing sadly with a listless child who seemed badly malnourished from years—not weeks—of not getting enough to eat.

"They tell us we cannot stay here. But on the other side of the river, at home, they said we could not stay there either. Where can we stay? What will we do?" And then she buried her face in the hem of her tattered and dirty blue blouse and silently sobbed.●

THE ALASKAN WILDERNESS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, on April 3, of this year, I inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Detroit Free Press dealing with the issue of regulation of the Alaskan wilderness. Since that time I have become a cosponsor of the bill to protect that great natural resource, S. 1500.

Now, another editorial has appeared in the Free Press and I request that it be printed in the RECORD, in order that it might be made available to my colleagues.

The people of Michigan support this effort to protect for the Nation and unborn generations the great abundance of resources in Alaska, both the splendor of that State's beauty and the oil, gas, minerals, and other valuables to be found within the State.

We are speaking of the disposal of public lands, lands paid for out of the General Treasury of the United States and under the control of the peoples' Government. That their disposition should be determined with a mind toward the greatest benefit for the greatest number, and not for a few wealthy speculators and corporations is altogether proper.

Mr. President, quoting the Free Press, I will "fight for what is at stake in Alaska: the last, wild legacy of creation, the last majestic wilderness Americans will ever see."

The article follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press, May 16, 1978]

ALASKA: MICHIGAN CONGRESSMEN SHOULD JOIN THE BATTLE TO SAVE AMERICA'S LAST MAJESTIC WILDERNESS

The most important land conservation issue of our generation, perhaps of our century, will reach the House floor this week. It is the Alaska lands bill, a chance to preserve the most stunningly beautiful wilderness left on this planet.

But the form in which the bill will be passed remains in doubt. Already it has been weakened and stripped down in committee. Congressmen who are too sympathetic to mining and development interests will be fighting hard to reduce the wilderness areas even more and to open to exploitation vast reaches now designated as national park preserves and wildlife refuges. And Rep. Lloyd Meeds, D-Wash., has introduced a completely unacceptable substitute bill which reduces the acreage to be saved, opens the Arctic National Wildlife Range to oil and gas drilling and slashes in half the areas designated as wilderness.

A few Michigan congressmen have worked diligently to preserve Alaska's grandeur for all the American people. Democrats David Bonior, William M. Brodhead and Robert Carr are among the bill's sponsors. Rep. Bonior has indicated he will offer amendments on the floor to restore lands stripped from the bill in committee and to tighten mining access provisions.

Republican Rep. Guy Vander Jagt was instrumental in setting up the process that led to the selection of lands in the bill; we hope he will wield his great influence with his colleagues to help defeat attempts to weaken it. Another Democrat, John D. Dingell, has worked to expand and strengthen the wildlife refuge system.

There will be other environmental challenges and threats to be met in our time, from the future of nuclear power to the spoilation of the seas and the toxic poisoning of our habitat; but on the single, simple issue of conservation—of saving the land for future generations—nothing will be more important than the Alaska lands bill.

The bill sets aside 100 million acres as parks, national forests, wildlife refuges and wild and scenic rivers. The lines have been drawn to leave the richest oil and mineral deposits open to development, and vast tracts open to logging. This is not a bill that locks up valuable resources; it is the bare minimum necessary to preserve the unique and diverse Alaskan landscape from thoughtless destruction.

The time has come for all the Michigan delegation to recognize and fight for what is at stake in Alaska: the last, wild legacy of Creation, the last majestic wilderness Americans will ever see. We can never create anything as precious or beautiful; but we can destroy it. That must not happen. A strong Alaskan lands bill must be passed.●

THE TUITION TAX CREDIT

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, today's Washington Post carries a provocative letter to the editor from Mr. David W. Breneman, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, relative to the tuition tax credit.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE TUITION TAX CREDIT AS A "CRUEL HOAX"

As Congress rushes toward enactment of a tuition tax credit, a cruel hoax is being played on the majority of U.S. taxpayers. The broad political support for this legislation indicates that many citizens believe that they will be better off financially if it is passed. In fact, the enormous drain on treasury revenues implicit in such credits—estimated at between $1 and $5 billion annually depending upon size of credit and coverage—will be paid for by all of us through reduced opportunity for broad-based tax cuts or through inflation.

If the tax credit forces Congress to scale back broader tax reforms, then those who will benefit will be the minority of taxpayers who are currently paying tuition, either for themselves or for their dependents. Since a disproportionately large number of the families in this group have incomes in excess of $25,000, tax relief for everyone is being foreclosed by selective relief for the most affluent, a curious approach to taxpayer equity.

Alternatively, the credit may simply result in larger budget deficits. It is equally curious that at a time when the economy requires a fiscally prudent approach to deficits to reduce inflationary pressure, a proposal to reduce treasury revenues substantially should receive such wide support. Some may believe that the loss of revenues will force offsetting spending cuts, but the budgetary process renders that belief unfounded and naive. In fact, two of the sponsors of this legislation, Sens. Bob Packwood (R–Ore.) and Daniel Moynihan (D–N.Y.), went to some length in the Senate Finance Committee hearings to reassure the education community that these tax expenditures would not come at the cost of reduced federal spending for other education programs. And they are undoubtedly correct in that assessment: Tax expenditures simply are not forced to compete with direct-spending measures that are the province of separate authorizing and appropriating committees.

The most likely outcome if tuition tax credits are enacted, therefore, is simply larger budget deficits and increased inflation, the cruelest tax of all.

If these economic and budgetary realities were not reason enough to be wary—on grounds of rational self-interest—of this legislation, the final blow will be delivered by the nation's colleges and universities in the form of increased tuition. If the entire tuition-paying student body of each campus suddenly receives a tax credit equal to $250 or more against tuition paid, colleges and universities will seize the opportunity to capture the credit for themselves through equivalent tuition increases. University officials will reason that students' families will be no worse off after the tuition increase than before and in fact, may "benefit" from the illusion of tax relief), and thus will convert the measure indirectly into institutional assistance. It may be that direct, per capita aid to colleges and universities is needed as the next step in federal higher education policy; however, it would surely be preferable to debate that issue openly rather than introduce it through the back door in the guise of tax relief.

Have we as a nation become so gullible that tax measures working against the self-interest of the majority can be swept into law on a groundswell of anti-government feeling? Are we prepared to devote a sizable amount of the general tax reduction proposed by President Carter to that part of the population currently paying tuition, including a disproportionate number of high-income families? Before final action on this legislation is taken, it would behoove each taxpayer to assess the costs and benefits realistically, and make that judgment known.

By any rational calculation, tuition tax credits should be overwhelmingly defeated.●

AMERICAN PUBLIC OVERWHELMINGLY SUPPORTS STRONGER GUN CONTROL

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, over the past weekend, the Center for the Study and Prevention of Handgun Violence released a study showing broad national support by the American public for more effective handgun controls.

Among the results of this new nationwide survey, conducted by Cambridge Reports, was the finding that an overwhelming majority of the people—84 percent—favor strict Federal laws for the registration of handguns. According to the study, the current support is 14 percent higher than in previous surveys.

The poll also shows that 74 percent of the public favors legislation requiring a license to own a handgun.

These new figures provide dramatic evidence of the vast nationwide concern that exists for effective measures to bring an end to the epidemic of gun violence that plagues the United States. It is unacceptable for Congress to continue to permit a small minority of vocal lobbyists to thwart the will of the people of this country. I hope that all Members of Congress will examine the results of this new survey and resolve to work even harder to achieve the goal of enacting the responsible gun control legislation that is needed.

Mr. President, I ask that the survey be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[News release of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Handgun Violence, Philadelphia, Pa., Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, Chairman, June 3, 1978]

AMERICANS WANT MORE EFFECTIVE HANDGUN CONTROLS, SURVEY SHOWS

FORTY-NINE PERCENT WOULD VOTE FOR CANDIDATES FAVORING STRONG LEGISLATION

American citizens continue to favor more effective federal legislation to curb handgun violence.

Even citizens owning handguns are in favor of more stringent regulations for the registration and use of these weapons.

Moreover, public concern about handgun violence is so strong that 49 percent of citizens would be more inclined to vote for candidates who favor handgun controls, while only 28 percent would be less inclined to do so.

These are among the findings of a new nation-wide survey disclosed by Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, chairman of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Handgun Violence, a Philadelphia-based research and educational organization. The study was conducted by Cambridge Reports, Inc., an organization specializing in public attitude surveys.

Seventy-four percent also require the registration of all handguns now in possession of civilians, and 20 percent opposed.

Concern about handgun control is not restricted to people who do not own such weapons. Among those who own handguns, 74 percent indicated they would require registration of all handguns at time of purchase or transfer, and 59 percent of handgun owners favor registration of all handguns now in civilian possession.

There is also widespread interest in establishing stringent licensing laws governing the use of handguns. On the question of legislation requiring a license to own a handgun at all, 74 percent are in favor, and 21 percent are opposed. An even larger number, 79 percent, favor requiring a license to carry a handgun outside of the owner's house or place of business.

American citizens not only want to be able to keep track of who own guns and where and how they are used, but they also are tough on those who misuse the weapons; 83 percent of the public wants mandatory prison sentences for all persons using a handgun in a crime. There is less support, though still a majority of 55 percent, for mandatory prison sentences for those who carry handguns outside of their house or business without a license.

The survey also indicates that the public strongly favors banning the so-called Saturday Night specials. When the question referred to banning the future manufacture and sale of "non-sporting type handguns," the unfamiliar phrase brought a 48 percent favorable response. When the question referred to the more familiar "small, cheap, low quality handgun," the favorable response rose to 70 percent.

Although the majority of adults oppose such a drastic step, one in three even would go so far as to favor banning the manufacture and sale of all handguns.

There is even a "hard core" of anti-handgun people, one American in three or four, who wish to use public funds to buy back and destroy existing handguns, either voluntarily or on a mandatory basis.

The survey finds that there is a handgun owner in one household out of four in the nation and more than one American adult in 10 has been involved in a threatening experience with a handgun. About 23 percent of the public think it likely they will be a victim of handgun violence in their lifetime.

Protection of the home and family was the most prevalent reason (43 percent) for the civilian's purchase of a handgun.

In its conclusions, the survey states: "It is clear from the overwhelmingly favorable responses to regulations governing the purchase, use and availability of handguns that the American public wants handgun control legislation.

"Indeed, people are so concerned about handgun control that it even affects their political behavior. As the (survey) shows, a plurality of Americans would be more inclined to back a candidate who favors handgun control."

The Center for the Study and Prevention of Handgun Violence, sponsor of the survey, was formed under leadership of Dr. Eisenhower to reactivate the study of American handgun violence which he began as head of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence. He was appointed Chairman of the Commission by President Lyndon Johnson in 1968.

The Center's board of directors includes Dr. Marvin E. Wolfgang, University of Pennsylvania; Dr. Franklin E. Zimring, University of Chicago Law School; Lloyd N. Cutler and James S. Campbell, Washington, D.C., and Nelson T. Shields, Wilmington, Del.

A summary of the survey findings is enclosed for your information. Questions concerning the survey may be directed to Mr. Jonathan Carlson Cambridge Reports, 10 Moulton St., Cambridge, Mass. Telephone: 617–661–0110.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS BY CAMBRIDGE REPORTS, INC.

INTRODUCTION

This overview summary, prepared by a well-known research agency Cambridge Reports, Inc., presents findings of a national survey measuring public attitudes toward hanguns. Cambridge Reports, Inc. surveyed 1500 American adults, selected in a manner to reflect the views of the whole adult population of the United States. The interviews were conducted between April 20 and May 15, 1978, by trained, professional interviewers under the supervision of the Corporation's field staff. The explanations preceding each set of data are Cambridge Reports' interpretations of their findings.—The Center for the Study and Prevention of Handgun Violence.

OBJECTIVES

The basic objectives of this survey were:

To measure citizen awareness, knowledge of and attitudes toward handguns,

To measure in-depth, citizen knowledge of and attitudes toward the control of handguns.

OVERALL POLICIES ABOUT HANDGUN CONTROL

We began our summary with an analysis of data related to American's attitudes toward the control of handguns.

We asked a series of question about attitudes people have regarding:

The sale of handguns;

The purchase of handguns;

Handgun registration;

Licensing;

Sentencing of criminals who have used a handgun in the course of their misdeed;

Possible banning of handguns; and

Repurchase of existing handguns by the state of national government.

As you will see on examining the following table, Americans are strongly in favor of controlling who owns a handgun.

Here are some specific proposals that have been made for controlling handgun violence. Would you tell me whether you would strongly favor, somewhat favor, somewhat oppose or strongly oppose each proposal with respect to civilians only. Law enforcement personnel would not be affected.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Institute a waiting period before a handgun can be purchased to allow for a criminal records check?	74	14	4	3	5
Strengthen the rules for becoming a commercial handgun dealer	63	18	7	5	7
Crack down on illegal handgun sales	72	13	5	6	5

Continuing with this same series of questions we see that the general public strongly favors regulations governing the purchase of guns as well as controlling those who sell guns. A vast majority of the public wants gun registration, including guns which are already owned.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require prospective handgun purchasers to get a permit or license to purchase	65	17	7	7	5
Require the registration of all handguns at time of purchase or transfer	67	17	5	7	5
Require the registration of all handguns now owned	57	17	9	11	6

This concern about handgun control is by no means restricted to people who do not have handguns and fear those who do. As we see in the following table, a vast majority of people from households where there are guns are in favor of regulations requiring registration of handguns, including those presently owned. Support from people who do not have handguns is even stronger.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require prospective handgun purchasers to get a permit or license to purchase:
Handgun	53	18	11	14	4
No handgun	71	16	5	3	5
Require the registration of all handguns at time of purchase or transfer:
Handgun	57	17	7	16	3
No handgun	72	17	3	3	4
Require the registration of all handguns now owned:
Handgun	44	15	11	24	6
No handgun	63	18	8	6	5

Furthermore, there is substantial interest in establishing stringent licensing laws governing the use of handguns.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require a license to own a handgun at all	58	16	10	11	6
Make the rules for a license to own a handgun stricter	55	17	10	11	8

Make the rules for getting a license to carry a handgun outside of one's house or place of business strict	57	19	9	10	5

Looking again at people in households where there are handguns we find considerable support for making rules and regulations governing use and carrying of handguns more stringent. And, people who do not live with handguns are even more likely to feel strongly that registration and licensing need to be up-graded.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require a license to own a handgun at all:
Handgun	40	13	16	26	5
No handgun	66	17	7	5	5
Make the rules for a license to own a handgun stricter:
Handgun	37	18	15	25	5
No handgun	62	17	9	5	8
Require a license to carry a handgun outside of one's house or place of business:
Handgun	45	17	13	21	5
No handgun	68	18	5	4	5
Make the rules for getting a license to carry a handgun outside of one's house or place of business strict:
Handgun	46	15	14	22	3
No handgun	63	20	7	5	5

The public not only wants to be able to keep track of who has guns and where they are and how they are used, but also, Americans come down hard on people who have misused guns. Eighty-three percent of the public wants mandatory prison sentences for all persons using a gun in a crime. There is less support, though still a majority, for mandatory prison sentences when people carry handguns outside of their house or business without a license. Which means that, in fact, the call for licensing we have just seen is taken very seriously.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require mandatory prison sentences for all persons using a gun in a crime	68	15	6	6	6

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Require mandatory prison sentences for a l persons carrying a handgun outside without a license to do so	38	17	17	21	8

Licensing and registration are not the only concerns people have about handguns. We find that the public is very interested in banning what have come to be known as "Saturday Night specials."

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Ban the future manufacture and sale of non-sporting type handguns	33	15	20	21	11
Ban the future manufacture and sale of small, cheap, low quality handguns	54	16	10	13	7

One adult in three in this country even goes so far as to advocate banning the future manufacture and sale of all handguns, although the majority oppose such a drastic step.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Ban the future manufacture and sale of all handguns	23	9	22	36	10

There is even a "hard" core of anti-handgun people, one American in three or four, who wish to use public funds to buy back and destroy existing handguns, either voluntarily or on a mandatory basis, as we note on the following page.

[In percent]

	Strongly favor	Somewhat favor	Somewhat oppose	Strongly oppose	Don't know
Use public funds to buy back and destroy existing handguns on a voluntary basis	22	11	19	37	11

Basic involvement with handguns

People establish values and make policy decisions on the basis of their own experience and what they learn from others. For this reason we shall turn to looking at the extent to which Americans have direct contact with handguns.

We began our survey of handguns in American society today by asking respondents to tell us about their direct involvement with handguns.

We first asked whether someone in the household was a handgun owner. As the table shows, there is a handgun owner in one household out of four in this country.

Does anyone living in this immediate household own a handgun or pistol or not?

(In percent)

Yes	24
Not sure	4
No	72

We asked about other encounters with a handgun.

Have you ever been attacked or threatened with a handgun? [If so] Were you injured or not?

(In percent)

Yes, not injured	9
Yes, injured	2
No, never	89

More than one American adult in ten has been involved in a threatening experience with a handgun. How many people think they will actually have such an experience in their lifetime?

How likely do you think it is that you will be a victim of handgun violence in your lifetime: very likely, somewhat likely, possibly but not likely, or next to impossible?

(In percent)

Very likely	8
Somewhat likely	15
Possibly, but not likely	51
Next to impossible	14
Don't know	12

Anticipation of being a victim of handgun violence is greater among those living in urban and suburban settings than among people in rural environments (28% vs. 14%); and we note that urban/suburban dwellers are slightly more often involved in such incidents than people in rural areas (11% vs. 7%).

On querying why people purchase handguns we learned that protection is the overwhelming reason offered. Despite a slightly lower incidence of handgun violence and a much lower expectation of encountering handgun violence, rural respondents are a bit more likely to say they are buying a handgun for protection than are people in more urban settings.

Why did that person in your household buy a handgun or pistol?

[In percent]

	Overall	Urban	Sub-urban	Rural
Protection, protect home and family	43	43	40	46

Recapitulation

The purpose of this study was to measure citizen awareness, knowledge of, and attitudes toward handguns and hangun control. We have just seen in this last chapter that guns directly affect the lives of many Americans.

One household in four has a handgun in it;

Every second household with a handgun in it has that handgun for "protection";

In only one household with a handgun in four has the gun a recreation function; and

One American adult in ten has been threatened cr attacked by a handgun.

Americans don't just own handguns or have to deal with handguns in stressful and life threatening situations. People in this country who own handguns, like those who do not own handguns, want safety—safe equipment, some assurance that guns will only be handled by responsible people, accountability.

It is clear from the overwhelmingly favorable response to regulations governing the purchase, use, and availability of handguns that the American public wants handgun control legislation.

Indeed, people are so concerned about handgun control that it even affects their political behavior. As the next table shows, a plurality of Americans would be more inclined to back a candidate who favors handgun control.

Would you be much more inclined, somewhat more inclined, somewhat less inclined or much less inclined to vote for a candidate who favored handgun control?

(In percent)

Much more inclined	22
Somewhat more inclined	27
Somewhat less inclined	15
Much less inclined	13
Don't know	23

Because present regulations governing the purchase and use of handguns vary so much from one state to another and make control difficult if not impossible, voters want to see handgun control mandated nationally.

Would you agree or disagree: The only way to control handguns is by Federal law; state laws which allows them to be purchased in some states and not in others are ineffective.

(In percent)

Agree	70
Don't know	17
Disagree	14

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are some measures which have been cleared for passage by unanimous consent. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar orders numbered—if I may have the attention of the distinguished minority leader—793, 797, 834, 854, 855, 856 and 858.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, the items that the majority leader has indicated just now apparently are cleared on this calendar and we have no objection to proceeding to their consideration and disposition at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NACOA AUTHORIZATIONS, 1979

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 10823) to amend the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere Act of 1977 to authorize appropriations to carry out the provisions of such act for fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation with an amendment on page 1, line 7, after "3 (b)" insert "(1)".

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-862), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE AND SUMMARY

The bill authorizes appropriations of $572,000 for fiscal year 1979 for the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere (NACOA). The 18-member advisory committee provides independent information and advise to both the Congress and the executive branch.

The bill also extends the term of each of the present NACOA members by 1 year. The six members whose terms were to expire on July 1, 1978, would have their terms extended to July 1, 1979. The six appointed for terms ending July 1, 1979, would be extended to July 1, 1980. The six appointed for terms ending on July 1, 1980, would be extended to July 1, 1981.

The appointments of these present 18 members were delayed, and the purpose of the extensions is to enable them to serve full, not abbreviated, terms.

The amendment made by the committee is a technical amendment, which clarifies the intent that the amendment made by paragraph (1) refers only to the first paragraph of section 3 of the NACOA Act.

BACKGROUND

Establishment of NACOA

Congress created the original National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere by Public Law 92-125, which was approved August 16, 1971.

This action was a direct result of recommendations made by the Stratton Commission.[1] The Commission was established by Congress to examine all aspects of marine science and to develop an overall strategy which would provide the Nation with a well-integrated and centrally coordinated program in this area. Such a program would provide ways to make more effective use of scientific and engineering resources and accelerate development of marine resources. The plan was also to insure that the Nation's leadership in marine science and resource development would be maintained.

In January of 1969, the Stratton Commission submitted its report to Congress.[2] As a result of the recommendations contained in that report, three complementary actions took place: an Executive order was approved creating the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration within the Department of Commerce, and two pieces of legislation were drafted, reported by the Committee on Commerce and enacted, establishing the coastal zone management program [3] and the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere.[4]

Footnotes at end of article.

This 1971 act established a 25 person NACOA, with members appointed by the President for staggered 3-year terms; members could not be full-time Federal officers and employees. The act and its 1975 amendments gave NACOA these four basic responsibilities: to undertake a continuing review of national ocean policy, coastal zone management, and the status of the marine and atmospheric science and service programs of the United States; to advise the Secretary of Commerce with respect to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administation; to submit an annual report to the President and the Congress setting forth an assessment of the Nation's marine and atmospheric activities; and to submit such other reports as may from time to time be requested by the President or the Congress.

The NACOA of 1977

In 1977 Congress repealed the 1971 NACOA Act and replaced it with a new statute, the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–63, 91 Stat. 265, July 5, 1977).

The 1977 act created a new NACOA, similar to the original one. However, the number of members was reduced from 25 to 18, stricter qualifications for membership were established, and the new act, unlike the old, directed that NACOA conduct both its annual assessments and its continuing review of policy and programs "on a selective basis." This Committee's report (Rept. No. 95–211, May 16, 1977, p. 4) explained that the term "on a selective basis" was included to encourage NACOA to select and analyze in depth a few major issues each year which are of significant interest to the Congress and the executive branch. The committee stated that it would like to see NACOA provide more useful and timely assessments of issues and programs.

The new act became law in July 1977. Because of delays in the appointment process, the members of the new NACOA were not appointed by the President until January 1978.

BASIC WORKWEEK OF FEDERAL FIREFIGHTERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 3161) to amend title 5, United States Code, to improve the basic workweek of firefighting personnel of executive agencies, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment on page 3, line 11, strike "(a)(c)" and insert "(a)–(c)".

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–867), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The primary purpose of H.R. 3161, as amended by the committee, is to provide that the regularly scheduled administrative workweek of each Federal firefighter shall average 56 hours per week. In addition, the bill authorizes payment of 25 percent premium pay to firefighters who have a 56-hour workweek and authorizes overtime pay under the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code for all hours of work in excess of the 56-hour workweek.

HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

Senator Spark M. Matsunaga of Hawaii introduced a measure similar to H.R. 3161 (H.R. 4634) when he was a Member of the House of Representatives in the 94th Congress. It failed passage in the House last Congress. Senator Matsunaga sponsored similar legislation this Congress in S. 1163. Representative Herbert Harris of Virginia introduced H.R. 3161 on February 7, 1977. After hearings in the House Subcommittee on Employee Ethics and Utilization, and amendment by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, H.R. 3161 was passed in the House of Representatives on April 12, 1978.

HEARINGS

The Subcommittee on Civil Service and General Services conducted hearings on May 2, 1978. Testimony was presented by Senator Matsunaga; Congressman Harris; Frederick A. Kistler, Director, Bureau of Policies and Standards, Civil Service Commission; Pascale Petosa, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs; Kenneth T. Blaylock, president, American Federation of Government Employees, and Fred Schillreff, International Association of Firefighters; and Irving Geller, general counsel, National Federation of Federal Employees.

At hearings and during the course of congressional consideration, the administration has opposed enactment of this legislation. Its objections are explained in the statement of this report.

The general view of Federal firefighters, as revealed during the hearings on this legislation, is that they are being treated unfairly. The additional 18 hours per week apparently is a significant factor in determining the duration of a firefighter's employment with the Federal Government. Although other benefits for Federal firefighters are similar to those offered municipal firefighters, about 23 percent of Federal firefighters left their jobs in 1977.

It is the position of the Civil Service Commission that if the regularly scheduled administrative workweek of firefighters is reduced to 56 hours, a concomitant reduction in the 25 percent premium pay which firefighters now receive would be in order. On the other hand, proponents point to the high turnover rate for Federal firefighting personnel and the relative pay differential for municipal and Federal firemen in support of their position that the present requirement is unfair and would best be corrected by reducing the hours but keeping the pay scheme.

It should be noted that the Civil Service Commission opposes this measure in large part because it objects to setting compensation plans—that is, the percentage of premium pay, in statute when the authority to fix pay for Federal employees is normally within its jurisdiction. The Department of Defense, the major employer of Federal firefighters, opposes the change in the tour of duty for firefighters because it will require hiring additional personnel.

BACKGROUND

The Federal Government employs approximately 11,500 civilian firefighters. About 10,500 of this number are employees of the Department of Defense. The remainder are employed by the Department of Transportation, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Department of Agriculture, and the Veterans' Administration.

Federal firefighters have a variety of responsibilities which are not required of most municipal firefighters. Department of Defense firefighters, for example, must be familiar with the steps necessary to prevent and combat fires connected with munitions, exotic chemicals, aircraft fuels and nuclear products. Department of Agriculture firefighters are responsible for dealing with the threats of fire to national forests. Nuclear Regulatory Commission firefighters must be familiar with the massive problems of fire at nuclear powerplants. The Federal Government is a self-insurer of its losses and has as a consequence, a direct incentive to prevent fire-related losses. The responsibility for fire prevention falls on the Federal firefighters and their record of fire prevention is good.

STATEMENT

H.R. 3161 amends chapter 61 of title 5, United States Code, relating to hours of work, to prescribe a new basic workweek for Federal firefighters. Under existing law, the authority to fix the hours of work of Federal employees, including firefighters, rests with the heads of employing agencies. The typical workweek of the Federal firefighter now is 72 hours, consisting of three 24-hour shifts. Each shift contains an eight-hour period of actual work and a 16 hour period of standby status. During the standby period the firefighter has a sleeping period; however, the entire standby period may be interrupted for emergencies or duties normally performed during the designated work period. In no case may a firefighter be away from assigned duties—for example, firefighting, fire prevention or inspection tours, or standby at the firehouse—during the 24-hour shift.

Because Federal firefighters do not work a normal eight-hour day or 40-hour week, special rules apply to their compensation. These rules result from the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code, which govern the compensation of Federal employees, and a provision (29 U.S.C. 207(k)) of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1974. The computation of firefighter pay is complicated because of the various interpretations required to make these statutory provisions work together. The key issues of debate on H.R. 3161 require that these provisions be explained.

Section 5545(c)(1) of title 5, United States Code, provides that Federal employees who regularly perform substantial amounts of standby duty beyond a normal tour of duty shall receive an additional sum as compensation in lieu of overtime, night differential, Sunday and holiday pay. This sum is called premium pay. It is a percentage, not to exceed 25 percent, of base pay. The actual percentage of premium pay is fixed by the Civil Service Commission on the basis of overtime, nights, Sundays, and holidays worked. Irregular overtime work beyond the scheduled 72 hours results in further overtime compensation.

As a result of this requirement, many Federal firefighters receive, as compensation in lieu of overtime, night differential, Sunday, and holiday pay, the maximum percentage of premium pay (25 percent) which the Civil Service Commission may authorize. They receive the maximum amount because they work 72 hours per week, they work at night, and they work a certain number of Sundays and holidays. Were it not for this special premium pay provision, Federal firefighters (and other Federal employees in like circumstances) would receive for their present workweek a combination of amounts, including time and one-half overtime pay, night differential pay, and Sunday and holiday pay.

Section 207(k) of title 29, United States Code, subjects Federal firefighters to the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Since January 1, 1977, the FLSA has required overtime pay to firefighters for all hours worked in excess of 54 per week.

Under the FLSA, overtime work is compensated for a rate of 1½ times the employee's regular rate of pay. For Federal firefighters, the regular rate of pay is determined by dividing the firefighter's total remuneration (base pay plus 25 percent premium pay) by 72 hours. Under a decision of the Comptroller General (B–51325, March 19, 1976), Federal firefighters who have a 72-hour workweek are considered to have been paid at their regular rate of pay for each of the 72 hours in their worksheet. Therefore, according to the Comptroller General, firefighters are entitled to be paid only at the rate of one-half times their regular rate of pay for the 18 hours of overtime work (72–54) under the FLSA. In the case of a GS–5, step one, firefighter, for example, each of the 18 hours is worth only an extra $1.66 in FLSA overtime pay. Furthermore, since such overtime must be actually worked to be paid, a firefighter who takes annual or sick leave, performs military service, or is called to jury duty, suffers a reduction in FLSA overtime pay.

UNIFORMITY IN FEDERAL EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS AND COVERAGE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 2931) to amend chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, to establish uniformity in Federal employee health benefits and coverage provided pursuant to contracts made under such chapter by preempting State or local laws pertaining to such benefits and coverage which are inconsistent with such contracts, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with amendments as follows:

On page 1, line 7, after "(m)" insert "(1)";

On page 2, line 4, strike "provisions." and insert "provisions.";

On page 2, beginning with line 5, insert the following:

"(2)(A) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1), if a contract under this chapter provides for the provision of, the payment for, or the reimbursement of the cost of health services for the care and treatment of any particular health condition other than a mental health condition, the carrier shall provide, pay, or reimburse for any such health service properly provided by a person licensed under State law to provide such service.

"(B) The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to group practice prepayment plans.".

SEC. 2. Section 8901(8) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out "before January 1, 1964" and inserting in lieu thereof "after December 31, 1978, and before January 1, 1980".

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

An Act to amend chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, to establish uniformity in Federal employee health benefits and coverage by preempting certain inconsistent State or local laws while recognizing the rights of States to determine who is to provide health services, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–903), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of H.R. 2931, as amended, is to establish uniformity in benefits and coverage under the Federal employees' health benefits program by providing that the provisions of any contract under such program shall supersede and preempt any State or local law or regulation that is inconsistent with such contractual provisions. At the same time, however, the purpose is to recognize the rights of States to determine who is to provide health services.

The bill also amends section 8901(8) of title 5, United States Code, to permit an employee organization, as defined under the section, to apply, after December 31, 1978, and before January 1, 1980, to the Civil Service Commission for approval of a health benefit plan.

HEARINGS

Hearings on H.R. 2931 were held by the Subcommittee on Civil Service and General Services on Septemebr 14, 1977. Appearing in support of the bill were: Mr. Thomas Tinsley, Director, Bureau of Retirement, Insurance and Occupational Health, U.S. Civil Service Commission; and Mr. Malcolm McIntyre, director, Government Relations Division, Aetna Life and Casualty Co. Appearing in opposition to the bill were: Dr. Robert B. Shelton, president, United Chiropractors of North America; Dr. Paul Parrott, American Chiropractic Association; and Mr. Herbert Anderson, the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.

Thereafter, the subcommittee amended the bill as described above and recommended favorable action by the full committee on the bill, as amended, on May 9, 1978.

BACKGROUND

The Federal employees' health benefits (FEHB) program, established by the Federal Employees' Health Benefits Act of 1959, now codified in chapter 89 of title 5, United States Code, provides health insurance coverage for about 3 million Federal employees and annuitants and 6 million dependents. The contracts negotiated between the Civil Service Commission and the various FEHB carriers are required to provide the same benefits for the same premium for all enrollees in a particular plan. The contracts specify the benefits to be provided by the various plans and the premium cost which is shared by the Government and the enrollees.

The total cost of the program in fiscal year 1976 was approximately $2.2 billion of which amount the Government contributed approximately $1.4 billion. The total cost of the program for fiscal year 1977 will be about $2.5 billion.

According to the Comptroller General, as documented in his October 17, 1975, report to the Congress entitled "Conflicts Between State Health Insurance Requirements and Contracts of the Federal Employee Health Benefits Carriers":

(1) Some doubt and confusion exists among the carriers and the States regarding the applicability of State requirements to FEHB contracts, and

(2) The States are becoming increasingly active in establishing and enforcing health insurance requirements.

As a result of these findings, the Comptroller General recommended that the Congress consider legislation to clarify the applicability of State insurance requirements to FEHB contracts.

Some States have established health insurance requirements that conflict with the provisions of the FEHB contracts, such as requiring recognition of certain practitioners not covered by Federal employee's health benefit plans. Many States have not attempted to enforce their requirements that conflict with the FEHB plans. In other States, the carriers have been successful in convincing the States that the Federal employees' plans are exempt from State requirements. Other States have enforced their requirements but have not done so uniformly for all carriers in the Federal program.

For example, the Indemnity Benefit Plan (Aetna) pays for chiropractic services in Nevada as required by State law, but does not pay for such services in any other State. Six employee organization plans pay for chiropractic services only in New York and Montana where State law requires coverage for such services. The Services Benefit Plan has been required to pay for these services only in Maryland and Oklahoma. Even in the States that have enforced conflicting requirements, few Federal enrollees are aware of the States' requirements, and, as a result, most enrollees do not attempt to obtain reimbursement for chiropractic services.

As a result of this situation, officials of the Civil Service Commission asked the General Counsel of the Commission to review the law and furnish legal opinion on the question of the dominance of the Federal Employees' Health Benefits law over State and local laws. The General Counsel's conclusion was that, based on the supremacy clause of the Constitution, the Federal Employees' Health Benefits law preempts State and local laws in this area. While the Commission has adopted the views of its General Counsel, the Commission has advised the committee as follows:

The Commission adopted the views of the General Counsel that the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act preempts State laws in this area. The Commission realizes that enforcement of this preemption policy will almost inevitably lead to time consuming and costly litigation with the States until its position is finally upheld by the courts. We do not view this as necessary or desirable. H.R. 2931 while it has more limited applicability does provide an immediate and permanent statutory solution to the problem of maintaining uniformity of benefits to all enrollees in the plan and enables the Commission, acting on behalf of the Government, to administer the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act in a reasonable and efficient manner. Furthermore, enactment of H.R. 2931 should result in a reduction in cost to the Federal Government and the employees.

COMMITTEE ACTION

H. R. 2931, as amended, guarantees that the provisions of health benefits contracts made under chapter 89, of title 5, United States Code, concerning benefits or coverage, would preempt any State and/or local insurance laws and regulations which are inconsistent with such contracts. Such a preemption, however, is purposely limited and will not provide insurance carriers under the program with exemptions from State laws and regulations governing other aspects of the insurance business, such as the payment of premium taxes and requirements for statutory reserves.

H.R. 2931 is needed not only to clear up the doubt and confusion which exists among the carriers and States, but also to clarify the Federal Government's and the Civil Service Commission's authority to regulate implementation of the law. As stated by the Civil Service Commission:

"While the FEHB law gives the Civil Service Commission the sole authority to negotiate contracts with participating carriers and to prescribe regulations to implement that law, the law does not give the Commission clear authority to issue regulations restricting the application of State laws when their provisions do not parallel the provisions in the Commission's health benefits contracts. The legislative history of the FEHB law is essentially silent on this point."

The committee also feels that a State's authority to control the licensing of health practitioners should also be preserved. As a result, an amendment was adopted which is designed to preserve certain States' authority by compelling insurance carriers to pay for any services which are contracted for if they are provided by a practitioner certified by the State to provide such services.

The amendment simply reserves to the States the right to determine who is and who is not qualified to provide health care; it encourages more innovative health techniques; it treats all health practitioners who treat the same conditions in an equitable manner; and it does not apply to mental health since existing Federal law already restricts payment to psychiatrists and clinical psychologists. (5, U.S.C., 8902(k))

A further modification to the bill allows employee organizations, as defined in section 8901(8) of title 5, United States Code, to apply after December 31, 1978, and before January 1, 1980, to the Civil Service Commission for approval of a health benefit plan. Such organizations have been, in effect, barred from applying to the Commission for a health benefit plan unless they applied before January 1, 1964, This change, however, should not be considered as a reflection upon the merits of any new plan which may be applied for, as it merely allows the Civil Service Commission to review new proposals and to judge whether or not they meet the requirements necessary for Federal employee health benefits programs.

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

The resolution (S. Res. 450) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of H.R. 11877, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of H.R. 11877 an Act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Peace Corps and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act. Such waiver is necessary to allow the authorization of $3,713,000 in additional funds for fiscal year 1978 for Peace Corps programs. The amount previously authorized for the Peace Corps, $83,900,000 for fiscal year 1978 is not adequate to cover the $2,000,000 in increased costs due to inflation and unanticipated support requirements, for statutory salary increases or the costs of rebuilding the Peace Corps program. The administration has requested an additional $3,644,000 to pay for program improvements, primarily in the area of training, and $69,000 for statutory salary increases.

Compliance with section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 was not possible by the May 15, 1977, deadline, because there had been inadequate time for the new administration to formulate its own proposals for the Peace Corps. Improved training and programing were subsequently identified as primary needs but implementation of planned improvements will cost more than the $82,900,000 in program funds authorized for fiscal year 1978. Peace Corps did not include a calculation for overseas inflation in its fiscal year 1978 budget request and has consequently confronted difficulties paying for inflationary cost increases.

The effect of defeating consideration of the supplemental authorization will be to delay most program improvements for a full year since the majority of Peace Corps training is conducted in the summer. It will also put a strain upon ongoing operations in the field. There is little or no surplus in other accounts to finance improved training because inflation, together with efforts to rebuild the program have strained all accounts.

The desired authorization will not delay the appropriations process and will need to be accommodated in a supplemental appropriation.

This authorization is sufficiently small that it will not significantly affect the congressional budget. However, its impact on Peace Corps efforts to improve its program, as advocated by a number of Senators, will be considerable.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-918), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE RESOLUTION

Section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 provides that it shall not be in order in either the House or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution which directly or indirectly authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill or resolution is reported in the House or Senate, as the case be, on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Because H.R. 11877 authorizes enactment of new budget authority which would become available in 1978 and was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations on May 12, 1978—after the May 15, 1977, deadline for fiscal year 1978 authorization—a resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Budget Act with respect to H.R. 11871 must be adopted before this bill can be considered by the Senate. In reporting favorably on the resolution, the Budget Committee is not prejudging the merits of the bill.

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

The resolution (S. Res. 453) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3075, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 3075 a bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act and for other purposes. Such waiver is necessary to allow the authorization of $5,000,000 in additional budget authority for fiscal year 1978 for foreign military sales credits. The amount previously authorized for this purpose, $677,000,000 has proven inadequate for the task of providing sufficient foreign military sales credits to Lebanon. The administration has requested an additional $5,000,000 in budget authority in order to provide $50,000,000 worth of foreign military sales credits to help rebuild the Lebanese Army.

Compliance with section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 was not possible by the May 15 1977, deadline, because the political and military situation in Lebanon has worsened since that date.

The effect of defeating consideration of the supplemental authorization will be to reduce the effectiveness of the Lebanese Army with possible negative consequences for peace in southern Lebanon and the Middle East region.

The desired authorization will not delay the appropriations process and will need to be accommodated in a supplemental appropriation.

This authorization is sufficiently small that it will not significantly affect the congressional budget. However, a modest and timely foreign military sales program would provide additional stability in southern Lebanon as Israeli forces withdraw from the area.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-919), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE RESOLUTION

Section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 provides that it shall not be in order in either the House or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution which directly or indirectly authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill or resolution is reported in the House or Senate, as the case may be, on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Because S. 3075 authorizes enactment of new budget authority for fiscal year 1978 and was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations on May 15, 1978—after the May 15, 1977, deadline for fiscal year 1978 authorization bills—a resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Budget Act with respect to S. 3075 must be adopted before this bill can be considered by the Senate. In reporting favorably on the resolution, the Budget Committee is not prejudging the merits of this bill.

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

The resolution (S. Res. 455) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3076, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402 (c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 3076, a bill to authorize fiscal year 1979 appropriations for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting, and for other purposes. Such waiver is necessary because the bill also contains supplemental fiscal year 1978 authorizations for two purposes: (1) the payment of arrearages of $37,275,000 in the assessed United States contribution to United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (section 108); and (2) an additional grant of $10,468,000 to Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, Inc., to provide for the continuation of radio operations until the end of this fiscal year by compensating for the unexpectedly sharp fall in the international value of the United States dollar (section 301).

For neither purpose was it possible to report authorizing legislation by May 15, 1977. As regards United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, it was not clear by that date that that organization had substantially reduced its politicized, anti-Israel activities; it was thus not appropriate at that time to end the cut-back on United States contributions to United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization begun in 1975. As regards RFE/RL, Inc., funds were provided in the original fiscal year 1978 authorization to compensate for a possible depreciation in the relative value of the dollar, but in recent months the actual depreciation exceeded that allowance by a considerable margin, rendering RFE/RL, Inc., unable to fulfill its planned level of operations without a supplemental grant.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-920), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE RESOLUTION

Section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 provides that it shall not be in order in either the House or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution which directly or indirectly authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill or resolution is reported in the House or Senate, as the case may be, on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Because S. 3076, as reported, authorizes enactment of new budget authority which would be available in fiscal year 1978, and was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations on May 15, 1978—after the May 15, 1977 deadline—a resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Budget Act with respect to S. 3076 must be adopted before the bill may be considered by the Senate. In reporting favorably on the resolution, the Budget Committee is not prejudging the merits of the bill.

BUDGET ACT WAIVER

The resolution (S. Res. 460) waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3112, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congresional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 3112, a bill to amend the Act of October 19, 1965, authorizing construction of the Library of Congress James Madison Memorial Building. Waiver in fiscal year 1978 of section 402(a) is necessary to allow for an increase in the funding authorization for construction of the building.

S. 3112 would increase the authorization for construction funds by $10,000,000, from $123,000,000 to $133,000,000. The amount previously authorized is inadequate to cover the costs of necessary changes in the building resulting from congressionally mandated expansion of its functions, construction delays, and inflation.

Compliance with section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 was not possible by the May 15, 1977, deadline, because the Architect of the Capitol did not become aware of the inadequacy of the authorization until late in 1977. The amount of additional funds needed was not known until early in 1978, and the Committee on Rules and Administration did not receive this information until May 3, 1978.

The effect of defeating consideration of the additional authorization would be to further delay construction, thereby adding to the total cost of completing the project, and putting additional pressure on the Library of Congress to carry out the missions assigned to it by the Congress.

The desired authorization will not have the effect of delaying the appropriations process; it will need to be accommodated in a supplemental appropriation.

This authorization is sufficiently small that it will not significantly affect the congressional budget. However, it will result in completion of a project which is badly needed in order to meet the changing and expanding responsibilities of the Library of Congress.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-922), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—EXECUTIVE J, 95TH CONGRESS 2D SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the Protocol Amending the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean, signed at Tokyo, April 25, 1978 (Executive J, 95th Cong., 2d sess.), transmitted to the Senate today by the President.

I ask unanimous consent that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message from the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit the Protocol Amending the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean between the United States, Canada, and Japan for Senate advice and consent to ratification. The Protocol, along with accompanying Agreed Minutes and Memoranda of Understanding, were signed in Tokyo on April 25, 1978.

The Protocol amends the existing International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean. Under the Protocol salmon of United States origin will receive substantially greater protection than afforded under the existing International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean signed on May 9, 1952. An amendment to the existing Convention, rather than sole reliance on the provisions of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, is being sought in order to obtain the continuing benefits of the abstention principle established by the existing Convention, and to overcome the practical management and enforcement problems which occur in areas of the high seas where United States origin salmon intermingle with salmon originating in other countries.

I transmit also for the information of the Senate the report of the Department of State with respect to the Protocol and associated documents.

I urge the Senate to act favorably at an early date on this Protocol.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 5, 1978.

ORDER FOR STAR PRINT OF S. 2788

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a star print of S. 2788, a bill to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, be authorized, in order to make corrections in the original bill as filed by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation. These corrections will make the bill conform to the changes made in existing law as reflected in the committee's report 95-885. In addition, the star print amends the title of S. 2788.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR H.R. 39 TO BE HELD AT THE DESK

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 39 be held at the desk until the close of business on June 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SPECIAL ORDER—CONSIDERATION OF UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday of this week, after the two leaders have been recognized under the standing order, Mr. DURKIN be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate resume its consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NEW YORK CITY—A HUMAN, COMPASSIONATE TOWN WHICH CAN AND SHOULD STAND ON ITS OWN FEET.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, every once in a while a simple human interest story comes to our attention that tells more vividly than statistics what a city or commmunity is really like.

Take New York City for instance. Tomorrow, the Senate banking committee begins its hearings on New York City, with the appearance of mayor Koch. Some of us on the committee are opposed to further Federal loan assistance to New York. We feel the city has the resources to solve its problems but that it will only do so if it has to. We feel the best service the Federal Government could give the city would be to deny further loans or guarantees and require the city to face up to its problems. My mail from New York City has been running consistently 3 to 1 to do exactly this.

Mr. President, we are dealing with a city which is not only a great one but also an intensely human one. A letter in today's New York Times describes the reaction of New Yorkers to a serious bus accident:

When the crash occurred, the front end of the bus was crushed so badly that there was no means of egress, and so, motorists behind us, halted by the crash, came rushing over to us and urged us to jump out the windows before the bus caught fire or exploded.

We jumped and they stood there to catch us. Within minutes, ambulances and police and firemen were there. As I jumped, after the women were cleared, except for the women pinned down in front, I found the ambulances already filled. A policeman grabbed a woman and myself, rushed us into a patrol car and sped us to Lincoln Hospital. Apparently, the hospital had already been alerted, and as we arrived, there was a small battalion of doctors, nurses and orderlies, and all hands that could turn to and render medical aid. With hard-to-believe devotion to duty, they worked over every accident victim, until every one was under control. They never stopped for a moment.

I was born, bred and educated in New York City, many years ago, and always loved New York. In recent years, I have heard too many people criticize New York, the police, the firemen and doctors and hospitals.

I saw the real New York go into action that day. There is no other place in the world quite like it.

This is the Big Apple—and all our critics better believe it, and learn from it.

Mr. President, I agree with that wholeheartedly. I think there is no inconsistency between believing that and thinking highly of the people of New York and at the same time taking the posture that, as I say, three of four New Yorkers who write me say that we should require the city to use its resources to meet its own problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article, which portrays how human, compassionate and helpful New Yorkers can be, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I SAW THE REAL NEW YORK GO INTO ACTION

TO THE EDITOR: This is the story of the bus crash and the Big Apple. I was a passenger aboard the Riverdale bus that crashed on the Major Deegan Expressway May 24, in which so many were injured. Despite my injuries I could not help but note many of the incidents that took place immediately after the crash, incidents which should make us all proud to be New Yorkers.

When the crash occurred, the front end of the bus was crushed so badly that there was no means of egress, and so, motorists behind us, halted by the crash, came rushing over to us and urged us to jump out the windows before the bus caught fire or exploded.

We jumped and they stood there to catch us. Within minutes, ambulances and police and firemen were there. MEMORIAL DAY: A TIME TO REMEMBER THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a week ago today, on Memorial Day, our Nation remembered those who died in the service of our country. Had it not been for their courage and strength in times of past crises, we might not be meeting in this room today.

So many of our brightest, strongest, and talented gave their lives for America. It is fitting that we dedicate 1 day each year in memoriam. I ask, can we do more?

Mr. President, I think we can. We can approve a treaty which strengthens our commitment to the tenets for which thousands of American soldiers died. We can ratify a treaty which makes genocide an international crime.

The Genocide Treaty has already been approved by 82 nations, including all of our Western allies.

How can we maintain our commitment to human rights if we refrain from signing? How can we demonstrate to other nations that our support for basic human liberties is more than just rhetoric? How can we inspire other nations to protect individual rights within their own borders?

The fact that this treaty remains unapproved after 30 years has been a constant source of embarrassment to this Nation. Time and time again we have had to admit that we were not among the signers of a treaty condemning mass murder. It is time now to take action against this horrible and barbarous crime.

On Memorial Day, we remembered Americans who put foremost the cause of human liberties on this continent and in nations the world over.

Let us further honor their memory by ratifying the Genocide Convention.

I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I never fail to be pleased and tremendously interested at this time of the day when the distingiushed Senator from Wisconsin appears on the floor and warms my heart and delights me reminding us that we have been so remiss and so much against our own deep feelings and our own nature and character in failing to ratify the Genocide Treaty, and always has a special bit on New York City about which I think, with pardonable pride, I know a thing or two. We will have our inning tomorrow. The Senator from Wisconsin, with his customary friendship and generosity, has invited Senator MOYNIHAN and myself to sit with the committee, as we have before.

I only like to tell the Senator what the real issue is, and he has heard me before, and I am saying this again because I feel so deeply that what he has to say on the subject should be reiterated. I think the real issue is will this spirit live. It is a marvelous spirit. Many, many millions of people pass through New York first thinking, well, it is a callous city and everyone is looking at you for what you have and for how much you are going to give them. But it really is a city full of ethnicity and, therefore, the special character which ethnicity gives our country.

It is also a city noted for its generosity and hep characters, who have hearts much in the Damon Runyon tradition, as well as for elevated traditions of our great educational institutions and scientific institutions. But this city's vitality, dynamism, and heart is based upon its infrastructure. It is the greatest city in the world because of what it is built on and how it is built.

My problem is in New York City, with all these wonderful feelings, sentiments, and courage in the face of what it takes to live in New York and be a New Yorker, why do so many people say they love to visit but do not want to live there, though the atmosphere is stimulating and exciting? It is hard to live there, very hard to live there. The electricity can blow up, the subways can stop, they can have blackouts, the place can be covered with garbage, you can have epidemics, all these automobiles can break down, and those policemen can strike. Do not forget that. And those firemen, too. And that is what we are facing.

We are facing the fact that the greatest city in the world, which is in our country, could find itself in this paralyzed position simply because of the financial infrastructure breakdown.

On tomorrow, I say to the Senator from Wisconsin, we must try to prove that case to him. I have not given up on him, not at all. He saw our plight once before and he met it. I think he will again.

I thank the Chair.

CEREMONY DEDICATES CARL T. CURTIS DAM

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague, Senator CURTIS of Nebraska, was in Elwood, Nebr., recently for the dedication of a dam and reservoir named in his honor.

It was a proud moment for Senator CURTIS and the occasion for a dedicatory ceremony with J. W. "Pat" O'Meara, executive vice president, National Water Resources Association, Washington, D.C., giving the main address.

Mr. O'Meara's address provided both a fine history of reclamation but is a singular tribute to Senator CURTIS.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEDICATION OF THE CARL T. CURTIS DAM AND RESERVOIR

It is a signal honor and a cherished privilege to have the opportunity to come to Gosper County and join with my fellow Nebraskans to render richly deserved homage to one of the great civic leaders of our beloved State.

You can see by my grey hair, I am sure, that I am not exactly a young man. Suffice to say, I am on the sunnyside of 50 and bearing-down on 60. I was born just down the line a piece, in Hastings, and I want you to know that, way back in time, when I was still in high school, and several years before I was old enough to vote, Carl Curtis was elected to represent me in the Congress of the United States. That was a long time ago. When first elected, he represented the Fourth Congressional District of Nebraska which, at that time, consisted of 25 counties extending west from Gage and Lancaster Counties. Later, when the State was reapportioned, it became the First Congressional District, which included the southern two tiers of counties stretching from the Missouri River on the East to the Colorado border on the West. While it contained several major cities, with Lincoln, of course, the largest, it also encompassed Beatrice, Falls City, Hastings, Holdrege, and McCook, but the pivotal city was Minden.

During Carl's first term in the Congress, Nebraska had five Representatives, rather than the present three. Carl was elected to the Congress on November 8, 1938, by whomping the incumbent Democrat, and fellow Mindenite, Charles Binderup (by more than 17,000 votes out of a total turn-out of about 100,000. Other Nebraska Representatives serving with Carl back in the 76th Congress were George Henry Heinké, Nebraska City; Charles F. McLaughlin, Omaha; Karl Steffan, Norfolk; and Harry B. Coffee, Chadron. The Nebraska Senators at that time were George W. Norris, McCook, and Edward Raymond Burke, Omaha. About the only name on that list that has survived the test of time is George Norris, except, of course, Carl T. Curtis; a name that has grown in stature and, over the years, has become synonymous with dedication and service.

In Carl's maiden speech in the House of Representatives, an important event in the career of any freshman Congressman, he used the opportunity to extol the virtues of Nebraska. He described its rich soil and the rolling hills, the great herds of cattle, its amber waves of wheat and soldier straight rows of green corn. "Why," he said "Mr. Speaker, all Nebraska needs to be a paradise is lots of water and good people." At that point, a member of the Ohio delegation rose and asked, "Will the Gentleman yield?" Quite flattered to have the attention of one of the senior members of the House, Mr. Curtis said he would be happy to yield to the Gentleman from Ohio. The Congressman thanked Mr. Curtis for yielding and said, "I am pleased to learn from your very edifying address that all Nebraska needs is good people and lots of water, but I would remind the Gentleman from Nebraska that good people and lots of water are all they need in Hell.' "

Of course, that story is not true, but this one is: At a Senate hearing about a year ago, Senator Hansen of Wyoming was questioning a witness from the Department of Agriculture about the drought that was searing the West. "What criteria do you use," the Senator asked, "to decide that a drought exists?" At that point Senator Curtis quipped, "That's when you have ducks that are 2 years old who don't know how to swim."

The Board of Directors of my Association, the National Water Resources Association, at a recent meeting, reviewed the long congressional career of Senator Curtis, and graded his performance relative to water resources development. On a scale of 1 to 10, they rated Carl a 12! That is just one way of saying how fitting it is that the officials of the Tri-County would today designate, for all time, that this project shall bear his name. What a simply marvelous monument to a fabulous career!

Senator Curtis has worked in the shadow of the beautiful monuments, large and small, that have been raised in Washington, D. C., to honor the great and the near great of this country; but, I believe nothing could please Carl more than the honor you do him today, for he often has said "The backbone of Nebraska's economy is irrigated agriculture." To give his name to an irrigation project is indeed a fitting tribute.

This project was authorized in 1974 under the provisions of the Small Reclamation Projects Act of 1956. Fifty-four such projects have been completed throughout the West, and 65 are under construction or in various stages of approval. These projects have been highly significant in conserving and extending the use of scarce Western water supplies. This project is in operation today because of the personal intervention of Senator Curtis. He obtained a project endorsement from the President, and, if he had not so effectively intervened, this project might well be one of the 65 that still are in various stages of approval.

But, this project is a reality, and full water service will be provided to 33,642 acres that now receive only partial water, and 9,158 new acres will be irrigated. The total project cost is just over $17 million, of which almost $10 million will be repaid in direct payments, and the total cost will be repaid many times over through increased productivity, cash earnings, and new jobs.

There are those who criticize reclamation projects like the one we are gathered here to dedicate today. They complain that we produce too much food and fiber, and that we have huge surpluses and costly Government programs to keep some land fallow, while we increase crop production through irrigation. To those who say we produce too much food, I just wonder how they respond to a recent UNICEF appeal which points out that the threat of severe malnutrition or even starvation faces 400 to 500 million children in the poorer nations of the world; that of these children, 30 percent will die before the age of 5; that right now an entire generation of children runs the risk of being scarred for life by the effects of semi-starvation and malnutrition; and whose heritage appears to be disease, blindness, mental retardation, and stunted growth.

But, isn't it nice to contemplate, and I am sure it will happen, that some of the extra food that will be produced because of this project, will find its way to those desperately needy children.

To those who say the Reclamation program is too costly, I would like to cite some interesting figures developed by the Denver Research Institute of the University of Denver. In 1975 (the latest year data is available), as a direct result of Reclamation programs, there was a net increase in business activity of $11.3 billion. Federal internal revenues received an extra $1.8 billion, and State tax coffers were enriched by $935 million.

That is quite a record for just 1 year, when our total investment in Reclamation over 76 years is only about $7 billion. Now you and I both know that $7 billion is a lot of money, but let me point out that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare has a budget request for fiscal year 1979 of $185 billion. When I note the budget for the Department includes an item for "training and employment, social services, and other labor services" at $18.4 billion. I begin to wonder. What I really begin to wonder is: Is this enormous expense really justified? For those outlays, there is no cost/benefit ratio, no EIS, no discount rate, no repayment schedule, and finally, it is not an investment, it is an expense.

At the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Secretary Califano recently announced that his Inspector General had discovered that in 1 year his Department had unnecessarily or improperly spent between $6.3 and $7.4 billion. If the President would really like to save money, I would suggest HEW would be a good place to assign his "Hit List" gang rather than to halt construction of worthy water development projects authorized by the Congress. We need a new fiscal policy far more than we need a new water policy. I don't think I would be so nervous about a new water policy if one of the experts working on it back in Washington hadn't asked me how many acres there were in a section. Which brings to mind an old adage—If it ain't broke, don't try to fix it.

Nebraska is doing its share and more in agricultural production. There are now over 60,000 irrigation wells in this State. From the water produced by those wells, and from the surface water that is now available from the various projects that are now in operation, there are now 7.1 million irrigated acres in this State, making Nebraska the third largest State in the Nation in irrigated lands.

Now that kind of development doesn't "just happen." It is the result of a lot of hard work, planning, perseverance, and dedication. It just may be a beneficial legacy of the great drought of the early 1930's when we learned the bitter lesson that the rich soil of Nebraska is barren and fruitless without water. The pioneers learned in the school of hard knocks that we cannot depend on the vagaries of Nature for a regular and constant supply of life-giving water. From that same stern catalyst came a part of Senator Curtis' basic political ambition—the development of the economy and resources of his native State. Inherent in achieving that ambition is the fundamental need to develop and wisely use its God-given precious water.

In passing, let me recall the names of just a few Nebraskans who have worked with Carl down through the years and who deserve to be remembered. Senator George Norris, who I mentioned earlier, but also Senator Ken Wherry, Rep. A. L. Miller, Fred Seaton, Judge Smith, Harry Strunk, George Johnson, Dr. Kingsley, C. W. McConaughy, Hugh Butler, and, yes, many of you who have gathered here today. To those who have gone before, and to you who continue to labor for water resource development, we are most grateful for your service.

There are a great many dedicated civic-minded citizens who have labored long and productively in the water resources development arena, but two additional men should be remembered today: Harry W. Bashore and Floyd Dominy, both Nebraskans and both served with distinction as the Commissioner of Reclamation.

At this point I would like to exercise the prerogative of the speaker and inject a personal note. As you know, I represent NWRA, which is simply a confederation or a union of the water associations in the 17 Reclamation States and Hawaii. Representing the Nebraska Water Resources Association here today is the President Bob Peterson. One other person here who also once worked for the Bureau and the Tri-County, and who has built miles of roads and highways and dozens of dams, and who built this dam—I'm proud of him—he's my brother Gene O'Meara and his lovely wife Jean.

As I reviewed the Senator's long, distinguished, and successful career, it occurred to me that his political philosophy could be boiled down to just three words: God Bless America!

I say that because I know of no better way to bless America than to work to develop the gifts of natural resources that are available to us. That kind of effort is clearly evident in the 40-year congressional career of Carl Curtis.

Carl has served long, and he has served us well. Now we know that someone else will fill Carl's seat in the 96th Congress. Who that person will be is up to the electorate of this State. Before you make your choice, I hope you will clearly ascertain the philosophies of those who seek to succeed Mr. Curtis, and make sure—no, make doubly sure—that the man who gets your vote will be the man who will continue to advocate and support an aggressive and imaginative water resources development program for this great Nation! You cornhuskers can ill afford to be represented in the United States Senate by a man who will waffle on water resource development decisions.

I would like to sum up what I have had to say today by quoting the words of a great American:

Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic—but destroy our farms, and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

Those words were uttered before the turn of the century by that great American, great Nebraskan, William Jennings Bryan. They are as true today as they were then, and since they underscore the importance of what we do here today, I'm going to repeat them:

Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic—but destroy our farms, and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

So let the word go forth from Elwood, Nebraska, that what we do here on May 28, in the year of nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and in the two hundred and second year of the Republic, be inscribed from this day forward and forever more on all maps and charts and on the hearts of a grateful citizenry. This is a richly deserved recognition of distinguished service, and a mark of our esteem.

When we consider the source, the dedication, and the commitment of Senator Carl T. Curtis, certainly the words of the Bible ring true: "You have fought the good fight, you have run the race, you have kept the faith."

For myself and for all gathered here today for this auspicious event, I say: Congratulations Carl! God Bless America, and God Bless You, Senator Curtis!

CONCLUSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on Wednesday the Senate will convene at 11 a.m. After the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order, Mr. DURKIN will be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate will resume its consideration of the unfinished business. At 4 p.m., the 1 hour under the cloture rule will begin running, at the close of which the clerk will call the roll to establish the presence of a quorum, upon which the rollcall vote being automatic will occur on the motion to invoke cloture.

If cloture is invoked, which it will not be on Wednesday, the Senate will then proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until that business is completed. If cloture is not invoked on Wednesday, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business.

Senators will assemble here at 8 a.m. tomorrow morning on the Capitol steps for departure to Andrews Air Force Base from whence Senators will depart to Alabama to attend the final services for our colleague, Senator JAMES B. ALLEN.

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, and pursuant to Senate Resolution 472, as a further mark of respect to the memory of our late departed colleague, Senator JAMES B. ALLEN, that the Senate stand in recess until 11 a.m. Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:06 p.m., the Senate recessed until Wednesday, June 7, 1978, at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, June 5, 1978

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Psalms 46: 1.

O God, our Father, who hast given us minds with which to think, hearts with which to love and hands and feet with which to work, help us always to hold these gifts as sacred trusts from Thee and to use them in Thy service for the welfare of our country and all mankind. May we ever keep our minds upon that which is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and gracious that out of good thoughts and good deeds there may come good work for our people this day and all our days.

Before Thee we remember the life and work of our adored Senator JAMES B. ALLEN. We thank Thee for him, for his great character, his grand patriotism, his generous good will and his genuine concern for his State and his country. Comfort his family with Thy presence and strengthen them for the days that lie ahead. Be Thou their refuge and their strength—now and forever more. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

RECALCULATING RETIRED PAY OF CERTAIN SENIOR ENLISTED ADVISERS OF MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 10343) to provide for recalculation of the retired pay of individuals who served as sergeant major of the Marine Corps before December 16, 1967.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so only to provide the chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Compensation an opportunity to describe the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a fair bill. It was originally the bill that I sponsored, correcting a longstanding inequity faced by some of our most outstanding enlisted men.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS).

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I also reserve the right to object. I do so for the same reasons as the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DAVIS). I would like to hear from the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) also, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DAVIS) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL), my colleagues on the subcommittee, for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, the bill will allow the two remaining sergeant majors in the Marine Corps, who served in that position before December 16, 1967, to calculate their retired pay on the same basis as enlisted members serving in that position for that time. We are talking about a total amount of money of $8,000. It is in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

H.R. 10343

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the retired pay of any individual who served as sergeant major of the Marine Corps and who completed such service before December 16, 1967, shall be computed based upon a rate of basic pay of the sum of (1) the highest rate of basic pay to which such individual was entitled while so serving, and (2) $150.

(b) For the purpose of computing any adjustment under section 1401a of title 10, United States Code, in the retired pay of any individual whose retired pay is affected by subsection (a), the rate of basic pay provided under such subsection for the purpose of computing the retired pay of such individual shall be considered to have been the rate of basic pay applicable to such individual at the time of his retirement, and any adjustment under such section 1401a in the retired pay of such individual before September 30, 1978, shall be readjusted to reflect such rate of basic pay.

SEC. 2. (a) Any change in the retired pay of any individual by reason of the enactment of this Act shall be effective for months beginning after September 30, 1978.

(b) The enactment of this Act shall not reduce the retired pay of any individual.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FEDERICO DEGETAU FEDERAL BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4270) to designate the Federal building and United States courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, the "Federico Degetau Federal Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4270

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal building and United States courthouse located on Carlos Chardon Street, Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, is hereby designated as the "Federico Degetau Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Federico Degetau Federal Building".

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4270 would designate the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, the "Federico Degetau Federal Building."

Federico Degetau was born in Ponce, Puerto Rico, on December 5, 1862. He attended the public schools, the Colegio Central in Ponce and completed an academic course at Barcelona, Spain. Degetau studied law in several universities in Spain and in 1888 he received a law degree from the Central University in Madrid. He was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Madrid.

Federico Degetau entered the Spanish Academy of Jurisprudence on Legislation and was one of the founders of the Societe Francaise pour L'Arbitraje entre Nations. Degetau returned to Puerto Rico, after many years in Spain, and became actively involved in politics. In 1897 he was a member of the Municipal Council of San Juan. During that same year he was appointed one of the four commissioners sent to Spain to request autonomy for Puerto Rico. The principles of liberalism and colonial reform were the moving forces which guided him during this mission and during his future years as Puerto Rico's delegate to the Cortes of Spain, a position he occupied until 1898. Later he was the mayor of San Juan, the capital city of Puerto Rico. In 1899 General Henry appointed him Secretary of the Interior in the first cabinet formed in Puerto Rico under the American flag.

He was also appointed, on a later date, by General Davis as a member of the Insular Board of Charities. From 1899 to 1900 Degetau also served as first vice president of the Municipal Council of San Juan and was president of the Board of Education of San Juan from 1900 to 1901.

On November 6, 1900, he was elected first Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico to the U.S. House of Representatives. As Resident Commissioner, under the Foraker Act of 1900, he had neither voice nor vote, since he had no floor privileges. In 1901, he was admitted to the U.S. Supreme Court bar. Among his achievements while in office was his testimony before the House Committee on Insular Affairs which gained floor privileges for the position of Resident Commissioner. His services until 1905, contributed to the importance and effectiveness of the office of the Resident Commissioner in representing the people of Puerto Rico in the U.S. Congress. He renewed the practice of law and died at the age of 51 years in Santurce, Puerto Rico on January 20, 1914.

In view of his career as an attorney and statesman in search of justice and liberty for his fellow men, it is a fitting and proper tribute to name the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, the "Federico Degetau Federal Building."●

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. MINETA.

H.R. 4270 honors Federico Degetau by naming the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, after him. Federico Degetau spent nearly all of his adult life in civic and governmental work. He was elected first Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico to the U.S. House of Representatives on November 6, 1900. His services until 1905, contributed greatly to the prestige and effectiveness of the office of the Resident Commissioner in representing the people of Puerto Rico in the U.S. Congress. In view of his tireless efforts in representing the people of Puerto Rico, it is, indeed, a proper tribute to name the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, in his honor.●

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of my bill H.R. 4270.

I want to commend the Committee on Public Works and Transportation for their action in reporting out favorably H.R. 4270. The approval of this bill will reflect the views of the House as an appropriate way of honoring the late Federico Degetau.

You must be wondering who was this man that deserves the privilege of having a Federal building named after him. Federico Degetau was the first Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in the U.S. House of Representatives. He laid the foundation for the expansion of the role of the Resident Commissioner Office to what it is today.

I think it is proper to mention some of the most relevant highlights on the life and deeds of Mr. Degetau.

Federico Degetau was born in Ponce, Puerto Rico, on December 5, 1862. He attended the public schools, the Colegio Central in Ponce and completed an academic course at Barcelona, Spain. Degetau studied law in several universities in Spain and in 1888 he received a law degree from the Central University in Madrid. He was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Madrid.

Frederico Degetau entered the Spanish Academy of Jurisprudence on Legislation and was one of the founders of the Societe Francaise pour L'Arbitraje entre Nations. Degetau returned to Puerto Rico, after many years in Spain, and became actively involved in politics. In 1897 he was a member of the Municipal Council of San Juan. During that same year he was appointed one of the four commissioners sent to Spain to request autonomy for Puerto Rico. The principles of liberalism and colonial reform were the moving forces which guided him during this mission and during his future years as Puerto Rico's delegate to the Cortes of Spain, a position he occupied until 1898. Later he was the mayor of San Juan, the capital city of Puerto Rico. In 1899 General Henry appointed him secretary of the interior in the first cabinet formed in Puerto Rico under the American flag.

He was also appointed, on a later date, by General Davis as a member of the Insular Board of Charities. From 1899 to 1900 Degetau also served as first vicepresident of the Municipal Council of San Juan and was president of the Board of Education of San Juan from 1900 to 1901.

On November 6, 1900, he was elected first Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico to the U.S. House of Representatives. As Resident Commissioner, under the Foraker Act of 1900, he had neither voice nor vote, since he had no floor privileges. In 1901, he was admitted to the U.S. Supreme Court bar. Among his achievements while in office was his testimony before the House Committee on Insular Affairs which gained floor privileges for the position of Resident Commissioner. His services until 1905, contributed to the importance and effectiveness of the Office of the Resident Commissioner in representing the people of Puerto Rico in the U.S. Congress. He renewed the practice of law and died at the age of 51 years in Santurce, Puerto Rico on January 20, 1914.

In view of his career as an attorney and statesman in search of justice and liberty for his fellow men, it is a fitting and proper tribute to name the Federal building and U.S. courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, the "Federico Degetau Federal Building." May I also say that today's action by the House represents an honor not only to Federico Degetau but to all Puerto Ricans who will see with great satisfaction that the largest Federal office building in our island will bear the name of a fellow Puerto Rican.●

MIKE MONRONEY AERONAUTICAL CENTER

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 7674) to designate the "Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, the Federal Aviation Administration Aeronautical Center, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such Center shall be held to be a reference to the Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center.

o Mr. MINETA. Mr Speaker, H.R. 7674 would designate the Federal Aviation Administration Aeronautical Center in Oklahoma City, Okla., the "Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center."

Congressman Mike Monroney was born in Oklahoma City, Okla., on March 2, 1902. He attended public schools and was graduated from the University of Oklahoma in 1924, and then served his community as a journalist and in private enterprise. In 1938 he was elected to the House of Representatives, where he served with distinction until his election in 1950 to the U.S. Senate. He continued to represent the people of Oklahoma in the Senate for 18 years.

During the course of his congressional service, Congressman Monroney was particularly noted for his efforts to improve the organization of the Congress. He served as vice chairman of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress during the 79th Congress; he coauthored with Senator Robert M. LaFollette the legislative reorganization bill of 1946; and he served as cochairman of the Joint Committee on Organization of Congress in 1965. His career was also noted by various public service awards, among them the 1945 Collier's Award for "Distinguished Congressional Service" and the 1961 Wright Brothers' Memorial Trophy for public service in aviation.

In view of his long and distinguished career and his interest in aviation, and in view of his many years of outstanding service to the people of his community, his State, and his country, it is fitting and proper that the Aeronautical Center in Oklahoma City, Okla., be named in his honor as the "Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center."●

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of our Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. MINETA.

H.R. 7674 honors an outstanding American, the Honorable Mike Monroney, by naming the aeronautical center in Oklahoma City, Okla., after him.

In 1939, he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives and began a role of public service that became marked with various legislative accomplishments. In 1950, he was elected to the U.S. Senate when he continued to represent the people of Oklahoma admirably for 18 years. During his years in the Congress, he held various committee posts and sponsored major bills, including legislation dealing with aviation and congressional reorganization. He was held in the highest regard by his colleagues for his long and dedicated service. He served not only the State of Oklahoma, but the entire country with distinction and it is most fitting to name the aeronautical center in his honor.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 1640) to designate the Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1640

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, the Federal Aviation Administration Aeronautical Center, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such center shall be held to be a reference to the Mike Monroney Aeronautical Center.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 7674) was laid on the table.

CHET HOLIFIELD BUILDING

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 12138) to name a certain Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal building located at 2400 Avila Road, Laguna Niguel, California, is hereby designated as the "Chet Holifield Building". Any reference in any law, regulation, document, record, map, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be considered to be a reference to the Chet Holifield Building.

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12138 would name the Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., the "Chet Holifield Building."

Congressman Chet Holifield was born in Mayfield, Ky., on December 3, 1903. He was educated in the public schools of Arkansas and has resided in California since 1920. He has served his community, his State, and his country for many years.

Chet Holifield was first elected to Congress in November 1942, and he served with distinction in the House of Representatives for 32 years. He was entrusted by the House with a great many responsibilities, among them chairman 87th, 89th, and 91st Congresses, vice chairman 88th and 90th Congresses, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy; chairman, House Committee on Government Operations; chairman, Subcommittee on Legislation and Military Operations, House Committee on Government Operations; and member, House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

And perhaps most notably, because of his special expertise in the field, he served as congressional adviser or delegate to innumerable commissions and international conferences on atomic energy.

In view of his long and distinguished career, and in view of his many years of outstanding service to the people of his district and to his country, it is fitting and proper that the Federal building at Laguna Niguel, Calif., be named in his honor as the "Chet Holifield Building."●

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of our Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Mr. MINETA.

H.R. 12138 honors a prominent American—former Congressman Chet Holifield—by naming the Federal building in Laguna Niguel, Calif., after him. Congressman Holifield was elected to Congress in 1942 and served admirably through the next 32 years until his retirement at the end of the 93d Congress. Chet Holifield held various committee posts while serving in Congress. Most notably, he served as chairman of the House Government Operations Committee in 1949. He handled the legislation which created the General Services Administration, the agency which has jurisdiction over the Federal building at Laguna Niguel, Calif. During his years in Congress, he served not only the State of California, but the entire country in helping to build America. He was the driving force behind meaningful legislation designed to assist the entire country. He was forthright and eloquent in his belief in our system of government and the American way of life. He labored long and hard and served the Congress and his constituents with distinction. I am sure that all of the California delegation and all of the people in California would agree that Chet Holifield was a very fine Congressman and would agree with the contents of this bill.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the three bills just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

DECLARING THAT THE UNITED STATES HOLDS IN TRUST FOR THE PUEBLO OF SANTA ANA CERTAIN PUBLIC DOMAIN LANDS

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 3924) to declare that the United States holds in trust for the Pueblo of Santa Ana certain public domain lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

DECLARING THAT THE UNITED STATES HOLDS IN TRUST FOR THE PUEBLO OF ZIA CERTAIN PUBLIC DOMAIN LANDS

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 10240) to declare that the United States holds in trust for the Pueblo of Zia certain public domain lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

VLADIMIR SLEPAK

(Mr. WAXMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, Vladimir Slepak, who has been refused permission to leave the Soviet Union for over 8 years, was arrested by the authorities on June 1. The charge is "hooliganism." His "crime" was that he hung a banner from his apartment window with the plea, "Let my family go to Israel." If convicted of this absurd charge, Vladimir Slepak can be sentenced to 5 years in prison.

This is simply the latest in a series of outrages which have marked the Soviet campaign to completely destroy any hope held by the Soviet "refuseniks" that they may some day be permitted to live in freedom.

That the Soviet Government threatens to imprison an individual for 5 years, because of a simple public plea for mercy and compassion is a measure of Soviet determination to silence all opposition.

Vladimir Slepak has been without employment since he applied to emigrate to Israel in March 1970. A radio engineer, he has been told that he is in possession of "state secrets"—a common excuse employed by the authorities to reject emigration applications. But even though Soviet lay provides that such a basis for refusing permission to emigrate is void after 5 years, the Slepak family has received no relief.

Vladimir Slepak's public plea was an act of desperation. If it was not to be in vain, we in the Congress must speak out on his behalf. I urge may colleagues to join me in signing a letter of protest to the Soviet authorities, and calling for his release from prison and freedom to leave the Soviet Union.

THE 55-MILE-PER-HOUR SPEED LIMIT SHOULD BE ENFORCED

(Mr. WINN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, anyone who has driven on our highways recently has noticed that the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit adopted 5 years ago is being violated by up to as many as three-fourths of the motorists on the road. Even people driving Federal and State vehicles are guilty of breaking the law.

Recently, one of my constituents related two instances in which he was passed by official Government vehicles. One was a Navy recruiting car traveling in excess of 65 miles per hour, and the other was a Job Corps bus which passed him as if he were standing still.

There is no question that enforcement efforts have been lax. Nevertheless, it is ridiculous to have a law on the books if it is not being enforced. Moreover, it is absurd to expect the average citizen to obey the law voluntarily if he sees it broken daily by State and Federal vehicles.

The House will soon have an opportunity to do something about this situation. When we consider the highway bill for fiscal year 1979, I ask that Members pay particular attention to provisions for funding assistance to the States specifically for the purpose of enforcing the speed limit.

Some people want us to raise the speed limit or let the States set their own. However, I believe we should retain the present law, despite some of the inconveniences it may cause.

In the meantime, we can assist the States by implementing an aggressive program of public information and education and by continuing to emphasize our own commitment to the speed limit. Saving lives and energy are much more important than inconvenience.

THE LATE SENATOR JOSEPH M. MONTOYA

(Mr. LUJAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform the House of the passing of our former colleague, former Senator Joseph M. Montoya of New Mexico at Georgetown Hospital this morning at 9 a.m.

I feel very fortunate to have had the opportunity to work with Senator Montoya for the major portion of the time I have been in Washington. Having served on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy with the Senator and having seen close up his total devotion to the State and people of New Mexico, I want to say that the people of our State have lost a very dear friend.

Senator Montoya was exactly what every public servant should be—a true servant of the people who elected him. No person was too insignificant for Senator Montoya to take a personal interest in and no problem brought to him by a constituent was ever too small for him to try to solve. His duties kept him in Washington most of the time, but his heart was always in New Mexico and his concern was for the people back home.

I am fortunate to have known Senator Montoya on a personal basis long before I entered into public life and I found him to be a warm and caring person in all aspects of life.

There is little I can say to add to the stature of this man who served his State and Nation with such dedication for so many years. I can only say that those of us who were fortunate enough to have known him are better for it.

THE RETURN OF JAMES LEA, CHIEF CLERK, OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES

(Mr. BAUMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to receive and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, we are not always one big, happy family here in the House of Representatives, but it would be very difficult for all of us to get along without members of the staff to assist us with our work in a great many instances.

Today, I want to take the well to welcome back, after an extended operation for an eye problem, one of the members of the staff, who is very important to us. He is also one I have the good fortune to represent since he lives in Prince Frederick, Md. I refer to the Chief Clerk of the Official Reporters of Debates, James Lea, who has returned today.

I am sure that no errors will creep into the RECORD from now on, since they will be caught well before they ever appear. Jimmy is back with us, and we are glad of that.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO REQUIRE BALANCED FEDERAL BUDGET

(Mr. COLEMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Speaker, each and every day more indications of the drastic need for us to eliminate the Federal Government's contribution to inflation become apparent. In the last several days, more and more statistical information has been offered to illustrate the Nation's growing inflation problem. Tomorrow the eyes of the Nation will be watching the voters of California as they decide on several proposed methods of reducing their State government's fueling of inflation.

Last week, I sent you and all other Members a package of information about a constitutional amendment I am sponsoring. House Joint Resolution 916. This amendment, once adopted by the States, would require a balanced Federal budget except in times of national emergency. I hope that you can find the time to review my package, because it also includes a review of your own State's treatment of the balanced budget questions, and it gives further explanation of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in summary there are five reasons we need numerous introductions of this resolution and adoption of the resolution before the 95th Congress adjourns:

First. Adoption of the resolution will create a mental attitude in the people of our Nation that offers optimism about inflation instead of pessimistic anticipation, which fuels more inflation.

Second. Adoption of the resolution will convince the world business community that the dollar is a good and sound trading medium and, therefore, will reduce some of the external pressures encouraging inflation.

Third. Adoption of the resolution will show the people of our Nation that Congress is serious about getting the Federal Government out of the inflation business.

Fourth. Adoption of the resolution will immediately force all of us to reassess our views on Federal spending priorities.

Fifth. Adoption of the amendment will remove the Federal Government's contribution to inflation.

I plan to reintroduce the resolution on June 13, 1978 and welcome the participation of all other Members.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 2, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.
The Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope from the White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 3:28 p.m. on Friday, June 2, 1978, and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits a request for the extension of the Jackson-Vanik Waiver Authority concerning the Republic of Romania and the Hungarian People's Republic and the United States-Romanian Agreement on Trade Relations, together with copies of two determinations in connection therewith.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk.

RECOMMENDING EXTENSION OF JACKSON-VANIK WAIVER AUTHORITY CONCERNING REPUBLIC OF ROMANIA AND HUNGARIAN PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC AND UNITED STATES-ROMANIAN AGREEMENT ON TRADE RELATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 95-345)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with subsection 402(d)(5) of the Trade Act of 1974, I transmit herewith by recommendation for a further 12-month extension of the authority to waive subsections (a) and (b) of section 402.

In accordance with subsections 402(d)(5)(B) and (C), this recommendation gives my reasons for recommending the extension of waiver authority and for my determination that continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

I include as part of my recommendation, my determination that further extension of the waiver authority, and continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic, will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

For the information of the Congress, I also include my finding and determination that the requirements for renewal of United States-Romanian Agreement on Trade Relations under section 450(b) of the Trade Act have been satisfied.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 2, 1978.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII. The Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated, and after those motions to be determined by nonrecord votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAST GUARD EMPLOYEES

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 185) to amend section 2632 of title 10, United States Code, to provide the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating with the authority to transport Coast Guard employees to and from certain places of employment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2632 of title 10, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(1) In subsection (a)—

(a) by striking the words "of a military department" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "concerned"; and

(b) by striking the word "that" where it precedes the words "department, he may" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "his";

(2) In subsection (b) by striking the words "of the military department";

(3) In subsection (c), clause (A) of paragraph (2)—

(a) by striking the word "or" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma; and

(b) by inserting the words "or the Coast Guard," after the words "Marine Corps,".

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TREEN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I recommend the passage of H.R. 185, as reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It is a simple bill, reported unanimously by the committee without amendment, and as far as I know, is completely noncontroversial.

Under existing law, there are very proper constraints on the use of governmental vehicles in the transportation of employees between their homes and their places of employment. In the case of certain Coast Guard employees, those restraints create a situation which this bill will relieve.

In its duties in connection with the maintenance of navigation systems for use by both the armed services and commerce, the Coast Guard is engaged in the construction of an expanded long range system known as Loran-C. Because of the electronic needs of the system, the transmitting stations are located in remote areas, away from electromagnetic forces generated from other activities. Necessarily, the sites are also remote from communities where the Coast Guard construction and operating personnel could obtain housing and other community supports, thus preventing dependents from accompanying them to their duty stations.

One solution would be to provide dependents' housing at the station site, a solution which would be too expensive and not satisfactory for many of the dependents' needs. Another solution would be to make the assignments on an unaccompanying duty basis, with the resultant detriment to morale for married personnel.

The third solution has been decided upon as the most practicable and desirable—to locate dependents of married personnel in the nearest community with available housing. That has resulted in commuting problems, with personnel at two sites required to commute daily more than 50 miles to and from their homes and duty stations. While this may not create an Earth-shattering problem, it is a serious one of commuting costs for many of the enlisted personnel involved.

The bill would relieve this problem by giving to the Secretary of the Department of Transportation the same authority now held by the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force to provide transportation for their personnel. The transportation can be furnished only after the Secretary determines that a reasonable effort has been made to induce private operators to provide the necessary transportation and that the service furnished will supply the most efficient transportation to the personnel concerned.

The total annual cost of action anticipated after the passage will approximate $4,000 per year.

I urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) has given an adequate explanation of the bill and it is supported by the minority.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in supporting H.R. 185, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating to transport Coast Guard employees to and from certain places of employment.

In accordance with the National Implementation Plan for Loran (long range aids to navigation) the Department of Transportation is constructing several Loran stations at remote sites. The remote location of these stations is made necessary because of the stations' isolated placement in the Loran C network, and to free the station from electromagnetic interference.

Some of these remote sites will be in areas where adequate community support cannot be provided for Coast Guard personnel assigned to the stations. For example, the Loran station to be constructed at Searchlight, Nev., will be 55 miles from the nearest town offering adequate community support. As a result, adequate transportation will have to be provided between the towns providing community support and the remote Loran station.

Under existing law the Secretary of a "military department" is authorized to provide assured and adequate transportation for persons employed in his Department to and from the places of employment whenever he determines it is necessary for the effective conduct of the affairs of his Department. As currently defined by law, the Coast Guard is not considered a "military department." This bill would extend the existing authority to include the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating—currently the Department of Transportation. Thus the bill would allow the Secretary of Transportation to provide adequate and assured Government transportation for personnel from their quarters to the remote Loran station sites. The alternatives to providing Government transportation are to require personnel to drive their own vehicles to the stations, or to make the sites unaccompanied duty stations. It is felt that these options would work an unnecessary hardship on the personnel and adversely affect crew morale.

I believe this bill is necessary and urge you to support its passage.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LATTA was allowed to speak out of order.)

NEED FOR IMMEDIATE ACTION TO SETTLE DISPUTE BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES ON FISHING RIGHTS IN THE GREAT LAKES

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of a better time to speak out on this subject than right now since we are talking about the Coast Guard. I was dismayed over the weekend to see on national television that the Coast Guard is now being asked to patrol the waters of the Great Lakes between Canada and the United States because we have not been able to get together with our friendly neighbor to the north, Canada, on a new fishing agreement.

This problem, which arose on the west coast, has now spilled over into the Great Lakes at a time when the sports fishing on the Great Lakes is just coming on for the season. We have thousands of sport fishermen desirous of fishing in the Great Lakes without the thought of being apprehended and their gear confiscated if they wander into Canadian waters. We have thousands of charter boats with millions of dollars of equipment both in Canada and in the United States awaiting word that they can safely return to the lakes. We have sports fishermen and women waiting to go fishing on the Great Lakes and their plans are now in disarray because negotiations have broken down between two friendly nations over a fishing treaty which primarily is affecting the west coast. Why this dispute should have spilled over into the Great Lakes to the extent that our fishermen and women—and I am speaking now about hook and line fishermen and fisherwomen—cannot after noon today, go into Canadian waters, and the Canadians cannot fish in U.S. waters on our Great Lakes is beyond me. I think this is an impasse that should not have been reached between our two friendly nations.

I discussed this matter with the State Department just this morning and urged them, if they cannot get together quickly on some sort of agreement on the west coast, to eliminate Great Lakes hook and line fishing from their discussions. Frankly, I don't believe the Great Lakes should have been involved from the outset. The State Department representative, Mr. Doug Marshall, indicated they would consider my suggestion.

The question arose as to whether or not Public Law 94–265, dealing with extending the 200-mile fishing limit would apply to hook and line fishermen. To my surprise, I learned that the State Department was interpreting language in Public Law 94–265 to apply to hook and line fishermen.

I do not believe the Congress intended for such fishing to be included under the act. If remedial legislative action is needed, it should be taken forthwith as a multimillion-dollar fishing business is at stake between these two countries, as well as the plans of a lot of fishermen and fisherwomen who normally would be using the Great Lakes during their vacations.

So I would plead with the administration and our friends to the north to get this matter resolved, not on June 19 when they are talking about sitting down and negotiating for the first time on a long-term agreement, by exempting the hook and line fishing in the Great Lakes from these west coast discussions in order that our people in the Great Lakes area can get on with their fishing.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 185, as reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries—and urge its passage by the House.

This bill represents amendatory legislation which is simple and noncontroversial—but it is necessary to provide to the Secretary of Transportation the authority to transport Coast Guard employees to and from certain places of employment.

This legislation will alleviate a problem which has arisen because of the construction of remotely located long-range radio aids to navigation stations.

Because site selections are based upon freedom from electromagnetic interference and placement of the Loran-C network, some sites are—and others necessarily will be—located in remote areas of the United States where adequate community support for Coast Guard personnel is not—or will not be—readily available.

This, perforce, also includes the inadequacy or nonavailability of public transportation. Requiring personnel to drive their own vehicles—or, in the alternative, to make the sites unaccompanied duty stations—would work a hardship on personnel and adversely affect morale.

Furthermore, providing adequate housing for the dependents at the station site would be too expensive and would be otherwise unsatisfactory for the needs of the dependents involved.

The providing of a Government vehicle for transportation to and from the station site is the most reasonable and cost-effective resolution of the problem.

I now ask that the House consider and pass H.R. 185—to provide this minor but necessary transportation authority.●

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no other requests for time.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I have no further requests for time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VANIK). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 185.

The question was taken.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

INTERVENTION ON THE HIGH SEAS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 188) to amend the Intervention on the High Seas Act to implement the protocol relating to intervention on the high seas in cases of marine pollution by substances other than oil, 1973, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Intervention on the High Seas Act (88 Stat. 8, Public Law 93–248) is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

"(1) 'a substance other than convention oil' means those oils, noxious substances, liquefied gases, and radioactive substances—

"(A) enumerated in the protocol, or

"(B) otherwise determined to be hazardous under section 4(a);

"(2) 'convention' means the International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969, including annexes thereto;

"(3) 'convention oil' means crude oil, fuel oil, diesel oil, and lubricating oil;

"(4) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating;

"(5) 'ship' means—

"(A) a seagoing vessel of any type whatsoever, and

"(B) any floating craft, except an installation or device engaged in the exploration and exploitation of the resources of the seabed and the ocean floor and the subsoil thereof;

"(6) 'protocol' means the Protocol Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Marine Pollution by Substances Other Than Oil, 1973, including annexes thereto; and

"(7) 'United States' means the States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone, Guam, American Samoa, the United States Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas, and any other commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States.".

(2) Section 3 is amended by—

(A) striking the word "oil" and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "convention oil or of the sea or atmosphere by a substance other than convention oil"; and

(B) striking the word "Convention" and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "convention, the protocol".

(3) Section 4 is amended by—

(A) inserting the words "human health," between the words "limited to," and "fish" and designating the existing section as subsection (b);

(B) adding a new subsection (a) as follows:

"(a) The Secretary, after consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Secretary of Commerce, shall determine when a substance other than those enumerated in the protocol is liable to create a hazard to human health, to harm living resources, to damage amenities, or to interfere with other legitimate uses of the sea.".

(4) Section 10 is amended by adding a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) With respect to intervention for a substance identified pursuant to section 4(a), the United States has the burden of establishing that, under the circumstances present at the time of the intervention, the substance could reasonably pose a grave and imminent danger analogous to that posed by a substance enumerated in the protocol.".

(5) Section 13 is amended—

(A) in subsection (a) by striking the period at the end of the subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "and article II of the protocol and may propose amendments to the list of substances other than convention oil in accordance with article III of the protocol."; and

(B) in subsection (b) by striking the words "annexes thereto" and inserting in lieu therof the word "protocol".

(C) by adding a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) The President may accept amendments to the list of substances other than convention oil in accordance with article III of the protocol.".

(6) Section 15 is amended by inserting the words ", the protocol," between the words "convention" and "and".

SEC. 2. This Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment, or upon the date the protocol becomes effective as to the United States, whichever is later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. TREEN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, Mr. MURPHY.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I recommend the passage by the House of the bill, H.R. 188, as reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The bill would amend the Intervention on the High Seas Act in order to implement the 1973 protocol to the 1969 convention relating to intervention on the high seas in cases of oil pollution casualties. The protocol would expand the coverage of the convention to substances other than oil, such as noxious substances, liquefied gases, and radioactive wastes.

H.R. 188, as introduced, was identical to H.R. 11406 in the 94th Congress, reflecting a legislative proposal of the Secretary of Transportation. No action was taken in the 94th Congress, since the protocol in question was not submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent.

The protocol has now been forwarded to the Senate for its appropriate action, and its advice and consent is expected during the present Congress. This implementing legislation would become effective on date of enactment, or on the date on which the protocol would become binding on the United States, whichever is later.

Last fall, the Secretary of Transportation forwarded a new proposal for implementing legislation, containing substantially the same language as H.R. 188. Rather than starting with a new bill, therefore, the committee proceeded with the consideration of H.R. 188 and amended it to reflect basically the language of the proposal. As reported, it is in substance identical to the departmental proposal.

When the protocol comes into effect, this bill as enacted will recognize the right of the United States to intervene and take appropriate action on the high seas in the case of any vessel of whatever flag, which, through collision, grounding, or other casualty, poses an imminent danger to the coastline or related interests of the United States from pollution of the sea by hazardous substances other than oil.

Any action which is reasonably necessary may be taken to prevent, mitigate, or remove the damage threat, including the destruction of the vessel and cargo, without subjecting the United States to any liability for its actions. The pollution revolving fund established under the Federal Water Pollution Act will be available to bear the costs of the action taken. All rights of action are preserved to recover such costs from the vessel owner or any other party whose negligence caused the incident from which the intervention action was initiated.

The bill will implement one more international agreement designed to improve the world's antipollution efforts. As such, it is worthy of the support of every Member of the House. I solicit that support.

Mr. TREEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in supporting H.R. 188, a bill to amend the Intervention on the High Seas Act to Implement the Protocol Relating to Intervention on the Seas in Cases of Marine Pollution Substances Other Than Oil, 1973.

The Intervention on the High Seas Act of 1974 (33 U.S.C. 1471–87) implemented the International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969. The act authorized the United States to take whatever actions are necessary in the event of a casualty involing a domestic or foreign vessel on the high seas to prevent a grave and imminent danger to its coastline or related interests from pollution by crude oil, fuel oil, diesel oil, or lubricating oil. These oils may be referred to as convention oil. H.R. 188 would amend the Intervention on the High Seas Act to Implement the Protocol Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Marine Pollution by Substances Other Than Oil, 1973.

The protocol extends the right of intervention on the high seas to include incidents involving nonconvention oils and hazardous substances such as noxious substances, liquefied gases—and radioactive substances. With regard to these substances, the bill includes pollution of the atmosphere as well as the sea.

An annex to the protocol contains a list of substances for which intervention is authorized. However, the protocol does not preclude intervention with respect to an unlisted substance where it can be shown that the unlisted substance poses a grave and imminent danger equivalent to that of a listed substance.

The proposed amendments become effective on the date of enactment or the date the protocol becomes effective for the United States, whichever is later. The protocol becomes effective internationally 90 days after 15 nations have ratified it. To date only two nations have ratified the protocol due mainly to the delays in establishing the list of substances contained in the annex, and in publishing the list in foreign languages. The protocol was forwarded to the Senate on July 25, 1977, for its advice and consent.

I believe we have a good bill, and urge support of its passage.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 188, as reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries—and urge its passage by the House.

This bill represents amendatory legislation which is necessary to implement a protocol to an international treaty which is expected to receive the advice and consent to ratification by the Senate in the very near future.

It would implement the "1973 High Seas Intervention Protocol" by amending the "1974 Intervention on the High Seas Act"—to enable the United States to take rapid and necessary action on the high seas to prevent pollution, or threat of pollution, by foreign-flag or U.S.-flag vessels that contain hazardous substances.

This is in addition to existing authority which permits taking similar rapid and necessary action on the high seas—to prevent pollution or threat of pollution by vessels that contain oil.

This bill complements existing legislation which is representative of the international and domestic concern—over the need for a coastal nation to act in a timely fashion to prevent major oil or hazardous material pollution damage—to a nation's waters or adjoining shorelines—as an outgrowth of a marine disaster—such as a collision, grounding, or foundering of a vessel on the high seas.

As many of you may well remember, the authority to intervene under the "1974 Intervention Act" which implements the "1969 High Seas Intervention Convention" was exercised by the United States during the Argo Merchant grounding near Cape Cod in December of 1976—and the less publicized Irenes Challenge foundering in the Pacific Ocean in January of 1977. Both of these vessels carried oil.

This bill will now extend such authority to vessels which carry hazardous substances—and evidences an awareness that oil is not the only potential source of marine pollution.

This bill—amending the "1974 Intervention Act"—does not change any of the substantive provisions of the act as it relates to oil. Rather, it merely extends the features of the act to substances other than oil.

As to the newly covered substances, the Secretary of Transportation is still required to determine that a grave and imminent danger exists;

He may still coordinate and direct efforts to remove or eliminate the threatened pollution;

He continues to have authority to undertake salvage or other action to remove or eliminate threatened pollution; and

He may still remove and, if necessary, destroy the ship and cargo which is the source of the danger.

The bill does not change the system of consultation required before undertaking intervention action when time is available—and continues to recognize the right to take prompt intervention when the circumstances demand it.

Annexed to the protocol is a list containing the hazardous substances for which intervention is authorized—if the requisite danger to the coastline or related interests is present. However, the protocol also recognizes the right of intervention with respect to an unlisted substance. Therefore, the bill also provides for additions to the list of hazardous substances—in advance or at the time intervention action is considered necessary.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I want to state that this legislative initiative is another one of the many related legislative initiatives by this Congress with respect to the transportation of goods and products within the marine mode.

Earlier, the House acted upon—and the President signed—Public Law 95-75 which implements international navigational rules in an effort to maintain a high level of safety at sea.

The House also acted upon—and the President signed—Public Law 95-208 which provides for the establishment of uniform structural standards for intermodal cargo containers.

Additionally, the House acted upon—and the Senate is presently considering H.R. 6803, a bill establishing a single national standard of strict liability for oil spills—and the creation of a fund to clean up oil spills and compensate victims for oil pollution damages.

I now ask that the House consider and pass H.R. 188, a bill to permit intervention on the high seas in cases of marine pollution by substances other than oil.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 188, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 12140) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to provide additional authorizations for certain operating programs under the act.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That clause (1) of section 104(u) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (33 U.S.C. 1254) is amended to read as follows: "(1) not to exceed $100,000,000 per fiscal year for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1973, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1974, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, not to exceed $13,900,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and not to exceed $14,039,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, for carrying out the provisions of this section, other than subsections (g)(1) and (2), (p), (r), and (t), except that such authorizations are not for any research, development, or demonstration activity pursuant to such provisions;".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California (Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12140 which extends certain authorizations provided by the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

H.R. 12140 amends section 104(u)(1) of the act to provide additional authorizations for fiscal years 1979 and 1980 for certain activities authorized under that section.

The Environmental Protection Agency requested an authorization of $13,900,000 for fiscal year 1979. For fiscal year 1980 EPA requested an open-ended authorization. The committee authorized such amounts as it determined could be used.

H.R. 12140 authorizes $13,990,000 for fiscal year 1979 and $14,039,000 for fiscal year 1980. It is intended that these funds be distributed among the following eligible activities:

First. Water quality surveillance and information dissemination activities provided by section 104(a)(5) and 104(b)(6);

Second. Great Lakes water quality monitoring provided by section 104(f); and,

Third. Manpower planning and training activities provided by section 104(g)(3).

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the enactment of this necessary legislation.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 12140 which extends certain authorities under section 104 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. These authorities expired June 30, 1975.

This bill will provide programs for Great Lakes water quality monitoring, surveillance, and information dissemination activities on monitoring of water quality standards and for training of sewage treatment plant operating personnel, amounting to $13.9 million for fiscal year 1979, which was the amount requested in the President's fiscal year 1979 budget, and $14,039,000 for fiscal year 1980.

During fiscal year 1979, H.R. 12140 would authorize funds to be used for water quality monitoring which includes completion of a biological monitoring and data automation pilot project. It would also authorize a program for the development of water pollution control manpower training capabilities at the State and local level, and would also develop national training strategies, curricula, and delivery systems to meet identified EPA, State, local and private sector training needs, plus support and evaluation of staffing and training efforts nationally. H.R. 12140 further authorizes additional funding under section 104 for the Great Lakes program, which includes a surveillance program to assist regional programs on the Great Lakes which are carried out in consultation with Canadian, State, and local authorities. These efforts will serve as partial support for the United States-Canada Great Lakes agreement.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12140 is a very important piece of legislation and I urge my colleagues to vote for its adoption.

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I join my friend and colleague, Chairman RAY ROBERTS, in urging enactment of H.R. 12140.

H.R. 12140 extends authorizations for fiscal years 1979 and 1980 for certain operating programs provided by section 104(u)(1) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

These programs include water quality monitoring, Great Lakes water quality monitoring, and manpower planning and training.

Funds authorized by H.R. 12140 are not to be used to provide appropriations for programs authorized by sections 104(g)(1), 104(g)(2), 104(p), 104(r), 104(t) or, for any research, development, or demonstration activity.

An authorization of $13,900,000 is provided for fiscal year 1979 and $14,039,000 for fiscal year 1980.

Mr. Chairman, I urge enactment of this necessary legislation.●

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 12140.

The question was taken.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, the Chair will now put the question on each motion on which further proceedings were postponed in the order in which that motion was entertained.

Votes will be taken in the following order: H.R. 185, H.R. 188, and H.R. 12140, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic votes after the first such vote in this series.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAST GUARD EMPLOYEES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 185.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 185, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2380) to amend the Intervention on the High Seas Act to implement the protocol relating to intervention on the high seas in cases of marine pollution by substances other than oil, 1973, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Intervention on the High Seas Act (88 Stat. 8, Public Law 93-248) is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. As used in this Act

"(1) 'a substance other than convention oil' means those oils, noxious substances, liquefied gases, and radioactive substances—

"(A) enumerated in the protocol, or

"(B) otherwise determined to be hazardous under section 4(a).

"(2) 'convention' means the International Convention relating to intervention on the high seas in cases of oil pollution casualties, 1969, including annexes thereto;

"(3) 'convention oil' means crude oil, fuel oil, diesel oil, and lubricating oil;

"(4) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating;

"(5) 'ship' means—

"(A) a seagoing vessel of any type whatsoever, and

"(B) any floating craft, except an installation or device engaged in the exploration and exploitation of the resources of the seabed and the ocean floor and the subsoil thereof;

"(6) 'protocol' means the protocol relating to intervention on the high seas in cases of marine pollution by substances other than oil, 1973, including annexes thereto; and

"(7) 'United States' means the States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and any other Commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States.".

(2) Section 3 is amended by—

(A) striking the word "oil" and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "convention oil or of the sea or atmosphere by a substance other than convention oil"; and

(B) striking the word "Convention" and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "convention, the protocol".

(3) Section 4 is amended by—

(A) inserting the words "human health," between the words "limited to," and "fish" and designating the existing section as subsection (b);

(B) adding a new subsection (a) as follows:

"(a) The Secretary, after consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, shall determine when a substance other than those enumerated in the protocol is liable to create a hazard to human health, to harm living resources, to damage amenities, or to interfere with other legitimate uses of the sea.".

(4) Section 10 is amended by adding a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) With respect to intervention for a substance identified pursuant to section 4(a), the United States has the burden of establishing that, under the circumstances present at the time of the intervention, the substance could reasonably pose a grave and imminent danger analogous to that posed by a substance enumerated in the protocol.".

(5) Section 13 is amended—

(A) in subsection (a) by striking the period at the end of the subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the phrase "and article II of the protocol and may propose amendments to the list of substances other than convention oil in accordance with article III of the protocol."; and

(B) in subsection (b) by striking the words "annexes thereto" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "protocol".

(C) by adding a new section (c) as follows:

"(c) The President may accept amendments to the list of substances other than convention oil in accordance with article III of the protocol.".

(6) Section 15 is amended by inserting the words ", the protocol," between the words "convention" and "and".

SEC. 2. This Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment, or upon the date the protocol becomes effective as to the United States, whichever is later.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY OF NEW YORK

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MURPHY of New York moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill S. 2380, and insert in lieu thereof the text of H.R. 188, as passed by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 188) was laid on the table.

FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT AMENDMENTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 12140.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 12140, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 338, nays 9, not voting 87, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EVANS of Colorado). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

RESCISSION PROPOSAL, MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 95-346)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report one proposal to rescind $48 million in budget authority previously provided by the Congress. In addition, I am reporting three new deferrals totaling $8.1 million and revisions to three previously transmitted deferrals increasing the amount deferred by $0.4 million.

The rescission proposal affects the military assistance program. The new deferrals and the revisions to existing deferrals involve programs in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, the Interior, and the Treasury.

The details of the rescission proposal and the deferrals are contained in the attached reports.

JIMMY CARTER.

The WHITE HOUSE, June 5, 1978.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution of the following title:

SENATE RESOLUTION 472

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of the Honorable James B. Allen, late a Senator from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee, of which he shall be a member, to attend the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, do stand in recess.

BOUNDARY WATERS CANOE AREA

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1213, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 1213

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12250) to designate the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, to establish the Boundary Waters Canoe Area National Recreation Area, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment printed in the Congressional Record of May 31, 1978, by Representative Oberstar of Minnesota if offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington (Mr. MEEDS) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, the rule which has just been read contains a typographical error and, accordingly, I ask unanimous consent to delete the words, "one hour," in line 8 on page 1 of the resolution and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "two hours."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual 30 minutes for the minority to the gentleman from California (Mr. DEL CLAWSON), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1213 is the rule providing for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12250 designating the Boundary Water Canoe Area Wilderness and National Recreation Area.

While some controversy remains on this bill, there should be none on the rule. It is a simple rule that has been written to accommodate all points of view. The rule is an open rule with no waivers of points of order, and it provides for 2 hours of general debate to insure that everyone who wishes to may be heard.

In addition, the rule provides that it shall be in order to consider the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 31, 1978, by Representative OBERSTAR of Minnesota if offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill.

The committee thought it appropriate to assure recognition of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), since he is not a member of the Interior Committee, but the Boundary Waters Canoe Area is entirely in his district.

The Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness is the largest wilderness east of the Rockies and is the most popular and easily visited in the country. The bill that is before us seeks to establish a Boundary Waters Wilderness of more than a million acres, which is slightly larger than the present wilderness there and will be subject to some changes in management. In addition, there is established a national recreation area of 222,000 acres to link the three separate parts of the wilderness.

Mr. Speaker, I support the rule and urge the adoption of House Resolution 1213 in order that H.R. 12250 may be considered.

Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1213 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 12250 which designates the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness and National Recreation Area in the Superior National Forest in northern Minnesota. The rule provides 2 hours of general debate as corrected by unanimous consent a few minutes ago. The time is to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. For a positive change, no waivers are contained in this resolution, although it does have one unusual provision. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 31, 1978, by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR). Although this accords the gentleman no special privileges, it does acknowledge his right to present the substitute. Finally, one motion to recommit is allowed.

Mr. Speaker, the bill designates the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, and the Boundary Waters Canoe Area National Recreation Area. While some measure of controversy may surround the bill, no organized opposition to the rule has been brought to my attention.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I just want to take this opportunity to thank both the majority and the minority members of the Committee on Rules for their very fair and equitable consideration of the rule and for the very fair and considerate rule which resulted from their deliberations. The rule yields adequate time for general debate and protects my right and the right of the people I represent to offer a substitute which represents their views on the future management of the boundary waters canoe area.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to thank the committee for the very splendid treatment I was accorded by members on both sides of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution. I would like to join with my colleagues in commending the Committee on Rules for their thoughtful treatment of this proposal. I enclose in the RECORD some of the editorial and news coverage that this bill has received:

MAKING CHANGE—THE WILD ONES

Should power boats and, in season, snowmobiles be allowed in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area along the Canadian border in northeastern Minnesota? The issue, which has no doubt escaped the attention of most Americans, arouses the passions of conservationists, outdoorsmen and nearby residents.

The million-plus acres of interconnecting lakes and rivers and virgin forests constitute the second largest unit in the nation's wilderness system—and its most heavily used. Planes must fly a respectful distance overhead, but political compromises made when the area was designated a wilderness allowed loggers and motorized vehicles to continue to disrupt its stillness.

Now the House of Representatives is considering legislation that would forbid or restrict practices that are incompatible with a wilderness area. The bill approved by the House Interior Committee—the so-called Burton-Vento compromise—would ban mining, prohibit future logging, compensate loggers for their losses and offer them substitute timber elsewhere. It would also restrict motorboats and snowmobiles to limited areas of the wilderness and create recreation areas nearby where they could be used. Resort owners who are adversely affected could get financial aid or require the Government to buy them out. The bill seems reasonable; no wilderness is enhanced by the internal combustion engine.

[From the Chicago Daily News, July 25, 1977]

KEEP THE WILDERNESS WILD

The Boundary Waters Canoe Area in northeast Minnesota provides a wilderness haven for nearly 20,000 Illinoisans each year. But the area, with its 1,600 square miles of pristine forests and lakes, could be turned into a motorized thoroughfare under legislation Congress is considering.

Rep. James Oberstar (D-Minn.) wants to enlarge the Boundary Waters Canoe Area and make half of it into a National Recreation Area, where motorboating, snowmobiling and treecutting would be allowed. Wilderness lovers—including most of the animals who make the forest their home—would be crammed into what's left.

Opponents of Oberstar's legislation are rallying around another bill introduced by Rep. Donald Fraser (D-Minn.). He wants to make the area a true wilderness domain, saved from man's motorized encroachments.

The Boundary Waters Canoe Area is the only wilderness preservation area in the nation that allows motor vehicles or treecutting of any kind. Fortunately, very few trees have been felled in the last few years, and motorboats are heavily restricted. Snowmobiles, which roared through the area's snowy stillness until last year, now are virtually forbidden.

These uses of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area originally were allowed because of fears by local residents that their economy would suffer if the area was limited to wilderness recreation. Yet last year nearly 165,000 persons visited the area, spending millions of tourist dollars along the way. Clearly, the public needs and wants wilderness areas where nature's tranquility is uninterrupted by the roar of engines and saws.

We support Rep. Fraser's bill and disagree with the Chicago-based Boating Industry Assn., which contends the legislation would "create an exclusive clubground for canoe paddlers and backpackers at the expense of other citizens." The Boundary Waters Canoe Area is for everyone who is willing to meet the wilderness on its own terms.

[From the Chicago Tribune, April 18, 1977]

THE BOUNDARY WATERS' FUTURE

On the border between northeastern Minnesota and western Ontario is the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, a unit of the National Wilderness System and part of the Superior National Forest. Its million acres are adjacent to the Quetico Provincial Park in Canada. Together, the BWCA and the Quetico comprise a uniquely large and unspoiled area of northern lakes and forests. The wilderness status of the Canadian portion is effectively protected by law. But the American portion is under siege.

When the Wilderness Act was passed in 1964, the BWCA was included, but as a "special case" with loopholes for logging and access to motorboats (since extended to include snowmobiles). The status of BWCA is ambiguous, and there is a consensus that it needs clarification by new legislation.

But of what kind Two contrasting answers are sponsored by two Minnesota Democratic congressmen. Rep. Donald M. Fraser of Minneapolis would firmly designate all million acres of the BWCA as wilderness, with no special loopholes. Rep. James L. Oberstar of Chisholm would lop off 40 per cent of the BWCA as a "national recreation area," available to a wide variety of exploitation incompatible with the wilderness concept. Four segments of the BWCA that Rep. Oberstar would detach are on the Canadian border.

The controversy is a classic instance of conservation vs. exploitation, but there are special dimensions in this instance which strengthen the conservationist cause. One is that although loggers and snowmobilers have innumerable other areas, in Minnesota and beyond it, in which to do their things, those who value a northern lakes and forest wilderness have no comparable area other than BWCA-Quetico in which to satisfy their wishes. Another is that wilderness seekers coming to the BWCA are so numerous that they refute any notion that a BWCA wilderness is locked away from extensive human use.

There are 16 million acres of commercial forest in Minnesota outside the BWCA. The debated stands of virgin forest in the BWCA constitute only one per cent of the potential commercial timber in that one state. The counterparts in other states of those who covet the spruce and pine in the BWCA have reconciled themselves to a pulp mix of more aspen, birch, and balsam and less spruce and pine. The real question is not whether or not timber interests should be considered (they should be) but whether or not they should be allowed to cut almost everywhere in the national forests.

Recent public use figures for the BWCA suggest that those who approach this controversy preoccupied with money have considerable reason to side with the conservationists. Of more than a million visitor-days in the BWCA in 1974, 68 per cent were spent by paddlers of canoes. Outfitting canoe trips is a major industry in Ely. Snowmobilers (most of them local people) accounted for only one per cent of the usage, and motorized boaters for only 28 per cent. Here is one area in which canoeists outnumber other people.

About 15 per cent of the visitor-days were spent by residents of Illinois, and many by people still farther away from the BWCA. Quite aside from conserving a unique habitat, a case can be made that in this instance wilderness designation would be both popular and profitable.

Failure to enact the policy of the Fraser bill would subject the BWCA to immediate diminution. It would seriously erode the wilderness character of those parts of the present BWCA that even Rep. Oberstar would protect.

In our increasingly crowded, polluted, noisy, and paved world, legislative changes affecting the Boundary Waters Canoe Area should defend rather than impair its wilderness status.

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Mar. 30, 1978]

PRESERVING A SPLENDID WILDERNESS

At long last, legislation to preserve Minnesota's superb Boundary Waters Canoe Area (BWCA) appears to be emerging from the legislative wilderness. A compromise bill, which seems acceptable, is expected to be considered and then endorsed by a House Interior subcommittee next week.

The boundary waters area is immense—a million acres of wilderness lakes and forests along the Minnesota-Canadian border. It is the second largest unit in the National Wilderness Preservation System. It contains the largest virgin forests remaining in the eastern half of the United States.

Yet, despite its nominal wilderness status, the BWCA remains plagued by conflicts. Portions have been logged, off and on, for 75 years (there now is a temporary moratorium on cutting). Powerboat use has marred the tranquility of some of its mirror lakes. Resumption of snowmobiling, now banned, threatens its winter peace. Mining interests eye the land.

The compromise, proposed by Reps. Bruce Vento (D-Minn.) and Phillip Burton (D-Calif.), should guard this national treasure against such intrusion while offering fair, new opportunities for commerce and motorized recreation in the huge Superior National Forest outside the wilderness boundaries.

Specifically, the Vento-Burton compromise would maintain existing wilderness boundaries, with some minor additions. It would set up a national recreation area outside the BWCA for logging and motorized recreation. It would ban logging and mining in wilderness portions.

Powerboating would be allowed on 13 lakes around the edge of the wilderness, but not in it—with the exception of two lakes on which motor use would be phased out by 1984. To compensate logging companies for loss of BWCA timber, they would be allowed to harvest timber outside the area.

It is a reasonable compromise. After the expected subcommittee approval, it faces rough rapids in the full House Interior Committee and on the House floor. It deserves to weather both tests, intact.

[From the Des Moines Register]

COMPROMISE ON BWCA

Not surprisingly, congressional protection for the Boundary Waters Canoe Area of northern Minnesota is likely to take the form of a compromise between the two bills that have defined the issue. The good news is that the compromise is expected to favor the preservationist viewpoint.

Hearings on the two bills—by Representatives Donald Fraser and James Oberstar, Minnesota Democrats—were held last summer and fall. A new bill to replace them is being prepared in the House subcommittee on national parks and insular affairs. It should reach the House Interior Committee early in 1978.

Fraser's bill would have enlarged the canoe area and banned logging, mining, snowmobiles and motorboats. Oberstar's would have allowed these activities in part of the area. Under the new bill, logging and mining are expected to be prohibited and limited use of motorboats and snowmobiles permitted. Impetus for a relatively strong compromise position came from the Carter administration, which supports maximum wilderness protection.

We hope the forthcoming legislation is as protectionist as predicted, and that it is not weakened during Interior Committee review. To allow continued use of motorboats and snowmobiles in the area, even on a more limited basis than now, is encroachment enough on the concept of wilderness preservation that ought to govern every facet of man's relationship to the Boundary Waters.

WILDERNESS PLAN ROUSES MINNESOTA LAKE COUNTRY AND POSES HARD QUESTIONS ABOUT LAND USE POLICY

(By Philip Shabecoff)

ELY, MINN.—With a small grunt of disgust, Dan Engstrom bent to pick up the Coca-Cola can lying in the mossy bog and place it carefully in the center of the trail.

"We'll get it on the way back and carry it out with us," he told his companions.

The can, its red skin faded, was the first artifact of civilization seen in two days by the small group paddling through a corner of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in northeastern Minnesota.

Otherwise, this untouched fragment of the north woods looked much as it did when it was a hunting ground for Sioux and Chippewa Indians and a waterway for French-Canadian voyagers bringing a winter's haul of furs back east.

This quiet, unspoiled lake country, the largest wilderness area east of the Rocky Mountains, is now the object of a bitter, occasionally violent battle that stretches all the way to Capitol Hill. The outcome of the dispute will probably have a major long-range impact on Federal wilderness policy. But the issue also contains profound implications for the whole question of land use in the United States, a basic environmental issue that, in the view of many observers, this nation has not even started to address.

When the Boundary Waters was designated a Federal wilderness in 1964, a special waiver allowed logging, mining and the use of motorized vehicles in some parts of the otherwise protected area.

Now two bills have been introduced in the House of Representatives, both by Minnesota Democrats, that would change the status of the area. One bill, sponsored by Representative Donald M. Fraser of Minneapolis, would preserve the entire one-million-acre area as a wilderness. Mining, logging, motorboats, snowmobiles and other motorized vehicles would be banned. The other bill, introduced by Representative James L. Oberstar, whose district includes the area, would protect much of the wilderness but would also detach 400,000 acres as a national recreation area, open for motors, logging and other uses.

What one resident of this city described as "a small war" is now on between those who want maximum protection for the wilderness and those who want it open for multiple uses. The battle is a classic one, pitting environmentalists and sportsmen, scientists and nature lovers against commercial interests and local residents who believe they should have the right to use and enjoy their own home territory.

Passions run deep on both sides of the issue. To Dan Engstrom and Miron Heinselman, vice chairman and chairman of Friends of the Boundary Waters Wilderness, and to Steven Payne of the Wilderness Society, three members of the recent canoeing group, the presence of something unspoiled and primitive at the edge of industrial society is a value to be fought for. They are joined by allies across the country, including many of the national environmental organizations.

ECONOMIC THREAT CITED

But opponents of the wilderness insist that the Boundary Waters area should be open for many uses. Loggers, miners and resort owners in the area angrily complain that their livelihood is being threatened for an abstract concept called "the wilderness experience." Other residents of this small community believe that the Federal Government has no business telling them where they can use a motorboat in the summer or a snowmobile in the winter.

Recently, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Oberstar and Bruce F. Vento, another Democratic Representative from Minnesota, held a day of hearings in St. Paul and another here in Ely on the Boundary Waters dispute. Most of those who supported wilderness protection testified in St. Paul.

Beck Rom, a slim, dark-haired young woman whose family has lived in Ely for 90 years, said that many residents of the town were in favor of the Fraser bill but were afraid to speak out. "There's been a lot of violence," she said. "Mostly it has been in small ways like throwing eggs and fortunately nobody has been hurt so far. But they kept people from doing business with my father's store. And they burned down buildings belonging to people who supported the wilderness."

Miles Aakhus, publisher of The Ely Echo, one of the town's two newspapers wants Congress to leave the canoe area in its current status but worries that other opponents of the wilderness may resort to violent tactics. "Last winter when they banned the use of snowmobiles, there were men in the bars talking about going and putting the torch to the woods. I'm afraid that's what they'll do if the Fraser bill passes."

LOSS OF TAX REVENUE

The Ely hearing, held in a high school auditorium packed with loggers, canoe outfitters, resort owners, merchants, teen-agers and housewives carrying babies, was noisy and raucus.

Local officials spoke of the tax revenues they would lose if the entire area were made a wilderness. Resort owners said they would be forced to go out of business. Sawmill operators said they needed the wood in the virgin forests to be able to keep their employees working. Handicapped and elderly residents testified that the ban on motors would keep them from enjoying the Boundary Waters.

The leader of the fight for the wilderness is Dr. Heinselman, a small, white-haired 57-year-old former Forest Service scientist who despite his appearance can paddle a canoe all day, carry a 70-pound aluminum canoe on his shoulders and a pack on his back over a half-mile portage, read trail signs like an Indian and talk steadily about why the Boundary Waters should be saved.

Sitting on a lichen-covered rocky out cropping at the edge of a small lake, Dr. Heinselman made the case for the wilderness. A pair of loons, attracted by the motion, paddled curiously but warily a hundred feet away.

People who complain about wilderness advocates being selfish in wanting the Boundary Waters are not stating the whole case, he said. The area is only one part of the larger Superior National Forest, two million acres of lakeland in the area already open for motorboats, snowmobiles, logging and other general uses.

While there are 1,000 lakes in the Boundary Waters, there are 14,000 more in Minnesota alone, and over 40,000 in the northern lakeland that covers Minnesota, Michigan and Wisconsin, he said.

"There are a lot of people who love this place and they will fight for it," said Dr. Heinselman, who retired early from the Forest Service to lead the fight.

Perhaps the most eloquent spokesman for the Boundary Waters Wilderness is Sigurd F. Olson, 78, a renowned naturalist and author who has lived in Ely for more than 50 years.

People come to the wilderness, he said, "above all because they are looking for a sense of wholeness in their lives. The wilderness is an antidote to noise and clamor and strident pressures and speeds of modern civilization. People need it for their own souls. The preservation of the wilderness is really the preservation of the human spirit."

FATE OF A UNIQUE WILDERNESS ABOUT TO BE DETERMINED

(By Margot Hornblower)

ELY, MINN.—In these wild borderlands of the north country, the territorial imperative is the law. Wolves, bears, even migratory birds, fiercely defend their turf from outsiders.

Now man, a relative newcomer, has entered the primeval struggle. Though encumbered by courts and legislatures, he, too, is staking out competing claims to the wilderness.

The territory in question is a million acres of northern Minnesota called the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. The largest federally protected wilderness east of the Rockies, it is a picture-postcard land of pine forests where urban environmentalists can escape the mechanized world.

But in small towns like Ely, the economy depends on mining and logging. Long winter boredom is relieved by snowmobiles. Summer power boating to trout streams is considered a constitutional right. So citizens here claim environmentalists are out to destroy their way of life by creating a "rich man's preserve" in their own back yard.

Thus the struggle over the territory is a conflict of class, of geography, of culture and philosophy which goes to the heart of the environmental movement.

After five years of court battles between the environmentalists, recreation groups and commercial interests, the fate of this unique wilderness is about to be determined in Congress. Hearings will be held shortly on competing bills sponsored by two Minnesota Democrats.

Rep. James L. Oberstar, who represents northeastern Minnesota, including the wilderness area, would allow logging, motorboats and snowmobiles in 40 per cent of the area.

Rep. Donald M. Fraser of Minneapolis, 200 miles downstate, backed by 50-co-sponsors, would allow access only to backpackers and canoeists.

The conflict has galvanized such national environmental groups as the Sierra Club, National Wildlife Federation and Izaak Walton League, which say the Oberstar bill, would set a dangerous precedent.

The leader of the environmental coalition, Friends of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, is Miron Heinselman, 57, a retired scientist who specialized in forest ecology. A mild-mannered man with single-minded dedication, Heinselman is now a full-time activist.

"People who live in an urban society have no idea how drastically man has changed the world," Heinselman said, adding that wilderness—land undisturbed by timbering, farming, roads or human settlement—is a living laboratory.

"We're just beginning to understand life systems—from plants to man. We ought not to destroy the last remnants of the natural world until we know more about it."

Sigurd Olsen, 78, a writer who lives in Ely, has also joined the Boundary Waters fight. "The average urbanite thinks wilderness is a place to go fishing," Olsen said. "But once you've been there a few days, you start noticing the sunsets and the calling of the loons. A certain calm descends on you.

"The preservations of wilderness is more than rocks, trees, beautiful lakes and rivers—it's the salvation of the human soul. It satisfies our hunger to experience the primitive, the natural world."

For environmentalists, silence is an essential part of the wilderness. "I've been canoeing when the motorboats zoom by," said Janet Green, head of the Friends in Duluth. "It's obscene. It's like yelling in church."

Ely natives, most of whom seem to oppose the environmentalists, are equally fervent in defending their territory. At Jerry Bibeau's barber shop last week, a random sampling of customers viewed wilderness advocates with unanimous hostility.

"These people want to go back to the way the Indian lived," said Bibeau, who doubles as a city councilman. "But we're civilized here in Ely. There's no way I'm going to paddle a canoe."

Chet Jahnke, 44, an iron ore miner, spends his day off fishing. With his motorboat, it takes 45 minutes to get to his favorite spot. If he had to go by canoe, "it would take three hours out of my day," he said.

Ernest Earjes, 69, a retired tax assessor, said the Fraser bill would discriminate against the elderly. "The only people who'll go in [to the Boundary Waters] will be the young people who can paddle," he said. "Punching holes in water is hard work."

Controversy over the Boundary Waters is nothing new. Since it was first set aside in 1902, battles have been fought over logging, roads, fly-in resorts, motor vehicles, dams and mines.

The current controversy stems from a unique exception Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) wrote into the 1964 Wilderness Act. Although wilderness was defined as an area "untrammeled by man . . . retaining its primeval character," timber cutting and motorboats were specifically permitted in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

Thus, the Forest Service allows motorboats along 21 designated routes which cover 60 per cent of the water area. Snowmobiles were banned last year after a Sierra Club suit. Logging is permitted in 40 per cent of the Boundary Waters, although only 10,000 acres are under lease.

In 1972, environmentalists filed suit to stop the logging of virgin timber in the area. They won a ban, but it was overturned last year on appeal. At Oberstar's request, timber companies agreed to wait until this summer for Congress to resolve the issue.

Boundary Waters has the largest virgin forests in the East. Colonnades of 90-foot pines have stood there untouched for centuries.

In the 540,000 acres of virgin forest where only fire, wind and insects have taken their toll, "the entire vegetation is the result of natural processes," Green said. "There's an aesthetic, as well as a scientific value, to know you're not looking at a tree farm."

However, local residents—who sport bumper stickers reading "Sierra Club, Kiss My Axe"—claim that if no cutting is allowed, the trees will grow old and die, creating vast acreages of "cellulose cemeteries," vulnerable to forest fires.

While Oberstar would exempt virgin timber from logging, he would allow cutting in a 405,000-acre area. The nearby 2-million-acre Superior National Forest is a patchwork where economically feasible lumber sales are hard to assemble, he said. "The Boundary Waters areas is important for the future growth of the timber industry," he added.

Whether it's timber, motorboating or another issue, the argument on both sides is over how much is enough. Environmentalists say 14,000 lakes and 16 million acres of national forest timberland in Minnesota, outside the wilderness area, are more than enough for motorboat enthusiasts and timber companies. The latter argue that the 600,000 acres proposed for complete wilderness under the Oberstar bill—and 14 million acres in the federal wilderness system—are more than enough for canoeists and ecologists.

"What's the use of wilderness, if everybody can't use it?" asks Jerry Bibeau.

Green counters, "If everybody could use it, it wouldn't be a wilderness."

TURNING BACK THE CLOCK TO PRIMEVAL AMERICA

ELY, MINN.—Eleven thousand years ago, a glacier rolled over what is now the Canadian border, strewing great granite boulders over the landscape, carving a thousand crystal lakes in the wilderness. Later, the Chippewa Indians came and went, leaving red pictographs on the rock ledges. French voyageurs, their canoes laden with furs from the Northwest, glided through on their way to Montreal.

Today it is still possible to slip into northern Minnesota's Boundary Waters Canoe Area for 24 hours, turning back the clock to primeval America.

At first, city eyes, accustomed to the glare of pavement and the fine print of document, see only a mass of green and a mass of blue. Slowly, within the green, dense forests spread out from open bogs. Within the forest the narrow silver trunks of aspen and birch shine through the pine trees.

There are differences, it soon becomes apparent, between spruces and balsams, between red pines and white pines and jack pines. The needles are long or short light or dark, feather or spindly. Each cone, bark, root is distinct. Some trees are dead from last year's drought.

The lake that glides under the canoe isn't really blue except under the midday sun. In the morning it mirrors the white mist. It shines copper under the sunset. When the shadows fall a polished obsidian comes to mind.

City ears, dulled by the rush-hour din, hear nothing at first. There are no voices, no clacking typewriters, no honking horns, so it must be quiet. It takes a while, but soon the silence isn't silent at all. Water splashes against the rocks, mosquitoes whine, trees rustle. And, from every direction an incomprehensible polyphony of birdsongs.

More than 100 species fly here from the tropics, covering 300 miles a day in their rush toward summer nesting grounds. People who care about such things have counted 22 species of warbler in the Boundary. Warblers, each one a freak of evolution. They can be told apart, not only by the different colors that camouflage them from predators and the various sounds they make but by the fact that one feeds only in the top third of a certain tree, another, only in the bottom third, for reasons man has yet to discover.

The wilderness seems immobile at first. It is on a grand scale. But movement is everywhere if one looks for it. On the smooth surface of the lake, a centimeter-long whirlygig beetle waltzes from side to side, leaving a swooping pattern in his wake. Sunlight glimmers silver-green in the grooves of the ripples. A black spider crawls up the side of a pink granite boulder.

Except for a great blue heron feeding by the shore, and a turkey buzzard circling overhead, the animals and birds are in hiding. "Quick—three beers," as Minnesotans have labled the song of the olive-sided flycatcher, peals out of the trees, but the bird is nowhere in sight. The wolves and bears don't come out until nightfall and the moose are shy of hunters. Even the beaver huts, carefully assembled with twigs and mud, show no sign of life.

After a mile-long portage, the back is bruised from a heavy load. A swim at dusk is in order before setting up camp. A quarter mile out, the water is cool enough to absorb the stress of the day. A hundred feet away, a striped loon looks up and glides over with obvious curiosity. As we swim closer, curious, too, the bird shrieks with giddy laughter, a cry that has haunted many a camper in the wilderness. Bottom up, it pops quickly beneath the water and disappears.—Margot Hornblower.

THE CHOICE: WILDERNESS—"SPECIAL" CANADIAN PARK NEAR BOUNDARY WATERS AREA

(By Larry Stone)

Should a unique area of inter-connected rivers and lakes be managed for wilderness canoeing or as a multiple-use area where mechanized travel and timber harvest are allowed?

That dilemma faces the U.S. Congress this year, when it debates the future administration of northern Minnesota's Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

But Ontario authorities already have faced a similar decision for Quetico Provincial Park, which lies just north of the Boundary Waters—and the Canadians have come down emphatically in favor of full wilderness protection.

The administrative decision was made in 1973, following more than five years of controversy, government studies and public reviews. Late last year, the master plan was completed, outlining the management to maintain Quetico as a "primitive park," under the most protective of Ontario's park classifications.

Based on recommendations of a park advisory committee, the master plan called for emphasizing the canoe-camping opportunities of the 1.1-million acre wilderness.

"In effect," the master plan said, "Quetico will become a special type of park and will provide canoe-campers in search of a wilderness experience with unique recreational opportunities.

"On the other hand," the plan continued, "recreationists in search of the more traditional and intensive type of opportunity will have to look elsewhere."

Logging and mining have been banned in the park, motorboats have been restricted—with a complete ban to take effect next year, and user controls will be maintained to provide a wilderness-type experience for park visitors.

Fishermen even will be encouraged to fish for sport or food, rather than carrying out limits of fish to show the folks back home.

Park Superintendent Fergus Wilson said logging and motorboat interests originally objected to the Quetico's wilderness classification, though most now seem reluctantly to have accepted it.

Contrarily, he noted, wilderness advocates have been much more vocal and continue to press for even faster implementation of wilderness management of the park.

Some changes in park management which will be most noticeable to visitors include: The establishment of a quota system to restrict or redistribute canoeist use, a limit of visitor group size to nine people, strict enforcement of a ban on bottles and cans and several small boundary changes.

The visitor quota system will be similar to that used in Minnesota's Boundary Waters and will allow conoeists to make advance reservations to assure their entrance to the park.

Limiting the group size to nine persons will help reduce the impact on campsites and will improve the experience for wilderness canoeists who do not like to meet other large parties, Wilson said.

A bottle and can ban has been in effect, Wilson said, but its enforcement will be stepped up this season.

Boundary changes include the exclusion of Lac la Croix, along the Minnesota border, from the park and the addition of all of Saganagons Lake in the southeastern Quetico. All of Batchewaung Lake, on the park's northern boundary, also will be included in the park.

The northern boundary of the park also will be adjusted to include campsites as well as water areas of boundary lakes.

Other management practices to be used in the park will help to emphasize that the recreationist is a "priviliged intruder" upon the wilderness, the master plan said.

"(The visitor's) presence is acceptable only within an ecological context whereby man's numbers and technology participate, rather than dominate."

In keeping with this wilderness philosophy, the park staff will be required to travel within the Quetico by canoe, portage trails will not have signs and the use of wheels to transport boats will be forbidden on portages.

Ultimately, visitors may be restricted to specified campsites to reduce the impact of people.

Since about 95 per cent of the Quetico's users are from the United States, Ontario officials also are considering separate quotas for resident and non-residents to prevent Canadians from being excluded from park use by throngs of Americans. The establishment of better access points along the northern side of the park will help reduce this problem the master plan said.

These minor management problems notwithstanding, the future of Quetico clearly is that of wilderness, the master plan indicates.

"The goal is to preserve Quetico Provincial Park . . . as an area of wilderness that is not adversely affected by human activities."

BWCA: OBERSTAR DOES NOT GO FAR ENOUGH

Rep. James Oberstar has made two important concessions in his latest proposal for the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. He concedes that abundant timber is available outside the BWCA, so that logging can now be banned inside the area. And he agrees that the BWCA's entire 1 million acres should be kept in wilderness, rather than split into separate wilderness and recreation regions. But the Eighth District congressman still gives undue emphasis to motorboats.

Oberstar would allow motorboats on 90 of the BWCA's more than 1,000 lakes. In terms of numbers of lakes, that doesn't sound unreasonable. But Oberstar and his supporters fail to point out that the proposal would motorize nearly 60 percent of BWCA waterways and put nearly 60 percent of BWCA campsites on motorized lakes. If only lakes of 100 acres or more are considered, the figure is closer to 70 percent in both cases. The proposal would reduce motor use from present levels, but not enough to protect the BWCA as the country's only real canoe-wilderness.

The sounder plan for wilderness protection remains the bill written by Reps. Phillip Burton of California and Bruce Vento of Minnesota and approved by the House Interior Committee last month. It would limit motorboats to 11 peripheral lakes and parts of a few others—or to less than 10 percent of BWCA waterways.

However there is still need for compromise. The bill calls for an "equitable transition" to nonmotorized use of the BWCA. Efforts should be made to ensure that resort owners forced out by motorboat curbs are treated equitably—perhaps by lengthening the motorboat phase-out. And a controversial provision extending federal control to routes into the BWCA may need to be amended to meet some of the concerns of property owners along those routes. But there should be no tampering with the basic protection the Burton-Vento bill provides inside the BWCA.

[From the St. Paul Pioneer Press, May 4, 1978]

NO CANOES FOR WENDY

Gov. Rudy Perpich seems to have come away empty-handed from an attempt to encourage Rep. Phillip Burton to open up more of the BWCA to motor use than is already permitted in a bill authored by Burton and Rep. Bruce Vento.

Perpich went to Washington this week to meet with Burton, D-Calif., chairman of the House National Parks subcommittee. According to news stories about the trip, Perpich stayed away from members of the Minnesota delegation, including Vento.

If the accounts are correct, we are glad Burton stood his ground. Somewhere down the line the fact has become obscured that the Burton-Vento bill is a compromise proposal—an attempt to find a middle ground between a pure wilderness bill by Rep. Donald Fraser and various multiple-use proposals authored by Rep. James Oberstar.

Indeed, the whole BWCA controversy has become so fogged that there are people in his state who think the idea of a wilderness area in northern Minnesota is some brand-new plot recently hatched in Washington.

Absolutely clear is the fact the BWCA is a bed of coals for DFL politicians. All three bills—taking three different positions—bear the names of Minnesotans. Sen. Wendy Anderson and Gov. Perpich have counted noses and decided they can go farther and faster in motorboats.

Now, the DFL is divided, but the weight is shifting toward motors as Anderson and Perpich find places to settle. You can bet your ballot there will be heat aplenty on Vento to move into line and thus somehow make the others—especially Wendy Anderson—appear to be right.

Logging and mining now are out of consideration for the canoe country and everyone seems to have backed away from the idea of using or abusing the National Recreation Area concept as a way of legalizing non-wilderness uses of some-to-much of the BWCA and surrounding territory. The focus now is on motors—boats and snowmobiles—and it is expressed in numbers.

The Burton-Vento bill would allow the use of motors on some peripheral lakes. The pressure, generated by residents of northern Minnesota, is for opening up more lakes to motorized travel. They talk about numbers of lakes and decline to mention that those lakes add up to more than half the surface water and campsites in the canoe country. If the BWCA were given true wilderness status there would be no motors.

The BWCA has been a battleground for decades. First it was "preservationists" (or whatever epithet was used then) against the progress promised by power companies that couldn't stand to see all that rushing water go to waste. An airplane ban wiped out the fly-in resorts of the interior, to great cries of anguish except from those who owned resorts on the edge of the BWCA; the land was bought and buildings burned. The pressure from loggers has been constant and the threat of mining intermittent.

The most recent controversy was set off by area residents desires to run snowmobiles around in the BWCA and by lawsuits against logging, for and against mineral exploration. It is clear that the status of the BWCA needs clarification. That is where the current batch of legislation starts.

There may be flaws of detail in the Burton-Vento bill and if there are they should be fixed, and no doubt will be, but the idea is to give the BWCA wilderness protection insofar as possible, not to turn it into a national recreation area or even into some water-oriented national park, like Voyageurs, just to the west of the BWCA.

The protectionist attitude should not be lost to satisfy the playground desires of nearby residents (Burton-Vento takes ample care of the economic problems of resorters in the area) and it certainly should not be sacrificed in an attempt to save the neck of a desperate U.S. Senator from Minnesota.

[From the Duluth News-Tribune Jan. 4, 1978]

ONE USE IS ENOUGH

For all practical purposes, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area has become a hotel without a roof.

Officials of the Superior National Forest, which includes the BWCA, announced last week that potential visitors to that wilderness canoe area should make reservations if they intended to visit the area anytime between May 11 and Sept. 4, 1978.

The BWCA has about 2,000 developed campsites, and until this year, only about 25 percent of them were covered by a reservation system. Competition has been so strong for all campsites in the BWCA, however, that the park managers are now bringing all campsites under a reservation system.

The objective, of course, is to prevent crowding of the BWCA, and abuse to the environment. On any one day, no more than 442 new campers will be allowed into the BWCA, and no more than two-thirds of all the campsites will be used at one time. To disperse visitors throughout the BWCA, the area will be served by 70 entry points.

A second objective of this new full-reservation system is to prevent a recurrence of the kind of inconveniences that marked several weeks and weekends during this past summer. Because too many people arrived at entrance points on the opening of the fishing season, Memorial Day weekend, and throughout the last week of July and the first two weeks in August, these visitors often had to wait in line, sometimes overnight, before getting an entrance permit, if they got one at all.

The situation points up the foresight of Congress in first setting aside this one-million-acre section of land as a wilderness area, and at the same time, it should convince those representatives now writing new legislation on the BWCA how critical it is to preserve the BWCA's wilderness status.

Had the area not been set aside as federal parkland, the public pressures on the area would now have totally destroyed its wilderness character. The need for a more stringent reservation system today reveals the area is not large enough, nor resilient enough to tolerate any additional, long-term use other than as a pure wilderness area.

In a word, the nation's population has caught up with the BWCA. While Congress should not act precipitously or capriciously, it's time all parties involved in the BWCA controversy recognized that the days of "multiple use" must come to an end.

GOOD BWCA BILL

Work was completed Thursday on a proposed new federal law to regulate and manage the use of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area (BWCA).

Based on preliminary information available on this legislation, it appears to be a fair and reasonable compromise, admittedly weighted in favor of environmental concerns, as against commercial concerns.

The proposed legislation has come from the National Parks subcommittee of the House Interior Committee. The drafted bill is primarily the work of U.S. Rep. Phillip Burton, D-Calif., chairperson of the subcommittee, and U.S. Rep. Bruce Vento, a Democrat from St. Paul.

To see the proposed bill as a compromise, it is necessary to understand that it is a blend of legislation recommended by U.S. Rep. James Oberstar, our Eighth District representative, and U.S. Rep. Donald Fraser, Democrat from Minneapolis.

In broad outlines, Oberstar's bill would have created a wilderness area, and a separate recreation area. He would have allowed logging, snowmobiling, and motorized water travel in the recreational area, with some motorized routes running through the wilderness area.

The central thrust of Oberstar's legislation was to set aside a wilderness area, while allowing timber producers, resort owners, and motorboat and snowmobile users to continue to operate in the recreation, multiple-use area.

Fraser's legislation, on the other hand, would ban all logging, would allow no snowmobiles, nor motorboats. Indirectly, Fraser's legislation would have crippled some of the resorts on the edge of the BWCA, because their business depends on being able to use motorboats on lakes partially in the BWCA.

The bill which came out of subcommittee Thursday is clearly closer to Fraser's plan than to Oberstar's. Yet, it is not entirely as Fraser had proposed. The working draft, for example, would require loggers with existing cutting contracts to close down their operation within one year. At the same time, the Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized to compensate loggers with expenses incurred in preparing to exercise their contracts. Also, the state and federal governments would be required to spend possibly $12 million apiece to develop new timber stands outside the BWCA, to provide loggers with better-managed alternative sources of long-fibered trees.

In contrast to Fraser's total ban on motorized traffic in the BWCA, the compromise bill would continue to allow 10 horsepower motorboats on lakes along the edge of the BWCA, including Fall, Moose, Snowbank, Brule, East Bearskin, Clearwater, South Farm, Little North, North, North Fowl, South Fowl, Magnetic and Little Gunflint lakes.

Also, motorboats would be allowed along a corridor running from Seagull Lake into Saganaga, while motorboats would be allowed during the peak fishing seasons on a corridor from Fall Lake to Newton Lake, into Pipestone Bay of Basswood Lake. These concessions are a long way from a total ban on motorized traffic in or near the BWCA.

As to snowmobiles, in contrast to the present ban on the use of these machines in the BWCA, the Burton-Vento proposal would establish two snowmobile routes to Canada, one from the end of the Gunflint Trail through Saganaga Lake, and the other from Crane Lake to Little Vermillion and Lac La Croix.

In addition to these regulations on the BWCA, the proposed bill orders the Secretary of Agriculture to provide financial assistance to resorts to help them revise their recreational life-styles. If a resort wanted to become a center for cross-country skiing, for example, and not snowmobiling, federal money would be made available to help the owner make such a transition. Also, the federal government would have a new responsibility to provide new camping, hiking and snowmobiling trails and facilities in the balance of the Superior National Forest outside the BWCA.

The loggers, resorters, snowmobilers and motorized fishermen all would have liked more than this proposal offers. Yet, it gives all of them more than they would have had if Fraser's bill had been accepted untouched. This proposed bill seems to be a workable compromise, written as it should be, in favor of the BWCA's unique and perishable wilderness character.

[From the Minneapolis Tribune, Mar. 28, 1978]

A CONSTRUCTIVE COMPROMISE FOR THE BWCA

At last, a workable compromise has emerged for the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. Now Congress has a sound bill that would preserve the BWCA as a wilderness; allow limited motorboating and snowmobiling; ban logging, but provide compensation for loggers' losses. The compromise was put together by Rep. Phillip Burton of California, who heads the House parks subcommittee, with the help of Rep. Bruce Vento of St. Paul.

The Burton-Vento bill would settle the controversial question of logging by banning it altogether. Timber companies would be compensated for any losses; substitute timber would be made available in other national forests, and a program of intensified forestry begun on those lands. The logging ban is supported by Gov. Rudy Perpich, who has proposed similar state compensation measures.

Motorboating would be allowed on several lakes around the edge of the wilderness area. Snowmobiling would be permitted on two routes to settlements and cabins on the Canadian border. Resort owners affected by proposed restrictions would get financial help and other considerations. A 227,000-acre, National Recreation Area would be set up outside the BWCA.

The BWCA controversy stems from fuzzy language in the original 1964 Wilderness Act. Federal courts have ruled that Congress intended to protect the BWCA as a true wilderness. That was also the view of the law's chief sponsor, the late Sen. Hubert Humphrey.

"There is a constant fight up here in Congress," Humphrey once said, "to protect what little public land we have left that is worthy of protection. Any time anybody can find something on that public land that looks as if it might yield a dollar, he is up here to get it. And I am here to see that 100 years from now somebody's children may be able to take a canoe and portage up through these forests and commune with nature."

We supported Rep. Donald Fraser's much stronger BWCA-protection bill, but like Frazer we recognize the need for compromise to settle the BWCA controversy. The Burton-Vento bill, Fraser says, is "very thoughtful and constructive . . . and consistent with the concern for basic protection." Some fine-tuning may be needed, but we hope Burton's subcommittee, which will take up the bill April 3, gives quick approval.

[From the St. Paul Sunday Pioneer Press, Mar. 26, 1978]

BWCA COMPROMISE

If a compromise is possible on the future of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, a congressional subcommittee has achieved it.

The National Parks subcommittee of the House Interior Committee has produced a draft BWCA bill that we hope will be the pattern for congressional action. The bill is primarily the work of subcommittee Chairman Rep. Phillip Burton, D-Calif., and Rep. Bruce Vento, D-Minn.

Vento had been given the task of trying to reconcile conflicting bills introduced by two other Minnesota Democrats, Donald Fraser of Minneapolis and James Oberstar of the Eighth District, which includes the BWCA.

Fraser's bill, in essence, would have simply put the BWCA under all the protections of the Wilderness Act and banned all mechanized and commercial activity. Oberstar, reflecting concerns of his constituents, would have encircled the canoe wildlerness with a heavy-use recreational area. Then the Carter administration came through with its own proposal.

About the only thing all three had in common was that they concerned the same part of the country.

Make no mistake. The Burton-Vento compromise is a compromise. It will please neither the environmental purists nor those residents of northern Minnesota who regard the BWCA as some sort of local playground. But the proposed bill seems to us to ensure the integrity of a unique wilderness while recognizing the economic needs of the surrounding area and some present, non-wilderness uses.

Geographically, the Burton-Vento bill establishes a million-acre Boundary Waters Wilderness Area, incorporating the present BWCA and some surrounding property. It sets up a 227,000-acre National Recreation Area, as in Oberstar's bill, but the recreation area would simply follow the main roads that already cut into the BWCA: the Gunflint Trail, the Echo Trail and the Fernberg Road.

Mining and mineral exploration would be forbidden within both the wilderness and recreation areas. There would be no more logging in the wilderness and present logging contracts would end in one year—time during which logging roads, structures and other signs of activity would be wiped out. But the bill also provides for compensation to logging companies that hold contracts and directs the Secretary of Agriculture to find substitute timber outside the wilderness area.

Resorts and local communities are to be assisted in developing new recreation programs in keeping with the changed nature of the canoe country, additional outdoor recreation opportunities are to be provided outside the wilderness and the wilderness itself is to get new backpacking and hiking trails. Resorters who believe their business has been harmed may insist on being bought out at "fair market price."

Snowmobiles will be prohibited within the wilderness except for two trails allowing access to Canada, one along the eastern edge of Saganaga Lake and the other from Crane to Little Vermilion lakes (On this matter, it should be noted that the National Park Service plans extensive snowmobile trails within Voyageurs National Park, a more suitable place than the nation's only canoe wilderness.)

Motorboats of 10 horsepower or less will be permitted on a number of lakes on the edge of the wilderness and, for five years only, on Newton Lake and Pipestone Bay of Basswood during the spring and fall fishing seasons.

Congress should bend no further.

BOUNDARY WATERS SHAME

Up in Northeastern Minnesota along the Canadian border is a splendid place called the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, a place that—shamefully—is the focus of a bitter congressional battle over practically everything but the future of its million-plus acres of lake chains and virgin forests.

Congress should be working out how to preserve the wilderness qualities of the Boundary Waters for all Americans to enjoy—not just canoeists, backpackers and environmental purists, not just resort owners, marina operators, and motorboaters and not just lumbermen. Congress owes that to the nation because it avoided solving the problem in 1964 when the Boundary Waters was ironically included in the National Wilderness System without full wilderness protection.

Basically, Congress must decide where various recreational and commercial activities can occur in the Boundary Waters and the other 2 million acres of Superior National Forest.

Rep. Donald Fraser from Minneapolis wrote an excellent bill to distribute these activities according to what would best promote the Boundary Waters as a wilderness.

Taking a different approach, Rep. James Oberstar from the Boundary Waters country wrote a bill that promotes the economic use of the area as the top priority.

And combining these two goals without compromising the environmental integrity of the Boundary Waters, Rep. Bruce Vento from St. Paul and Rep. Phillip Burton who chairs the National Parks Subcommittee perfected the Carter administration's plan for the area and wrote an outstanding compromise bill.

The shame is that the merits and demerits of these bills are not the determining factors of House action on the Boundary Waters. In the same disgraceful context, neither Minnesota senator will sponsor a compromise bill in the Senate that is similar to the Burton-Vento measure in the House.

Instead of the merits, opponents of the Burton-Vento bill are embracing the arguments of reaction that hardly become the progressive Rep. Oberstar. One of their arguments is that "big government" shouldn't tell the little people on the local level what to do with 3 million acres of land that is owned by 215 million Americans. Another argument is that the local people have a proprietary interest in the Boundary Waters that comes ahead of the interests of those "elitist" canoeists and other visitors who support the local economy by their recreational use of the area.

Also instead of the merits, the future of the Boundary Waters is at the mercy of the politics of some congressmen who are trading on reaction and emotion. Rep. Oberstar, for instance is holding up the House on the Burton-Vento bill in an attempt to muscle concessions from Rep. Fraser who is running for the senate. The tactic is to hold the bill hostage as long as possible to keep the heat from the Boundary Waters region on Rep. Fraser until the state convention in early June, and maybe throughout his Senate campaign.

And then there's the Senate where Sen. Wendell Anderson of Minnesota refuses to sponsor a bill, preferring instead to wait and see what happens to Rep. Fraser in his bid for a Senate seat. Sen. Anderson will need the Minneapolis-St. Paul vote to get elected—that area favors the Burton-Vento bill—and Rep. Fraser needs more support in Northeastern Minnesota where the sentiment runs against the compromise bill.

Mired in reaction and immersed in politics, the biggest shame is that Minnesota and the nation may find that the Boundary Waters are the lost waters.

BOUNDARY WATERS WILDERNESS: LOCAL VERSUS NATIONAL INTEREST

(By Richard Liefer)

Indians and trappers who once paddled and portaged in what today is the Boundary Waters Canoe Area (BWCA), a million-acre wilderness in extreme northern Minnesota, would have marveled at the agitation in nearby Ely on July 8.

Many businesses were closed: "Gone to the BWCA hearing," store window signs explained. Three Democratic congressmen were holding House subcommittee hearings at the high school, exploring ways to regulate use of the BWCA.

Parked in front of the school were loggers' trucks bearing signs like "We need BWCA pine NOW!" One truck was a gallows from which the Sierra Club and two environmentalists were hanging in effigy. Bumper stickers invited the Sierra Club to "kiss my axe." Some people wore patches that said, "Snow belongs to everyone."

Recognizing one side of the BWCA-use dispute was no trick; subtlety was not rampant The preponderant local sentiment seemed to be: Don't restrict "our" wilderness area any further.

The other side was respresented, too, if less ostentatiously. In fact, the Sierra Club concluded that supporters of the environmentalists' pro-wilderness position were dominant in number at Ely and at a similar hearing the day before in St. Paul. Many came from far away.

The hearings addressed two proposals for regulating activities in the BWCA. One bill, by Representative Donald M. Fraser of Minneapolis, would preserve the wilderness character of all the BWCA by banning timber-cutting, mining and the use of snowmobiles and motorboats. Iowa's Dick Clark has introduced an identical bill in the Senate.

The other House bill, sponsored by Representative James Oberstar of northeastern Minnesota, would divide the BWCA into two blocks, a 600,000-acre wilderness and a 500,-000-acre national recreation area. Timber harvesting, snowmobiling, motorboating and some commercial activities could take place in the recreation area. Both bills would enlarge the BWCA.

New legislation affecting this vast expanse of lakes, streams and forests would be unnecessary but for a significant imperfection of the 1964 Wilderness Act, which included the BWCA in the new wilderness preservation system. (The BWCA is the second-largest wilderness area in the system, the largest east of the Rockies.)

Although the 1964 law defined wilderness as a place "where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man," it said the BWCA should be managed "without unnecessary restrictions on other uses, including that of timber." It also allowed for "the continuance with the area of any already established use of motorboats."

These contradictions have kept BWCA in a spotlight of controversy. Congress ought to end the ambiguity by declaring the BWCA a full-fledged wilderness. But that proposed solution boils the blood of many who testified in Ely.

Snowmobile and motorboat advocates, outfitters, officials of small communities adjacent to the BWCA, state legislators from the area, and elderly and handicapped outdoorsmen spoke in favor of the Oberstar bill or of no bill. Some prefer the the status quo, or want the management authority of the secretary of agriculture reduced.

For the most part, the present management plan for the BWCA dates from 1965, when Orville Freeman was secretary of agriculture. Freeman designated 19 canoe routes (60 per cent of the water surface) for motorboat and snowmobile use. He divided the BWCA into an interior zone closed to logging and a slightly smaller area, a portal zone, open to timber harvesting.

Snowmobiling was prohibited last September, generating antipathy in Ely that beggars description.

It is not difficult to understand some of the concerns of northeast Minnesotans, for they involve matters of economics and convenience. El Lustman, executive director of the Ely Chamber of Commerce, figures that 65 per cent of the Ely economy is derived from tourism and logging, and that further restricting BWCA use would hurt the town. Officials of other small towns expressed a fear that federal encroachment on more municipal land would adversely affect their tax bases.

Fraser's bill, however, would increase federal payments to local governments in lieu of taxes. And there is no reason why local economies could not be adjusted to emphasize the unique, purely wilderness aspect of the BWCA.

Outfitters with money invested in motors and towboats naturally do not want them banned in the BWCA. And the elderly and handicapped who can fish but not paddle a canoe consider motorboats vital.

Considerable logging has taken place, but by 1975 a federal District Court had barred further harvesting of large blocks of virgin timber.

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the lower court's prohibition on logging about a year ago, but four timber companies with contracts on six timber stands have refrained from cutting until mid-September to give Congress time to act. Hence the need for prompt action.

While it is possible to sympathize with those likely to be inconvenienced by BWCA restrictions or affected by a reordering of the local economy, it is not possible to embrace the "liberty" argument. "People of Ely are also citizens of the United States," said one motorboat enthusiast. The right to motor to a favorite fishing spot is assumed to be God-given and constitutionally protected.

Lawmakers with the national interest in mind will discount that contention, and they will discount proprietary attitudes toward the BWCA—attitudes like those of Bob Lessard, a member of the Minnesota Legislature, who said: "We can take care of our lands up here."

Presumably Lessard would exclude from his list of exemplary local stewards whoever left a 1950s-vintage car rusting with its bumper almost in the water. True, the heap of metal I paddled past was just outside the BWCA, but is the mind-set behind such a practice left at the edge of the wilderness?

The BWCA is a national asset. It should be preserved for future generations in a state as close to natural as possible. This consideration should prevail over the narrow short-range view of those who would exploit the wilderness. Under the Fraser bill, only non-motorized canoeists, hikers, snowshoers, etc., would use the BWCA.

Logging would destroy the BWCA's balanced ecosystem; it would deprive researchers of an invaluable gene pool. The BWCA still contains about half a million acres of virgin forests. Timber-harvesting practices cannot duplicate nature, forests grow back but species are lost.

The logging industry's need for timber from the BWCA is doubtful. Gerald L. Seck, a lawyer from Walker, Minn., who helped obtain an injunction against logging in the BWCA's portal zone, testified that timber-cutting in the BWCA is an "insignificant part of the logging industry in Minnesota." The state has 16 million acres of commercial forests, with only 160,000 acres of virgin timber in the portal zone.

Sigurd Olson, the leading environmentalist in Ely and a person of national reputation, contended that plenty of timber is available outside the BWCA. Two-thirds of the Superior National Forest lies outside the BWCA. Olson went along with the ambiguous language of the 1964 act—for which Minnesota Senator Hubert Humphrey is to thank or blame, depending on your viewpoint—because he wanted the bill as a whole. What has changed in 13 years? Use of the BWCA has increased enormously, Olson said. So has interest in canoeing and in the wilderness experience concept.

The "wilderness experience" is hard to define and highly subjective. It is easily ridiculed and can smack of the worst kind of elitism. At the very least, it means the enjoyment of peace, quiet and isolation. Motors destroy the peace.

There are thousands of lakes and millions of acres of timberland outside the BWCA, surely enough for loggers and motorboat enthusiasts. Compromise, the thrust of the Oberstar bill, is not necessary.

Congress must decide between local interests and the national interest. Lawmakers are expected to act soon. Jay Scholtus of Virginia, Minn., told the congressmen in Ely: "We have a wilderness treasure on our doorstep." The nation has a wilderness treasure in northern Minnesota. The treasure needs the protection only formal wilderness status will provide it.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12250) to designate the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, to establish the Boundary Waters Canoe Area National Recreation Area, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12250, with Mr. MURTHA in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS) will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 12250 represents an effort of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to deal with a longstanding problem confronting not only the people of northern Minnesota, but the people of our country with reference to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. The subcommittee held a number of hearings and committee discussions, in all of which the gentleman from Minnesota, in whose district the BWCA is located, our distinguished colleague, Mr. OBERSTAR, was invited to participate as if he were in fact a member of the subcommittee even though he was not assigned to our subcommittee nor, for that matter, to our full committee.

In somewhat oversimplified terms the issue presented to our subcommittee could be roughly classified into four discernible aspects. One of the aspects was to deal with the longstanding issue of mining in the BWCA, an issue that was satisfactorily resolved by the subcommittee and the full committee. And on this issue there is no contention that I am aware of.

The next was the longstanding issue of logging within the BWCA. That issue lent itself to being divided between the logging of virgin stand timber and logging generally. There has been no difference of opinion on logging of virgin stand timber and subsequent to the approval of the committee proposal by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs the issue of logging generally has been resolved in the sense that the committee bill permits operations for one year to wind down whatever logging is taking place, and the Oberstar substitute envisages terminating the logging immediately. So in these two respects the two bills we have before us are essentially in full agreement.

With respect to the mining, the committee struggled with what precise technical language we should use. Although there was a difference in the earlier Oberstar proposal and the proposal before us, the committee bill as reported out and the Oberstar bill as it is being offered, contain identical language, I am advised. However, as I represented to my colleagues, the whole issue of mining as we have studied it, and the law is highly technical and I have indicated that we would ultimately end up with language approved by the land and severance of interest in lands experts. We have made some movement in that direction, but the language that we have, and I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) would concur, the language he has in this respect, should not be considered definitive or final because we are still exploring what, if any other, technical changes must be made in that respect.

The measure was sufficiently and carefully studied so that in the 46-member Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs the bill passed out without a dissenting vote. There was only one dissenting view and that issue was related to the lumbering issue which, has essentially, as I indicated earlier, been resolved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

A great number of subcommittee members worked with great diligence, very particularly the gentleman from Kansas, our ranking Member, Mr. SEBELIUS; but I think I should single out for a very special commendation the untiring and unique efforts of our fellow Member of the full committee, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) for his most competent and unique contribution to the legislation that is before us today. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) chaired the field hearings conducted by our subcommittee in Minnesota last year and has been most singularly instrumental in bringing this legislation before the House today.

I would like the RECORD also to reflect the reasonable and accommodating attitude reflected throughout by both our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) as well as our colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) in whose district the BWCA is located.

The other two issues that the committee had to deal with dealt essentially with motorized use in the summer, use that is not permitted in wilderness areas generally, and motorized snowmobile use in the winter, a use that has been banned as a result of an order of Secretary of Agriculture Butz and under Secretary of Agriculture Bergland, who the Members will recall is a former colleague from the State of Minnesota. For the past few years snowmobiling has not been permitted anywhere in the BWCA.

The subcommittee and the full committee decided to adopt a recommendation by the Secretary of Agriculture to permit snowmobiling only, which is more use than currently permitted, to get access to the Canadian side in these areas where snowmobiling is permitted. We have not been able to accommodate the conflicting points of view on what and how much and where snowmobiling or motorboat use should be permitted in the summer, in the spring, and in the fall. So the committee proposal will be refined marginally by an amendment. The subcommittee and full committee tried to treat this issue by recognizing the incompatible nature of the use of canoes and motorboats by eliminating in the main the use of motorboats during the months of July and August, the two heaviest months for canoeing, and by permitting use restrictions on horsepower and other items, the use of motorboats on certain designed lakes within the BWCA. I believe the subcommittee and full committee have truly produced legislation that can be considered to be balanced. I suspect one-tenth of that measurement of balance is that the so-called Burton-Vento compromise has been favorably editorialized by most of the major newspapers in the State of Minnesota, including the largest newspaper in the congressional district wherein the BWCA exists. There is one tactical situation I would like to explain to my colleagues.

We intend to perfect the subcommittee bill and to eliminate some 200,000-plus areas that were designated in the committee bill as a national recreation area, it was determined that this section led to a beclouding of the real issues and, therefore, that section should be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself an additional 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, that section should be replaced by an essentially agreed upon limitation only for mining in this mining protection zone on federally owned lands; so the committee will seek an opportunity to protect the basic bill primarily in that connection and to extend motorized use on more lakes and for a longer period of time. We intend to offer at that point in time, in the event the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) offers a substitute, to offer an amendment to his bill in the nature of a substitute, to the end that we will then be discussing, in fact, the options that confront our colleagues.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, as I am certain most Members know by now, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness issue has been surrounded by considerable controversy. While everyone is still not in agreement on all features, I think that the committee bill, as brought to the floor today, attempts to rectify most of the issues in a proper manner. The resolution of many of the points of controversy in this bill constitutes a tribute to the ability of our subcommittee chairman (Mr. PHIL BURTON), along with the very able work of our Minnesota colleague on the committee (Mr. VENTO). Likewise, I pay my respects to the ability and work of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER), author of one of the versions, and to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), in whose district the area is located.

While I recognize that any change from the status quo is often hard to accept and difficult to adjust to by local interests, I am impressed by the tremendously important national significance of this area. It is the largest wilderness area in the eastern half of the United States, and we will never find the opportunity to have a bigger one elsewhere in the East; it supports more users than any other designated wilderness area in the United States; it is the only lakeland paddle canoe wilderness in the Nation; and it has a long recognized history of wilderness-type use. Thousands of people from all over the East and Midwest travel long distances to use and enjoy the peace and solitude of this area. Moreover, the natural resource qualities of the area are truly superlative.

While H.R. 12250 does bring some disruptive influence to local interests, I believe the bill also provides numerous countermeasures to soften the impact. Further, with the adoption of the amendments to be offered today which will slacken the restrictions on motorboat use on some lakes and will eliminate the national recreation area designation, I believe the bill will constitute a very responsible compromise.

I should further point out that the administration recommended a bill which contained many features much more environmentally protective than what is in the committee bill.

There are several features of the bill I would like to specifically address.

Considering the great importance of the wilderness values of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, the Forest Service should work very closely with the International Boundary Commission to assure that any activities associated with boundary identification have as limited an adverse impact as possible on wilderness values. Absolutely no impact would be ideal, and is the goal which should be pursued.

I mentioned earlier that the Boundary Waters Canoe Area accommodates the greatest amount of use of any designated wilderness. Corresponding with this, it is my understanding that there has probably been more study and research conducted in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area by the Forest Service regarding wilderness user attitudes, perceptions, desires, activities, and impacts, than in any other wilderness in the Nation. The Forest Service should strengthen its commitment to make stronger application of this work to the management of this area and to other wilderness areas across the Nation. Of absolutely critical importance is the development and implementation of wilderness carrying capacity thresholds and controls. It is one thing to initially designate a wilderness, but safeguarding its integrity in perpetuity does not stop there. It is essential that appropriate user limitations are recognized and adhered to so that the wilderness qualities for which the area was established are perpetuated indefinitely for the sake of many generations of users to come. We simply cannot permit these superlative wilderness areas to become overrun by overuse. I believe that the Forest Service has been very cognizant of this situation to date, particularly as reflected by research effort conducted on this subject in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. Along with this new congressional deliberation and designation for a strengthened Boundary Waters Canoe Area wilderness, I believe a renewed commitment should also come from the Forest Service managers for a professionally updated review and recommitment regarding user carrying capacity protections for this splendid wilderness resource. This effort should be incorporated into the comprehensive management plan to be developed pursuant to the provisions of section 20 of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, that completes the comments I wish to make on this bill at this time.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEBELIUS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Chairman, this legislation that is pending before us has been the subject of indepth evaluation and discussion, and I certainly want to commend the gentleman in the well, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS), for his work.

It is my understanding that, while the committee bill itself is a compromise, there will be further efforts to compromise the legislation in order to try to bring about a more balanced perspective for the management of this area.

As a Member whose district has been affected by similar legislation earlier in this Congress, I urge my colleagues to pay particularly close attention to the comments from the gentleman of Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) in whose district this area lies. Too often we pay too little heed to the voice of the people who will be most directly affected by pending legislation.

Mr. OBERSTAR, by way of his substitute, gives us a clear opportunity to pass a responsible compromise which accommodates both the interests of environmentalists and the needs and concerns of local residents who derive their living from the Boundary Waters Area. I have discussed this compromise with several of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and note that Mr. QUIE, Mr. FRENZEL, and Mr. HAGEDORN all concur that it is a reasonable alternative which, more than other versions before us, reflects the valid needs of the local population, and the hearings revealed an overwhelming percentage of support for the Oberstar proposal from the people who live and make their livelihood there.

I urge my colleagues to support the Oberstar substitute as a basis for final legislation.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO), a member of the full committee.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me give credit to the chairman of the subcommittee for providing the opportunity that I have had to participate as a member of the full Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and consider the subject matter that is before us, one which so importantly affects Minnesota and the area that other Members of my delegation and I represent, as well as this Nation.

I want to give special credit to the authors of the various proposals, the two gentlemen from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER and Mr. OBERSTAR), each of whom has labored diligently to bring forth a resolution of this issue.

The bill on the Boundary Waters Canoe Area that we are considering is both a culmination and a new beginning. Through H.R. 12250, this legislation that is before us, Congress will be ending the years of controversy and uncertainty that has surrounded the BWCA. This bill will be a culmination of a long process of executive orders, court decisions, and legislative initiatives to protect this unique natural resource.

H.R. 12250 will mark a new commitment to the protection of the BWCA. This bill will reaffirm Congress intent to preserve this area as a wilderness for the benefit and enjoyment of not only the present generation but of all future generations of Americans as well.

Legislation to protect the BWCA is imperative. The threat to this wilderness is very real and is increasing at a dramatic rate. Canoeists, motorboaters, snowmobilers, cross-country skiers, loggers, and miners all demand access to this fragile ecosystem. Unless these demands are faced through the legislative process, we will lose one of the largest wilderness areas through overuse and abuse.

Mr. Chairman, this proposal represents the efforts of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to resolve the conflicts over what use of the BWCA is compatible with its wilderness qualities. The bill is the culmination of a lengthy hearing process. Last year, at the direction of the chairman of the subcommittee, I chaired hearings in St. Paul, Minn., and Ely, Minn., and of course, we had further hearings under his direction in Washington, D.C. During these hearings every concerned citizen we could possibly permit to testify was allowed to have ample opportunity to express their views, and various organizations had that same opportunity. They expressed their views on this issue and offered their opinions on how the BWCA should be managed. Based on these hearings and a careful consideration of the previous proposals, H.R. 12250, a compromise bill, resulted. This bill seeks to balance national and local concerns while affording maximum protection for the wilderness.

Many of the disputes which have surrounded the BWCA have already been resolved by the hearing process. All parties now agree that mining and logging are incompatible with the qualities of the area if we wish to maintain the wilderness character of this area. They also agree that mining and logging would threaten the integrity of the wilderness. It is also recognized that there is sufficient timber available outside the BWCA to maintain a viable wood fibers industry for norther Minnesota, and the bill does give direction for intensive forest management, reforestation, and technological assistance. There even exists the potential for growth of that industry because of the actions and the directions set forth in this approval under the authority of the State of Minnesota. However, for these agreements to occur, Congress must give approval to this particular measure we have before us.

The issue of motorized use within the BWCA is the major remaining controversy. The lakes of the BWCA serve increasing numbers of canoeists and motorboaters each year. In making its determinations, the subcommittee tried to strike a balance between these competing uses. Many key fishing lakes remain open to motorized use, and nearly every lake with a resort or cabin located on it will remain open for motorized use. Under this compromise proposal 41 percent of the present motorized use will continue to be allowed until 1984, and approximately 36 percent until the year 2010. After that point in time, 25 percent or approximately one-quarter of the present motorized use will be permitted. Thus the phaseout concept will accommodate a large percentage of this generation's demand for motorized use.

In considering the issue of motorized versus nonmotorized use, the subcommittee and the full committee were guided by several factors, and these factors are as follows:

No. 1, canoe use is the predominant form of recreation in the BWCA. Over 60 percent of the users of the BWCA are canoeists, and if we look at the visitors and the number of days spent, the figure goes to 70 percent for those who visit and stay over a long period of time.

Over 60 percent of the users of the BWCA are canoeists. And if you go by visitor days, it amounts to 70 percent of those who visit the State over a length of time.

The second fact is that there is a conflict between canoeists and motorboat users. In a survey conducted, a vast majority of the canoeists stated that the motorboats disrupted their wilderness experience, because of noise and congestion, and so on.

The third factor is that motor use has historically been considered incompatible with wilderness designation by Congress. And, indeed, the events of the past 14 years, in terms of conflicts that have occurred, in terms of court cases, in terms of administrative rulings, add validity to this judgment that was initially made by Congress.

The concept of the wilderness is the concept that wilderness use should determine the activities that occur. Local enterprise should not determine how wilderness will be used and, of course, we do provide access points to Canada to snowmobile routes, an this is important.

The reintroduction of snowmobiles, which have been banned for the past 2 years, I think would be a poor precedent, in terms of wilderness areas. And as late as passage of the Endangered Wilderness Act this year again reaffrmed our opposition to the reintroduction of snowmobiles in wilderness areas.

I urge my colleagues to stand firm on this position.

To my right is a map of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, 1 million acres, which is the most extensive wilderness area we have in the United States. It is amazing that this wilderness should be threatened by our enthusiasm to rush forward and to use it. All agree that there is to be no mining in this wilderness area. All agree there is to be no timber cutting in this wilderness area at this time. All agree that we should not pollute this area. But to be threatened by the fact of overuse of recreation is indeed a sad irony. That overuse relates to canoeists and motorboat users. It relates to a variety of use.

We have available almost 2½ times the water surface area immediately outside this area which is available for motorized use.

On this map, the areas marked in red indicate where motorized use is provided. In fact, public ownership of the national park to the west of the area, the national park, has extensive motorized use. Indeed, in one area there ought to be an opportunity where someone can go and have some solitude, where someone can go and have an experience that is different. The overuse and abuse of this area will destroy it. It will destroy the economy in this area, which is far more damaging than any kind of limit that we can put on it. We are not suggesting a greater ownership of public land. What we are talking about is a new type of management system in this area, which has had a great deal of controversy, to eliminate the uncertainties that surround it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Members to support this compromise bill and to support the amendments we propose. This bill tries to balance the demands of the local community with the needs of the national constituency which does use it and is very much interested in this vital national resource.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, 10,000 years ago the last glacier retreated from northern Minnesota, leaving behind it the assorted lakes and waterways and interconnecting channels which now make up the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. That was probably the last quiet and peaceful thing that happened in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in its entire history.

The BWCA is the basis of the economy of an area that includes family-owned and operated resorts and outfitters. The area is made up of small communities of people who have lived in the area for generations and whose way of life is inextricably linked to the future management of this area. This did not happen just by accident. It happened as a result of conscious tradition, conscious implementation of law in the entire management and history of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

Mr. Chairman, beginning in the 1880's there was logging in the area; and from the time that motorboats were first invented and perfected, they were used in the area. It was a recognition that its uses were important to the local economy, to the future development, and to the people of the area.

Those uses have been continued, and they have been protected in Federal law. In fact, in the Wilderness Act, that landmark piece of legislation passed by the Congress in 1964, with language carefully drafted by then Senator Hubert Humphrey, after consultation with wilderness groups and with the local residents, which protected the rights of people in northern Minnesota to log in the area and to use motoboats in the area; in short, to continue their way of life and the economic base of the area's economy.

But here we are, Mr. Chairman, 14 years later, again faced with legislation dealing with the future of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, after the people had been assured, after commitments had been made in law, after commitments had been made by wilderness advocates that the use of the area would not be changed, that in 1964, this was the last time any change would occur in the use of that area.

I think the proper function of Government is to seek to improve the quality of life of people. I think Government action and intervention is justified when it is directed toward those goals; but when Government acts in a way that is harmful to people, that action ought to be stopped. That is the case with this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, we do not need a piece of legislation which seeks to further burden the people and further create economic difficulties for an area already troubled with economic problems. We do not need legislation that adds more regulations, and there are some 52 separate instances in this bill where the Secretary of Agriculture is given discretionary authority to do this or that, thus adding to and expanding or creating more difficulties and regulations, and more work for the regulation writers.

Mr. Chairman, I have developed what I think is a fair compromise, one that achieves the major conservation goals of protecting the Boundary Waters Canoe Area from damage caused by mining, by logging, by, in a word, overuse of the area.

When I set out with this legislation in 1975, to draft a piece of legislation that would narrow down the uses and that would resolve the controversy, it was my hope that we could end the bitterness and the divisiveness that has characterized the entire history of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, which today has erupted into emotional reaction on both sides. Furthermore, deep, bitter divisiveness within our own Democratic Party erupted once again at our convention last Saturday. It is evident in every community in the northern part of the State which I represent.

It was my hope we could bring people together and that we could, by discussing this issue openly, on the basis of the compromise piece of legislation, come to some agreement that would be in the interest of all of the people of the State and that would end that divisiveness. Apparently we have not done so, however. We have come to the House floor, with both sides widely divided on one of the major issues in this dispute.

Now, one of the key issues when I started with this legislation, in meeting with wilderness advocates, was whether or not it would be possible to end mining; whether or not it would be possible to end the logging in the area. The first consideration of wilderness advocates was for the virgin forest areas of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, and I have made a commitment that we would work to end the logging in the virgin forest area. My first bill reflected that commitment. It would have ended logging in the virgin forest area and continued it in the second growth areas.

In 1976, I negotiated a moratorium on logging in the BWCA in order to provide Congress time to act on legislation to protect the virgin timber under contract and open to logging under a Federal court decision in 1976.

Over a period of years I have successively modified my bill in an attempt to be responsible to the wilderness concerns and the local economy, to the point where we have a piece of legislation that eliminates mining and eliminates logging altogether, relying on the assurance of the State of Minnesota that Federal land and the five county area adjacent to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area will be available for logging. We have relied on the assurance of the U.S. Forest Service there will be available softwood timber on Federal lands in northern Minnesota.

My substitute will incorporate provisions that will establish a Federal-State cooperative program for more intensive forest management in the State lands adjacent to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area so that we will assure the State of the wood fiber industry in Minnesota.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, there is one item for the record that I think might be useful to have confirmed. During the course of my earlier statement, I had represented that the subcommittee afforded the gentleman from Minnesota—though not a member of the subcommittee nor a member of the full committee—the opportunity to fully participate, including by debate as if he were a member of the subcommittee. Is that statement correct?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I intended at the conclusion of my remarks to recognize that the committee has been most generous with its time in allowing me an opportunity to speak and to make suggestions, including during the markup period, while the chairman had all the votes locked up in his pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. OBERSTAR. What we are down to in this Boundary Waters Canoe Area bill today is, who will use the area? It is the people's question. Who is going to use the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, those from thousands of miles or hundreds of miles away, or those who live in the area, whose lives and livelihoods are dependent upon the small businesses, the small outfitter operators, the small resorts and the people who live there year round.

Who are these people? They are steelworkers who work in the taconite plant, the iron ore plants, the small businesses in Ely, Aurora, Grand Marais, Tofte, Hedstrum, Two Harbors and Silver Bay.

My bill takes the area which now has 1,060 lakes, the 1,030,000 acres. Of those 1,060 lakes, 124 are open to motorized use today under the existing management of the BWCA. We reduce from 124 down to 92 the number of lakes that will be used out of the 1,060. It includes a large water surface, because those are the large lakes suitable for motorized use. We allow 800 miles open exclusively to canoe use. That is 800 miles. I suggest we could put a canoeist in there and push him off on the eastern end of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area and he would run out of food before he runs out of paddle lakes. And then we allow 343 miles of lake open to motorized travel, limited on most lakes to 10 horsepower, and on 16 specifically named lakes to 25 horsepower.

What could be more reasonable? How much more could the people of northern Minnesota be asked to give up? This they have done willingly over a period of 3 years of open town hall public meetings which I have sponsored and in which the citizens participated in shaping a piece of legislation which I now offer this afternoon, that restricts the use of the area. They have been willing to do it to make an accommodation that yields more to wilderness than to multiple use, but one that protects a very basic need and necessity and a way of life.

I think what we have offered is a responsible alternative, one that yields more to wilderness than to multiple use, but one that protects the basic right of the people of northern Minnesota to enjoy this area and to make their livelihood in it.

H.R. 12250 represents an abrogation of the promises and assurances made to the people of northern Minnesota that they would continue to have the access to the Boundary Waters upon which their way of life, the economy of the area and the viability of so many small, family owned and operated businesses depend.

Tradition and law have established the Boundary Waters' unique position within the wilderness system.

In the Wilderness Act of 1964, Congress included the Boundary Waters in the wilderness system. Yet, at the same time as Congress included the BWCA, within the wilderness system, the people of northern Minnesota were assured this legislative action would not deprive them of their traditional, long-established use of the area or would not force them out of business.

Fourteen years later, the Congress is facing the decision of abiding by those assurances or by stating they are no longer applicable. There can be no doubt as to Congress intent in the Wilderness Act with respect to the Boundary Waters. We either honor those assurances or we do not.

What is before us, however, is not a question of whether the Boundary Waters should be included in the wilderness system. That decision was made 14 years ago. An integral part of that decision, however, was a recognition of the special character of the Boundary Waters.

What we are seeking now is a equitable legislative solution which protects the Boundary Waters from environmental damage, recognizes the national interest in that preservation and protects the rights of local people.

I believe that a solution which fails to adequately consider the multiplicity of interests is inadequate and unfair.

I have devoted more time in this Congress to this issue which so vitally affects the people I represent than to any other single issue. It is an important issue which has cast uncertainty over the lives of thousands and has become increasingly divisive within my home State of Minnesota.

It has been my hope since I became a Member of this House to end the long controversy surrounding the Boundary Waters.

It is detrimental for our State to be so divided over this one issue.

I have made several substantial compromises from my initial legislative proposal for the Boundary Waters. The people of my district have accepted these compromises.

I have developed what I believe is a fair compromise which accomplishes the major conservation goals of protecting the Boundary Waters from any ecological damage from mining or timber harvesting.

In my own mind, there has never been any doubt mining or exploration for minerals had potentially devastating consequences on the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. In the interests of insuring the achievement of the overriding goal of prohibiting mining, I have included in my substitute language which is almost identical to the language contained in the committee bill.

My substitute would order an immediate termination of timber harvesting. That provision represents a development of my position from my first proposal which would have continued the timber harvesting permitted by the Wilderness Act of 1964 and recognized as a legitimate use of the BWCA by the U.S. Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. My proposal would, however, have preserved the over 500,000 acres of virgin stands in the Boundary Waters.

I later revised my bill to permit a 20-year transition period in order to permit more intensive management of the areas outside of the BWCA to assume the burden of meeting the needs of the wood fiber industry.

That industry employs over 9,000 people with a payroll in excess of $130 million in my district.

The proposed phaseout of timber harvesting was consistent with a study released by the Forest Service last year that an immediate termination of timber harvesting within the BWCA would have a potential loss of 1,190 jobs and $30 million annually to the economy of northern Minnesota.

Following that study, the timber issue was thoroughly debated and the State of Minnesota and the U.S. Forest Service have now made assurances that the replacement timber is available.

Chief John McGuire of the Forest Service has stated in a letter dated April 7, 1978, to the Interior Committee:

> The current softwood cutting rates on the Superior National Forest could be maintained for 10 years and still have nearly a 2-year's supply of softwoods under contract, even if all portal zone logging is terminated. Existing volumes under contract and potential sales which can be made elsewhere in the Superior National Forest are adequate to sustain current employment levels in the timber industry. . . . Any additional softwood timber that the State of Minnesota can make available during the coming decade would provide wood for the expansion of paper mill production or for the maintenance of a somewhat larger contract backlog of National Forest timber.

The State of Minnesota has promised to provide additional softwood timber.

The major provisions of my bill with respect to timber harvesting:

First. Terminate timber harvesting immediately.

Second. Direct the Secretary of Agriculture to provide 47,000 cords of softwood in addition to the softwood yield of Federal lands in 18 counties of northern Minnesota.

Third. Provide this amount may be reduced by whatever additional softwoods the State of Minnesota makes available as it has indicated it will.

Fourth. Authorize an annual expenditure for 5 years of $12 million for the more intensive management of the Superior National Forest, including funds for road building to improve access to less profitable stands, timber stand improvement, and reforestation absolutely essential to insuring the future availability of timber.

Fifth. Authorize $3 million annually for 5 years to the State of Minnesota, to be matched on an 80–20 basis, to enable the State to manage its own lands more intensively.

Sixth. Include specific direction to the Secretary to offer timber for use in sawmills which is as close to the sawmills as possible. There are a number of moderate-sized sawmills in northern Minnesota which are family owned and operated businesses, long-established in the communities. I believe it is absolutely essential we insure the survival of these small businesses by insuring them access to the saw timber for their mills.

These small businesses require timber that is limited in supply. Further, they are limited by the fixed location of their mills. Increased distances to the supply reduces their ability to remain competitive and in business.

My substitute, like the committee bill, provides for compensation of anyone who has suffered financial loss in fulfilling the terms of any of the valid contracts for timber sales within the BWCA. There is no disagreement the holders of leases of the six sales within the BWCA should receive compensation for the expenses they have incurred in preparing these sales for logging, which the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled is legal.

I have included funding for the State on a matching basis in recognition of the importance these lands can play in meeting the timber needs of an industry which employs thousands of people in the northern part of our State.

The sum is modest, but the 80–20 matching formula is consistent with the commitment of the State to more intensive management of State lands in the five counties of Cook, Lake, St. Louis, Koochiching and Carlton.

The State is also authorized to spend those funds on county lands, which could use significantly more intensive management. At present, there is no complete inventory of timber available on the lands owned by the counties of Minnesota.

The major issue in disagreement before this House centers on the extent to which a long-established use of the area, recognized by Congress in the Wilderness Act of 1964, will be permitted to continue.

Motorboats are now permitted on 124 of the BWCA's 1,060 lakes, on 19 routes and on 375 of the BWCA's 1,135 miles of waterways. The substitute would decrease motor use to 15 routes on 92 lakes, a total decrease of about 25 percent in the number of routes and the number of lakes open to motors.

Motor use has existed in the BWCA since the establishment of the roadless area in the 1920's. State of Minnesota DNR studies and the Forest Service indicate no evidence has been found of environmental damage resulting from motor use.

In a letter to me, Rupert Culter, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, wrote that "no effects on water quality have been measured to date on motorized routes in the BWCA. Motorized use at current levels has not had a measurable impact on water to date."

It is not the intent of the substitute to open up any lakes which are now not open to motors. Often, the debate over the BWCA has proceeded as though the Boundary Waters were now totally closed to motorboats and the substitute would open up the BWCA to motors.

Such is not the case.

Motor use is now and always has been an integral part of the BWCA. It now accounts for 38 percent of total use (1977 Forest Service data). Canoeists account for 56 percent. In 1977, 57,000 visitors to the BWCA chose to use motors; 95,000 chose paddle canoe.

One-third of the motor use is from outside of Minnesota. Illinois and Indiana send the largest and the second largest numbers of visitors to the BWCA from outside of Minnesota. In 1977, 51 percent of the visitors from Indiana used motors; 40 percent of those from Illinois. In citing the need for continued motor use, I am not defending a purely local interest.

Yet the impact of the committee bill will be borne by the people living in the area.

The committee bill closes most of the lakes now open to both them and canoeists. At present, motorists have access to 61 percent of the water surface of the BWCA; under the committee bill, even as amended, this figure would drop immediately to 17 percent and eventually to 5 percent.

H.R. 12250 accepts the principle of continued motorized recreation in the BWCA. The amendments further extend that acceptance. The provisions for motorized use are still inadequate to the needs of the recreational economy of the resorts, outfitters and related businesses.

The bill offers those resorters forced out of business the option of selling out to the Government. The estimated cost is approximately $8.7 million.

The loss of those resorts would have a significant impact on the tax base and the economy of sparsely populated areas such as Cook County where 94 percent of the land is already in public ownership.

Approximately 65 resorts operate on the periphery of the boundary waters. In the Ely-Fernberg Road area, over 50 businesses depend on tourism, with tourism, bringing in directly at least $6 million annually, over 40 percent of that small city's economic activity.

In Cook County, 25 percent of that county's $100 million economic activity is generated by the Gunflint Trail: resorts, outfitters, related business and private homes.

These resorts on the Gunflint Trail serve approximately 9,000 guests annually.

The committee bill, as amended, will permit some of the resorts to remain in operation Motorized access to a lake or part of the lake is not sufficient for most of the resorts to remain in operation.

The committee bill presents several major problems to the over 100 resorts and outfitters now sending motorized parties into the boundary waters:

First. Phase-out only postpones the eventual. In the case of Saganaga, phase-out to 2010 makes no sense. The Canadians are building a road for access to this border lake. Under the committee bill, this lake, upon which a forest study estimates four American resorts depend, will be almost completely closed to motors except for a narrower corridor to Canadian customs after a 32 years phase-out. The length of the phase-out should be indication that this lake, 17 miles by 4 miles, should remain permanently open to motors. In 32 years we will be faced with the absurd situation of extensive Canadian development as we terminate motors.

Second. The bill provides for no permanent access to the most popular fishing lake in the BWCA: Basswood Lake. The extended 22 phase-out on Jackfish and Pipestone Bays will prohibit resorts on Fall Lake, of which there are five outfitters and local residents, from entering Basswood during July and August. While these are heavy canoe months, they are also heavy motorized months.

Third. The bill provides no permanent motorized routes, but merely continues motors permanently on approximately 12 lakes. The disaster of this approach will be nowhere clearer than on Moose Lake. Moose Lake is a popular entry point for access to the fishing on Knife Lake. Second, resorts on Moose Lake send their guests into Basswood Lake. Access to neither Basswood nor Knife is provided. Moose Lake is not a fishing lake. The lake no longer sustains a fish population and efforts by the State to restock have proven futile.

The committee eliminates any access to the border routes on Knife and Crooked on which local outfitters estimate 50 percent of their business now depends.

At the end of 20 to 30 years, even the seasonal access to the popular fishing lakes of Trout and Basswood will be discontinued. Saganaga Lake on the American side will revert to a wilderness lake except for the access corridor to Canadian customs. The Canadian shore will be fully developed and motors will be permitted on that side.

In 5 years, motors will be limited to the eastern one-tenth of Seagull Lake. At present, 40 summer homes, a resort and two outfitters are located on this lake, which contributes 3.4 percent of the county's economic activity.

In addition to the provisions for acquiring resorts through voluntary sale, every property owner on Fall, Moose, Snowbank, Lake One, Sawbill, Brule, East Bearskin, Clearwater, Saganaga, Seagull, McFarland, North Fowl and South Fowl Lakes will be required to offer the Government the right of first refusal on the sale of property outside of the family.

East of the three counties adjacent to the BWCA already have more than 50 percent of public ownership; the acquisition of the Government of the private property through this provision would represent a further reduction of the tax base and private sector.

The question of snowmobile use is not a major issue in this controversy. Snowmobiling in the BWCA began in 1957, existed at the time of the Wilderness Act of 1964 and was permitted until the imposition of a ban by Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz. Prior to the ban, snowmobiling accounted for only approximately 5 percent of total use of the BWCA, but at least 80 percent of use during the months of January, February, and March.

Winter use in 1977 dropped to one-third the level of the previous winter because of the snowmobile ban. Weather and deteriorating snow conditions in late winter are limiting factors on snowmobile use. Use is actually heaviest in January and February, with a sharp drop-off in March, with almost no snowmobiling beyond March 31.

My substitute would permit snowmobiles on those lakes and portages open to summer use.

Snowmobiling is an important recreational activity in northern Minnesota. I have had many constituents tell me the winter activity and the social life of snowmobiling has made winter bearable in northern Minnesota.

At the same time, snowmobiling offers a supplement to the local economy. On the Gunflint Trail, following the ban on snowmobiling in the BWCA, two resorts closed for the winter and the winter business of a third dropped 50 percent.

The harshness of the winter makes extensive camping in the BWCA unlikely. Even limited use of the BWCA in winter will require provision for snowmobiling in the area.

The alternative is for the entire area to be almost completely unused, except for the periphery or for the very rare individual who will camp in the extremely cold winter of northern Minnesota.

My substitute has received the support of a diverse coalition of groups interested in preserving the Boundary Waters from any ecological damage and in protecting the rights of those now enjoying the Boundary Waters to continue to do so.

These goals are not contradictory, but are in fact complementary.

The people living in the area adjacent to the BWCA have not destroyed the area, but have, in fact, worked for its preservation.

Those who now enjoy the BWCA want to see its pristine beauty protected. The same qualities of the BWCA which bring the canoeists into the area also bring the individual who chooses to use a motor.

The substitute will prohibit mining and logging. It will enable the motorist to continue to use a motor on one of the 15 designated routes on the 92 lakes all of which are now open to motors.

My substitute is supported by:

Labor: National AFL–CIO; Carpenters' Union; United Steelworkers of America, including Minnesota locals representing 15,000 steelworkers in northern Minnesota; International Union of Operating Engineers; Laborers International Union; Minnesota AFL–CIO; and Minnesota Wood Fibers Employees Legislative Council.

Governmental units: St. Louis County Board of Commissioners; Lake County Board of Commissioners; Cook County Board of Commissioners (St. Louis, Lake and Cook are the three counties surrounding the BWCA); and the city councils of Ely, Grand Marais, Virginia, Eveleth, Cook, Orr, Silver Bay, Cloquet, Hoyt Lakes and many other city and town councils in northern Minnesota.

Senior citizen organizations: American Association of Retired Persons; Minnesota Senior Federation; and Iron Range Senior Federation.

Veterans organizations: Minnesota United Veterans Legislative Council; American Legion Department of Minnesota; and Eighth Congressional District, VFW.

Chambers of Commerce: Greater Minneapolis Chamber; Duluth Area Chamber; Northeast Minnesota Region Jaycees, and Virginia, Minnesota Chamber of Commerce.

Other: National Rifle Association; Minnesota Eighth Congressional District DFL Convention, and Minnesota Seventh Congressional District DFL Convention.

I would like to share with my colleagues some of the resolutions of support I have received.

The AFL–CIO has supported my bill as a "carefully drawn up piece of legislation that balances the concept of primitive wilderness with the rights of the area's existing residents and the economic needs of Minunesota." (Taken from the AFL–CIO News, December 1977.)

Steelworker union officials last week signed a letter stating, "The Burton bill is a class discrimination policy. . . . Traditionally this has been our recreation area. It also discriminates against the retired members."

The Minnesota Administrators of Special Education in April passed a resolution in support of my bill. Their resolution read in part:

Legislation regarding the Boundary Waters Canoe Area as proposed by Congressman Phillip Burton, Bruce Vento and Donald Fraser tends to limit the accessibility for handicapped people; therefore, be it resolved, That the Minnesota Administrators of Special Education go on record as supporting the Oberstar proposal which will allow more liberalized use of motorboats and snowmobiles into the peripheral lakes of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

The most eloquent support for my bill has come, however, from the people themselves. The people of northern Minnesota have organized one of the largest grassroots efforts in the last 30 years in northern Minnesota. It has transcended age, occupation, political affiliation. It has represented the spirit of a people determined to fight for a way of life.

Most, if not all, my colleagues have either met with or seen my constituents. They have walked the Halls of Congress for the past year, attempting to win support for their bill—for it is their bill.

While the bill is endorsed by national organizations, the people of northern Minnesota have conducted this lobbying campaign on their own—raising funds necessary to send their representatives to Washington.

They have been miners from the taconite industry and workers in the wood fiber industry—fishermen who use the Boundary Waters primarily for day use. Small businessmen and businesswomen have come to Washington fighting for the right to continue to keep their businesses.

They are not asking that the Boundary Waters be logged or mined. They are not asking that additional areas be opened for motorized recreation. They have been willing to make concessions on both the the number of lakes open to motors and the size of the motors permitted.

Under my substitute, the Boundary Waters will be preserved from any ecological damage from mining and logging. There will be no question the Boundary Waters is a unit of the wilderness system.

The committee bill accepts motors in the BWCA. Their position is not inconsistent with the Wilderness Act of 1964 in this respect.

It is inconsistent and an abrogation of the Wilderness Act in that it does not recognize motorized recreation use is an integral part of the BWCA and that the way of life of the people of my district depend upon it.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER).

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would like to compliment the committee, the Interior Committee, and the subcommittee and the subcommittee chairman for their very careful consideration of the various proposals that were submitted to the committee dealing with the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

The hearings held in Ely, Minn., and in St. Paul, Minn., and the hearings held in Washington, and the very careful thought and enormous amount of attention which has been given to this matter, particularly by the subcommittee chairman, have been enormously helpful and constructive in attempting to resolve some of the issues that were presented by the various bills presented to the committee.

I would like simply to make a couple of observations about the legislation that we will be voting on later today.

First, a poll which has been conducted within the past 2 weeks of the residents of Minnesota comes with the following results.

The people were asked to indicate how they felt about:

Limiting access to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area to preserve it as a natural wilderness area.

The results are as follows: 45 percent strongly agreed; 26 percent slightly agreed; 11 percent were neutral; 9 percent slightly disagreed; and 9 percent strongly disagreed.

Then a second question was asked of the residents of the State as follows. They were asked to choose between two statements:

First, the use of motorboats and snowmobiles should be restricted in the BWCA so the area can be preserved as a wilderness; or

There should be no restrictions on the use of motorboats and snowmobiles in the BWCA so people can use the area as they see fit.

When presented with these two choices 73 percent of the voters picked the first, which said that motorboats and snowmobiles should be restricted, and only 17 percent said there should be no restriction on the use of motorboats or snowmobiles.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any distinction between the position of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) and the other gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) on any of those questions. So I do not see what relevancy that poll has. I think you both agree that there has to be some restrictions.

Mr. FRASER. The gentleman is right in the fact that there are restrictions in both of the bills but if the Oberstar substitute is adopted, 98 percent of the existing motorboat use will be continued, and will be made permanent, which is not now in the law and, second, snowmobiles, which are currently banned by the Secretary of Agriculture will be reintroduced, which will make a significant change.

Mr. FRENZEL. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) that there are some differences between his bill and the other gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. OBERSTAR's substitute, but I do not think they have anything to do with that poll.

Mr. FRASER. I believe that the poll shows where people sort themselves out as to whether they want more restrictions or fewer restrictions. That is essentially the issue which we are going to have to settle here today.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, research has led me to believe that the Oberstar substitute permits 98 percent of the existing motorized use. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. FRASER. It is. Equally serious, the present motorized use is determined by regulations of the Department of Agriculture, but if the substitute is adopted, the motorized use is frozen permanently in the law. so that the opportunities for further management changes on motorized use would disappear.

One of the points to be made about the map on my right here—and it is a point that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) has made already—is that there are an enormous number of lakes already open in the area to motorized use.

Minnesota is known as the Land of Lakes. We have over 13,000 lakes. A large number of them are in the northeastern part of the United States. Those that are open to motors are illustrated by the color red on that map. So the effect of the legislation here is to protect less than 10 percent of the lakes. There are roughly 1,000 lakes in the BWCA, and this effort is to protect them from motorized use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRASER. The lakes marked in blue on the map are the lakes that would be open either on a permanent basis or for 20 or 30 years. These are the lakes that are either on the periphery of the boundary area or in some cases they lie wholly inside of it. These are the most regularly used motorized lakes, so that if these lakes are opened, and this will come in the form of amendments which we agreed could be offered, then 40 percent of the existing motorized use, based on the number of visitors' days would be able to continue. In other words, by opening up lakes already heavily used by motorists, 40 percent of that use will be continued under the amendments that will be presented today.

I think the final point that I would like to make is that there is no doubt about the concern of some people who live in the area who are unhappy about Federal action in the Northeastern part of the United States, who have encountered Federal action frequently, for example, in the establishment of the Voyageur's Park to the west. The Federal Government is also involved in large landholdings, and the people face the problem of getting adequate recompense for these lands being off the tax rolls. All of these I think are concerns that need to be listened to. But there is no doubt that throughout the State there is a very strong sentiment that the wilderness character of this area should be preserved to the maximum extent possible consistent with sensible management.

That is essentially what the so-called Burton-Vento bill will do, particularly if the ameliorating amendments which we have agreed to are adopted at the appropriate time.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE).

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, this is about the most controversial piece of legislation this Congress is going to consider as far as Minnesota is concerned. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) indicated in his comments it was pretty controversial in the convention that his party was engaged in last weekend as well.

Let me tell the Members where I come from. I have been a conservationist all my life, and I have canoed in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. I felt so strongly about this even when I got started farming, that as a farmer I took some losses in my farming operation in order that I might put it into the contour strips and handle my farm in a way that would protect it wherever possible, and pass it on to the next generation better than it was when I took it over. I come from that background myself. Left to my own emotions and those of my constituents in the First District, I believe we would have come out in favor of the original Fraser bill. Since that time I have studied the situation not only from the viewpoint of canoeists but of the concerns of the people in northeastern Minnesota, and I find that this is not some unique wilderness area that only people a long way away, be it southern Minnesota or Illinois or Iowa. It is also the back door of a vast number of people in northern Minnesota as well.

The only way I have ever gone into the BWCA is under my own power with a paddle. I have never used a motor. I would not use a motor up there. I never would want to. I would not have that experience. But I do not want to prevent people who want to fish some big lakes in the BWCA to do so, getting in there with motors.

One of the things I believe we ought to do is protect the wilderness nature of the BWCA. One of the controversies that existed for a period of time which we were trying to resolve was to stop logging. There is no logging under both substitute bills. That, therefore, is no longer a controversy. The wilderness area will be protected, whether one can see it from the water or not. There will not be any mining either. A controversy in Minnesota has been that some mining companies wanted to get in there and see what kind of minerals were there.

The people got upset in Minnesota, as well as myself, and I joined with them to prevent mining exploration in the BWCA.

With logging and mining prohibited, what in the future is going to hurt the BWCA? It is people, people going in there, the ones who use the campsites. Many campsites I have visited virtually destroy the wilderness nature so that you cannot allow people to use them for a long period of time till time heals the scars.

Rarely do people using motorboats camp overnight. They go in there and fish and come back out again in 1 day. All they have done is travel on the water and come back out again. The only thing that stands in the way of the present motorboat routes being accepted by people is that canoeists do not like the sound of a motor.

I have traveled on some of those big bays up there, and I will tell the Members that my boys, when they were smaller, were mighty worried when they went across a big body of water. They did not feel any wilderness experience going across that body of water, but when they heard a motor, there was a safety feeling. They knew somebody could pick us up in a squall.

I am not a snowmobiler. They are not using the BWCA now. Snowmobiles, however, only go on snow-covered frozen lakes. In the summertime you do not see any sign that they had been there. You see the sign of the snowmobiles on land in southern Minnesota where I come from. Special trails are set aside on land to protect the environment. In the BWCA, snowmobiles do not go through the woods, do not travel on land. They stay on the lakes. Therefore, they are not damaging to the wilderness area.

The question is can this area be compatible enough so that some of those lakes, 343 miles out of 800 miles, that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) indicated we could use some motors on. I believe we ought to.

I support the Oberstar substitute. I have some questions on a few of the lakes that the gentleman has put in; but I find it is much more acceptable than the Vento substitute that we have or are going to be considering here, because we are dealing with people using the wilderness in a way that will not hurt the wilderness and the only thing that the motorboats are doing is offending the ears of a few people who are canoeing, and nothing else that I can see.

Now, when we originated the 1964 Wilderness Act, and I was also one of the coauthors of the 1964 act, we put the BWCA under a management plan. Under present law, there is no prohibition on motorboats on lakes and there is no provision for protecting the lakes forever from motorboats as well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE).

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, present law decision on motorized use on lakes are done under a management plan; however, both substitute bills preclude motors on some lakes and include them on some lakes. Motors are permitted on peripheral lakes, a time limitation on motorized use for some lakes is in the Vento bill. The question we are trying to decide now is, which lakes should we permit motors on and for how long?

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, what I cannot help asking is why? Why should there not be one place in which there are no motors? Why can we not have that quietness? If it were the only lake in Minnesota, you could say, well, 10 or 20 percent of that ought to be allowed to people who like motors; but I see no reason not to keep this wilderness area quiet and peaceful and what a wilderness area ought to be. If you are walking down the trail, it is no wilderness when you hear a great big surging motorboat.

Mr. QUIE. We are talking about canoeing on BWCA waters. You cannot see it on these two maps we have up here, but you can see it on the map in the corridor. There are vast areas of the BWCA in which you cannot have motors in the Oberstar bill and I agree.

The question is should you be able to go where there is no sound of motors as soon as you get to the first big boy, or is it alright to wait till you get further back before you have that wilderness experience?

I find the wilderness experience myself is on the smaller rivers and smaller lakes, rather than on the large lakes like Basswood. It is like saying do you want the wilderness experience on Lake Superior or on Milac Lake. It seems to me it is good to have some motors around the large lakes that might afford some protection.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, there are so few places left where there are no motors; the snowmobiles in New Jersey are just a pest. You cannot go out and have some feeling of nature or quiet. I should think a corner of a large State like that might be kept for something a little different.

Mr. QUIE. I agree, we need such areas, we have them in the Oberstar bill. The question is what value judgment do we extend to each lake. Should we deny certain large lakes to people that want to motor in to fish? It is sort of like the back areas where you have enjoyed yourself in New Jersey and the question is how large an area should we take as a wilderness where there is no sound of motors?

The Basswood Lake area is certainly an area of large bodies of water. I do not see how the use of motors are detrimental there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) has again expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, the BWCA extends both east and west of the Quetico. Canadians do not allow motors there unless one has an Indian guide. Canadians do permit motors east and west of the Quetico. I think we should continue present motorized routes south of Canada east and west of the Quetico. The question is should we or should we not permit motors in an area just south of the Quetico, the Basswood Lake area?

I feel that the nature of that area definitely is compatible to motor use for two reasons, the size of the lakes and the present use of those lakes by the residents of the area.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, because our colleagues know of the esteem I hold for our dear colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE), I am sure he would not want the RECORD to reflect that the Oberstar proposal affords compatible use with the Canadian Provincial Park at Quetico. As we know, that is not the case. Although the gentleman and I agree that is desirable, the Oberstar proposal fails in all respects to produce that objective.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, I am talking about the principle. If we look at the map, we do not need to reduce motor routes east or west of the Quetico to be compatible. I see no reason to cut down the motorized use there. Between those points I recognize the Oberstar bill may not be compatible but there are other reasons to permit continued use of motors on some of those routes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. I yield 4 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE).

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, Quetico is in that center of the BWCA, as the Oberstar map shows. As I see it, there are large lakes south of the Quetico that would fit very well with the kind of use we have seen in the past. In the past the people of northeastern Minnesota have used these lakes for fishing. You can see by the map other vast areas for canoeing only. We could have compatible use for all the people who want to use it without hurting the wilderness area at all under the Oberstar proposal.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) for his very thoughtful statement on the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

The gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) does raise a very emotional point. People who are not familiar with the area often ask the question: "Why can't there be some area set aside for these purposes?"

Just looking at this map I have now placed in the well, we can see the enormous, vast area that is open to exclusive canoe paddle zones. Those are the areas. Those are the small interconnecting lakes and channels in that vast area in yellow; they are exclusively set aside for canoe paddling. One will never hear a motor in there as long as he stays in that area.

In the other areas, on the big lakes, there are very few canoeists. They do not want to use Trout Lake, Basswood Lake, Lac La Croix, Saganaga, Seagull, or Snowbank Lake. These are enormous, huge lakes. You could be out in the middle of one of those lakes using a 25-horsepower motor for fishing, and that motor will not be heard on the shores where the canoeists are. There is very little opportunity for confrontation with motors by canoeists. We do set aside this area.

The point is that a society grew up around this border lake country, a society of small businessmen and merchants, people who work the mines and in the forests, people who have only a day or two on a weekend to go out fishing.

This area is a 1,000 square miles in size.

The area is vast. My congressional district would cover the entire State of New Jersey. It would stretch from Silver Spring all the way to Hartford, Conn. This BWCA is only one corner of my congressional district. It is a vast area. We have to realize that it is a 1,000 square miles in area, and we have set aside all but 9 percent of the lakes for canoeing.

Mr. Chairman, I assure the gentlewoman that those concerns are met, and that there is a vast area of quiet for people who want to go canoeing.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's statement. I have listened with interest.

I think, though, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) who is my colleague, fails to point out the size of the lakes that remain open, and I think that the gentleman from Minnesota is well aware of that.

We are talking about 60 percent that are open right now, and the gentleman's substitute provides that 58 percent of total water surface will be open on the large lakes and small lakes.

Another aspect of motorized use caused a reduction in canoe use. Canoeists today want to get away from this conflict. Some of the canoe areas that get used the most are in the interior. As to many of the lakes we look at on the map of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) these lakes do suffer from incursions by motorboats into the wilderness, and this results in an incompatibility of use.

The fact is that the type of use of this area has been changing. It has changed dramatically. The motorboat and fishing use is not as extensive a use as canoe use is today. There has been a change, and it is time we recognized it. If we are going to maintain this area, we must recognize that fact and devise a management plan that will adequately face up to the reality of what is happening today.

In addition to that, the substitute proposal is, of course, inconsistent with what is going on at Quetico, and it brings back the use of snowmobiling, a use which has been banned for over 2 years. While that may constitute a greater use and demand, we still have adequate areas for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, the map behind us is, I believe, the map we ought to be looking at, rather than this other map. Sure it is true only 92 percent of the lakes in this area permit motor use of 1,100-plus lakes; however, these 92 lakes constitute 98 percent of the waters of the current motor lakes which are in question. This proposal eliminates the flexibility that the Secretary of Agriculture has and needs to manage the BWCA effectively and superimposes an inflexible, impossible requirement for recreation and timber management which result in a simply unworkable proposal that deserves to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Chairman, let me just respond to one further thing. The use is changing. The first time I went up there was in 1949. Bill Rom was the only canoe outfitter in Ely for a number of years. I traveled for 8 days in 1949 and I saw no one else except one other canoe party. I am not offended by the motorboat users. I am offended by all of the people using it. I wish it was back in 1949 and I could go out there and see only one other canoeist. But so many people have found it, and they are going to share it. We cannot go back to the past. Now, a permit system limits the canoes because of the pressure on campsites. That is a change. There are a number of outfitters now.

More changes will evolve over a period of time. I image there are some resorts which cater to motorboat people will cater more and more to canoeists as time goes on. The question is, Should that evolve as time goes on, or should we make a decision now on these lakes ourselves?

I would suggest, on the lakes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR), suggests be permitted open now, anytime in the future the Congress can always pass a different law if it becomes compatible to the use desired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Yes; it is the committee approach that seeks the evolution rather than not coming to terms at all with the problem that one and all agree is creating great difficulties in the area. Simply stated, there is only one canoe wilderness area in the United States of America, and that is in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. Further, currently there is conflict between more people wanting to use this very limited and unique resource than a permit system which has been installed can permit. So the simple question of motorized use is as follows: Should we not permit the canoeists some exclusive area of use during summer months, and should we not provide in the nonsummer months, where the conflict is less than in the summer months, as does the full committee bill, as will be amended, an extension of time on some lakes to the year 2000?

Should we not approach this matter as I described it? There is no one that contends other than the fact that more people want to use this fragile resource than can be permitted to use it. There is no one who contends that motorized use, summer and winter, can be used on 97 percent of the lakes in Minnesota. We are only saying that, in this exclusive, unique, sole Boundary Waters Canoe Area, the only one in the country, we should provide a tilt to the use of that quiet, majestic area.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman talks about the changing nature of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. In 1949, at the time our colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE), mentioned there were 50,000 visitor days in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. Today there is over 1 million. The percentage of motor use has remained about the same. About 40 percent of the area is motorized. That motor use has not had an adverse impact on the waters and waterways. In fact, the Forest Service continually monitors the water quality and it has found no adverse effects on those waterways. But the effect on the land is not from the motor user because he is essentially a day visitor in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

It is the overnight camper, the canoeist, who goes out into the area and stays there for a week; it is he who has had the greatest effect on the land, the fragile land. Therefore, by allowing some motor use, we are, in effect, lessening the impact on the land while making no impact on the waters.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, in the remaining time I have left, I would like to observe something which has virtually not been discussed at all. Virtually the entire Oberstar proposal, about 98 percent, restores full-blown snowmobiling where it has been banned for the last couple of years. There has been no discussion of that.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues who have been observing the course of this legislation must admit that if there are any deficiencies—and no piece of legislation is perfect—in this very balanced piece of legislation, as I categorize it, the way to treat that is by amending the particular committee proposal that has been worked on for months and not to take a single blunderbuss amendment that does a great deal more than that which has been particularly described, about which reasonable people can be in some disagreement.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would urge my colleagues to reject the Oberstar substitute and deal with the really narrow fact areas as we understand them, as a matter of substance, between the committee bill and that which those Members with some great concern have separated into other areas, and not throw the whole bill out with provisions in it that most of the Members could not possibly understand the impact of.

Rather, Mr. Chairman, if the judgment is made that the full committee bill is not perfect, then we ought to be amending it in most discreet terms, if at all.

Mr. Chairman, I will make one final commentary. In the interest of accommodation, respecting the confidential nature of colleagues' relations one with the other, we have moved a good deal further toward compromise than I would have preferred—and further than useful or desirable.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR).

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with the point the gentleman just raised about snowmobile use.

My substitute would allow snowmobiles to be used on those lakes indicated on the map of the substitute. It is a substantial reduction, we think, from the snowmobile use that was allowed before the ban of Secretary Butz of snowmobiles. This area is 40 below zero in the wintertime. It is quite, still, deep, cold. Anybody who wants to go out in 40 below zero weather with a snowmobile, I say, God bless him. Let him go.

Mr. Chairman, what are we reserving the land for when we ban the snowmobile, for the winter skiers?

Let us see how many winter skiers there were. Last year, in January, 1977, there were 220 visitors to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. I think there were probably Forest Rangers going out to see what was going on.

In February, there were 371; March, 139.

The skiers, the resort people tell me, want the resort operators to go out with their snowmobiles and groom a trail so that they can go out there and have a nice, clean unmolested trip about 2 or 3 miles into the woods. They do not have to break the trail themselves in that case. They do not have to bust through the snow drifts. They come out there, and it is all nice and neat for them; but even then, they have not given the area very much use.

Should we ban snowmobiles and just lock up the area and take away 40 percent of the winter business of the resorts?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will admit that there has been no snowmobiling at all during the last couple of years; is that not correct?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I just stated that it was banned, and look at what happened. Nobody is using it.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. As I understand, the total usable days for snowmobiling during the season in which it was last used, which was either 2 or 3 years ago, were 10,000 for the whole year; and every single day on which anybody used it during that period counted as a visitor day.

Mr. OBERSTAR. It is a very minimal use, so I am saying, why cannot that minimal use continue? It is a very small impact but very big for resort operators and outfitters who are dependent upon it, and for local people who enjoy the winter access to the BWCA.

My point is that the total use is small; the area so large that there is room for both the snowmobiler and the skier.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, as a skier myself I can tell the Members one thing, that it is an abomination to cross-country skiers. The last thing they want to use is a snowmobile track because the character of the track made by the treads is unsuitable for use by skiers.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Yes, but the trails are groomed. The snowmobile goes out and breaks the trail, and carries a little bedspring behind it so that it breaks it up for the skiers.

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is true, but is the gentleman saying that the snowmobile use he now is advocating is solely for the purpose of grooming ski trails?

Mr. OBERSTAR. The gentleman missed the point I made earlier. When the cross-country skiers come to the resorts up there and want to use the area for cross-country skiing, they ask the resorters, "Couldn't you break the trail for me with the snowmobiles?"

We would be glad to have the gentleman come up and use it. We have 800 miles of area he can go cross-country skiing in. He is welcome.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I think there are two types of skiing. One is when one goes on a prepared trail, if that is what the gentleman is talking about. There is also the kind of cross-country skiing in which the skier does not want a trail. He wants the experience of going through the untrammeled snow, and the only place he can get that is away from snowmobiles.

Mr. KETCHUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KETCHUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would have to say that I am somewhat in favor of the gentleman's arguments. Cross-country skiing is a lot of fun; downhill skiing is a lot of fun. Usually, those individuals who participate in those sports are at least fairly physically fit—not in all cases, but most of the time. We have an awful lot of handicapped individuals; we have individuals who have physical problems; we have senior citizens who certainly ought to have the opportunity to view this magnificence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KETCHUM. It would seem to me that by precluding this use, we would be denying that area to a rather substantial number of our citizens, as we have done in many other bills that have come before this body recently.

Mr. OBERSTAR. The gentleman makes a very valid point, and for the reasons the gentleman has cited, Minnesota handicapped groups have supported my bill. The Minnesota Federation of Senior Citizens supported my bill on those very grounds. The Minnesota Veterans Association sponsors an annual fishing trip. They would be denied because they take their boats from the Veterans Hospital in Minnesota to the wilderness area to go fishing, and they would be denied under this proposition. There is a little gesture in the committee bill to provide for these citizens, but not much more than that.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. I am sure my colleague from California would not think it unduly immodest of me to observe that he and I share a great deal of concern for the elderly and handicapped. I have been pushing the Department generally, and do intend to produce effective policy to the end that these experiences are made more relevant to those with physical handicaps.

I assure the gentleman that I shall be as determined in producing that service-wide result, if you will, as I am in most matters. I know my colleague from California would not want to dispute my self-proclaimed credentials in that respect.

Mr. KETCHUM. There is probably no one in this body who has more respect and empathy with senior citizens and handicapped individuals than the gentleman from California, to be sure. I would state that the gentleman from California is not a skier, to my knowledge. He is one of the great outdoorsmen from San Francisco.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) whether he has a full-blown substitute which this committee will take up later on?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, we have several amendments, 85 percent of which in terms of scope merely are necessary once we made the judgment to eliminate the national recreation area, a judgment that I reluctantly reached because of the great misunderstanding it was producing in terms of some of the debate on the legislation. The balance of our amendments would bring into closer conformity our bill with the Oberstar bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. But if there is a 27-page substitute, is that what we are ultimately going to vote on?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. I am representing to the gentleman the changes which will be made in the amendments.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman.

I yield further to the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, as in any representative body people make estimates as to which gives their side a preferred option. We have further decided to eliminate the nonissues, as I mentioned in my initial presentation, to establish up to the year 2000 in some instances and in the year 2010 in others the continued motorized use of certain lakes and lake chains and to increase the available horsepower.

All of these amendments—and I represent this as a person who gives and keeps his word and speaks with clarity as well as truth—tend to scratch, if you will, some of the potential nonissues and are an accommodation or gesture, if you will, to those who have asserted that our bill is too strong.

Mr. FRENZEL. Is the gentleman going to ask us to vote on this substitute when we are through here?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. If the gentleman wants a rollcall, he can certainly get it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Is that the parliamentary situation, that we are going to set aside this bill?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. No. No. The gentleman from California is merely determined that this issue—which lamentably in a few instances has not been characterized as accurately as it might have been—be put in its maximum positive possible condition for the Members to consider.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his 27-page accommodation and for his 4-minute description of it, but I must say I still do not have it clearly in mind.

I would like to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR). Can the gentleman shape the parliamentary situation for me?

Mr. OBERSTAR. I would attempt to do so.

Mr. FRENZEL. I would appreciate it.

Mr. OBERSTAR. But to scrutinize the response of the gentleman from California I would say this.

Mr. FRENZEL. I have had all the scrutiny I can take. I would just like to know what we are going to do today.

Mr. OBERSTAR. The parliamentary situation is very difficult. I intend to offer my substitute for the committee bill. However, in the parliamentary situation, the committee may offer a substitute to my substitute. I have no idea as to what the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) is going to do.

I have no idea or way of knowing what the gentleman is going to do. Whether he intends to read the bill section by section, offer the committee amendments, and at the end of which time I would then offer my substitute or whether he would allow me to offer my substitute first and then a substitute for the substitute.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his description.

Mr. Chairman, I have one further question to ask the gentleman.

There are a number of lakes on which motorized travel is allowed. In the border section, on several lakes, namely Basswood, Lac La Croix, and Saganaga Lake, there is also motorized use on the Canadian side, is that correct?

Mr. OBERSTAR. That is correct. The gentleman has described Lac La Croix and Saganaga Lake on the east end.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me the additional time.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to yield further because I do not seem to be having very much luck with my questioning, but I do thank the gentleman from Minnesota for that information.

I would restate the point that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) made about the use of motorized travel. Most motorized use in that area does not find its way into the Government statistics. Therefore when you talk about x percent of this and x percent of that, it may not mean anything because there is simply no record.

It is also true that the load factor in the area is canoeing. They keep a record of the number of entries into the Boundary Waters Canoe Area and there are only a certain number permitted. On any given sunny summer weekend the quotas are exhausted and then people are not allowed to go in. And the allowed amount of density is not going to change whether or not we allow motorboats on the lake. It is not going to prevent any traffic jams. We are still not going to be able to allow everybody who wants to go on a canoeing trip to go in there. That situation will not change at all.

The other question that was raised by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) was with reference to a poll that was taken. I believe the gentleman was talking about a private poll commissioned for himself or in his behalf. The last public poll we saw on this was the Minnesota poll done by the Minneapolis Tribune and that indicated almost an even split in the State.

The even split was almost the case in the gentleman's own Democratic convention held last weekend. The convention did not endorse the Fraser position, nor indeed any position.

I think the point the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) has been getting at here—and I must say that he has been a good deal more flexible than those on the other side—is that there is plenty of land, air, and water up there. Whatever the local people need in order to prosper, and whatever the resorts need to prosper and, indeed, whatever people need to enjoy a wilderness experience is available.

But what we have to remember is that in one of those counties there is only 6 percent private ownership of the land. If these resorts go under, or are bought by the Government, the local people cannot afford to run their school districts, or to take care of their snowplowing operations, and there will be practically no valuation left for them.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I will not yield.

Yes, of course, they will get some Federal help.

But an annual Federal stipend will not build jobs. And most people in that area want jobs and property valuations rather than a handout from Uncle Sam.

The two gentlemen from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR and Mr. FRASER) have done an admirable job in bringing together widely divergent points of view on use of timber in the BWCA. It is my hope that another compromise would be possible on the motorized use issue. Without a compromise, I fear there will be no law passed this year.

Therefore, although I probably started closer to the Fraser position than to the Oberstar position, I will support the Oberstar substitute as the best means of getting a bill this year. By adding permanent motorized use on a few border lakes—where the Canadians allow such use already, and by adding a few peripheral lakes, I think a good compromise bill can be put together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I respect our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL), for his studied attention to matters legislative. As the gentleman knows full well, on Saganaga Lake—as I pronounce it, and I guess I probably mispronounce it—motorized use is permitted until the year 2010.

This legislation, as I would hope the gentleman would stipulate, reconciles as best one can differences in points of view with our primary yardstick being a recognition that too many people want to use the resources. We are trying to give some tilt to the canoe wilderness experience in this magnificently beautiful part of our country.

With reference to the substitute bill for our bill, which I think will stand the light of scrutiny, section by section, were it to be amended section by section, I would have no problem at all but if we are going to deal with sweeping, up or down, amendments, then it is our judgment that the committee bill, being the one that has been worked on, should be the first one the membership has an opportunity to express an opinion on.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to take issue with the statistics and the fallacy of the statistics. It is true some motorized use is now included.

The use of motors on lakes and on the periphery is opened up permanently under the compromise proposal that has been put forth by the subcommittee. The use statistics for going into the interior are absolutely or should be absolutely appropriate, but I make no distinction respecting dishonesty between, for example, motorboat users and canoeists.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. NOLAN).

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Burton-Vento-Fraser committee Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness legislation. The BWCA is our Nation's largest wilderness area east of the Rocky Mountains and our only lakeland canoeing wilderness of its kind. Undoubtedly, it is a resource which must be protected and preserved for all generations.

Motorboats are currently permitted throughout Minnesota; a State which boasts over 13,000 lakes in total. Surely there exist enough lakes suitable for motorboating outside of the BWCA to absorb such a ban as is proposed in the Burton-Vento-Fraser legislation. This holds true for snowmobiles as well. I concur with my colleague from New Jersey, Representative MILLICENT FENWICK, that surely there must be at least one small area in the great State of Minnesota which can be preserved for the individual who relishes, indeed cherishes an outing which does not involve in the least the internal combustion engine.

The Boundary Waters Canoe Area is truly a magnificent national treasure in urgent need of the protection afforded it by the Burton-Vento-Fraser Committee bill. I strongly urge its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12250 and those amendments offered by my colleagues from Minnesota, Mr. FRASER, Mr. VENTO, and myself. It is my conviction this legislation and package of amendments serves to accommodate the concerns voiced by individuals in and around the BWCA area.

Still another point which should be spoken to is the question of accessibility to this area by handicapped individuals. The argument has been made that to designate the BWCA as a wilderness area would be to effectively exclude by inaccessibility the handicapped and senior citizens who also enjoy the pristine beauty of this truly unique canoe area. I do not hold this to be true.

I should like to briefly decribe an organization whose expressed mission is to provide access to such wilderness areas to the handicapped. This organization calls itself the Wilderness Inquiry II and is one of three affiliate groups under the parent organization, the Wilderness Inquiry Association. Wilderness Inquiry II is designed to meet the recreational needs of the handicapped by providing access into such areas. It is intended that such excursions may be employed to assist handicapped individuals in coping with their disabilities by using the Wilderness as a means of developing self-confidence in themselves.

In August of 1977, a pilot trip was run in the BWCA. The group included two paraplegics and two deaf-mutes and four other individuals experienced in wilderness camping. Only one of the disabled individuals had ever been on an extended canoe trip. In the course of the trip, the group experienced rapids, beaver dams; it rained 3 out of 4 days and on the third night, strong winds up-staked their tent and soaked their gear. Nonetheless, humor prevailed and, at trip's end, each participant agreed many more excursions would be in order. Said one participant,

> . . . Perhaps if things had gone more smoothly, if the group's leaders had functioned more or less as tour guides, the trip would have been less enjoyable . . .

Mr. Chairman, the BWCA is our Nation's largest wilderness area east of the Rockies and our only lakeland canoe wilderness area—motors are permitted throughout the rest of the State of Minnesota as are snowmobiles. The BWCA is a truly magnificent treasure in urgent need of protection. Perhaps if enjoying the area becomes too easy and outings occur more smoothly, excursions into the Boundary Waters Canoe Area may be less enjoyable.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Boundary Waters Wilderness proposal (H.R. 12250), and I commend the chairman of the National Parks Subcommittee (Mr. PHIL BURTON) and the gentlemen from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO and Mr. FRASER) for their work on this proposal. The controversy over the use and designation of the Minnesota Boundary Waters dates from the beginning of this century, and the enactment of this legislation would settle once and for all the issues of logging, mining, and motorboat use in this area.

In fact, this legislation, with the amendments offered by the gentlemen from Minnesota—Mr. FRASER, Mr. VENTO, and Mr. NOLAN—makes several concessions to local residents, resort owners, and the logging industry, the groups which expressed the most serious reservations about the wilderness proposal.

A proposed national recreation area, which would have been established along three road corridors dividing the Boundary Waters Wilderness into three parts, would be eliminated from the bill by these amendments. In lieu of the protections against unregulated development which would have been provided by a NRA, the amendment would establish a mining protection area, which would prohibit mineral development activities along these three corridors. However, logging would continue to be allowed in these corridors, and commercial development could continue without restriction.

I think this represents a major concession to local residents and timber interests, since development and recreational activities in areas adjacent to the proposed wilderness area will serious impact on the wilderness.

Similarly, allowing the permanent use of motorboats on the lakes bordering the Boundary Waters Canoe Area is another major concession. since many of these lakes offer the only access to major canoe routes in the wilderness. The use of motorboats in the proposed Boundary Waters Wilderness is the major point of disagreement over this legislation. I want to point out some interesting statistics prepared by the Forest Service on the recreational use of this area, to illustrate the extent to which this legislation accommodates the interests of those who want continued motorboat use in the boundary waters.

According to the Forest Service's survey of BWCA use for 1977, 60 percent of all visitors to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area were paddle canoeists. Motorboaters and motor canoeists accounted for only 35.7 percent of the visitors to the boundary waters, and only 27 percent of the visitor days. Less than 15 percent of the motorboaters for 1977 were local residents. Nonetheless, motorboats are currently permitted on 60 percent of the water surface in the BWCA.

The Boundary Waters is the only designated canoe area wilderness in the Nation, the only recreational area where canoeists can go to escape the sound and interference of motorboats, and experience wilderness first hand. On the other hand, motorboats have hundreds of places to go outside the wilderness on an unrestricted basis. There are 11,000 lakes in Minnesota open to motorboat use, including 2,800 lakes in the northeastern section of the State.

Despite these opportunities for motorboat recreation outside of the BWCA, the legislation before us today would allow continued motorboat use on a permanent basis on 12 percent of the lakes, and would allow continued use on several lakes for periods from 5 to 25 years, under the Fraser-Vento-Nolan amendments. In fact, under H.R. 12250, 40 percent of all current motorboat use would continue until the year 2000. The Oberstar substitute, on the other hand, would allow continued motorboat use permanently on 58 percent of the BWCA water surface, representing only a 2-percent reduction in the area of water open to motorboat use. Considering the unique attraction of the BWCA as the only designated canoe wilderness in the country, the continued use of motorboats on the interior lakes would not only affect the enjoyment of visitors who come to the BWCA to canoe, but would also be detrimental to the qualities of this area which distinguished it as a national recreation area visited by thousands of Americans each year.

H.R. 12250 would strengthen current management of the Boundary Waters Area by putting into the law a permanent prohibition against the use of snowmobiles in the wilderness area. Congress created an exemption for the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in 1964, and allowed snowmobile use in this wilderness area despite the fact that such use is prohibited by law in all other wilderness areas. The Forest Service instituted a snowmobile ban by regulation in 1976, and this legislation would make that ban permanent. To allow snowmobile use, as would be provided in the Oberstar bill, would set a serious precedent not only for the BWCA, but for other existing and future wilderness areas.

The Burton-Vento bill does allow for snowmobile use along the corridors which provide necessary access to the Canadian side of the boundary waters. But other uses of snowmobiles in the BWCA would be for recreational purposes, and for recreational users there are more than 6,000 miles of snowmobile trails outside the BWCA. The Boundary Waters Canoe Area is the only winter wilderness area in the Midwest, and there are increasing numbers of winter visitors who come to cross-country ski or snowshoe in the wilderness because they know they will not encounter snowmobiles.

This quality must be preserved by adopting the permanent snowmobile ban provided in H.R. 12250.

Mr. Chairman, I support this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to vote for its passage to establish a wilderness area in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. The Boundary Waters is the largest wilderness area east of the Rockies—over 1 million acres of beautiful lake-studded terrain—and it is the only canoe wilderness area in the entire Nation. It contains the largest block of virgin timber stands in the Eastern United States, and represents the last northeastern ecosystem which contains the whole spectrum of native wildlife—including timber wolves, moose, and bald eagles. The Boundary Waters Canoe Area offers unique educational, recreational, and natural values which cannot be restored once civilization encroaches on its boundaries. We owe it to ourselves and future generations to preserve this area in its wild and natural state.

A wilderness experience such as one might find in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area is not something which can easily be described. Sigurd Olsen, who is considered the poet laureate of the Boundary Waters, and the most eloquent proponent of preserving it as a wilderness area, said in a recent interview that when people go into the wilderness today, they are looking for spiritual values and inspiration which are almost impossible to define. In wilderness, such seekers can find a rejuvenation of the spirit, and a sense of harmony and oneness with all living things. The preservation of this spirit is one goal of the Boundary Waters Wilderness bill, and I urge my colleagues to vote for the passage of this important legislation.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. MARLENEE).

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Chairman, have you ever seen a wheelchair in a canoe? Have you ever seen a paraplegic out 15 miles on a lake without a motor? Have you ever seen an elderly person with a heart condition 15 miles out on a lake without a motor? No, Mr. Chairman. The wilderness advocates are narrow in this design and are unyielding in this. Past experience tells us that.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. HAGEDORN).

Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Chairman, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area is the second largest natural wilderness area in the Nation, and the largest this side of the Rocky Mountains. It abounds in beautiful and scenic lakes and streams, untouched and secluded forest lands, and miles of quiet canoe routes. It is an area in which a person can still experience a measure of genuine solitude. The BWCA is a natural resource important to Minnesota and important to the Nation.

Since its inclusion in 1964 in the national wilderness preservation system, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area has been the focus of intense controversy with respect to the uses to be permitted within it. The purpose of H.R. 12250 is to finally resolve this issue.

It is more important to understand what is not at issue today than what is. During the course of the past several years, there have been numerous versions of BWCA legislation, each permitting a slightly different variety of uses, and each encompassing slightly different boundaries. Most of the major subjects of initial controversy have been resolved through compromise by both sides.

Logging is no longer at issue. Both the committee bill, and the Oberstar substitute would prohibit logging within the wilderness, and provide funds to develop alternate logging resources outside of the BWCA.

Mining is no longer at issue. The exploration for mineral resources is prohibited in both the committee bill, and the Oberstar substitute.

The wilderness designation of the BWCA is no longer at issue. Both the committee bill, and the Oberstar substitute would classify as "wilderness" the entire BWCA.

What is at issue, Mr. Chairman, is the extent to which the people who have lived all of their lives in the BWCA and vicinity are going to be permitted to retain a semblance of their life-style. These people, who have suddenly been labeled as "threats to the wilderness," have preserved the BWCA lands for generations. They have maintained its paths; they have repaired it after fires; and they have diligently conserved and preserved its unique resources.

I am talking about the people who own small resorts, the outfitters, the small storekeepers, and the support personnel dependent upon these businesses. These are the villains in the mythology of the professional environmentalists.

The Oberstar substitute, by permitting recreational motorboating in a small percentage of the lakes within the BWCA, would allow these individuals to continue to earn an honest living while doing nothing to despoil the BWCA environment. It is only those, for whom man himself is an intruder in the environment, that such limited recreational use would represent an infringement upon the environment. The substitute would actually reduce total motorboat usage within the BWCA by 25 percent from what is legally permitted today, with much of the motorboat usage likely to remain in the peripheral lakes of the BWCA.

If the committee bill is approved, those whose livelihood depends upon the BWCA, will be forced to dispose of their property at what is likely to be a significant loss. The supported fair market value that these people will receive will in no way compensate them for the goodwill that they and their parents and grandparents have developed over the years, and will in no way compensate them for the disruption that will be caused to their lives.

I have the greatest respect for those hardy enough to ski cross-country through the BWCA, or to trek it or canoe it. I would never support anything that I believed would diminish the value of these experiences. It is clear, however, that a substantial number of visitors to the BWCA are not quite so rugged, with travel by motorized water vehicles representing well over one-third of all BWCA travel by visitors.

The denial of access to the BWCA for these people far outweighs, in my opinion, the miniscule, largely psychological advantages that might accrue to those individuals who remain to use the BWCA. It is interesting to note, in this respect, the exceptionally diverse group of Minnesota organizations which recognize this, and have endorsed the Oberstar language.

It is endorsed by the AFL–CIO in the State, the Minnesota Chamber of Commerce, the Minnesota Senior Citizens Federation, veterans' groups, numerous city councils throughout the State, and by handicapped groups concerned that their members will totally be denied access to the BWCA.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support for the Oberstar substitute. Better than any any other proposed language, it represents a fair and decent compromise, recognizing both the irreplaceability of the resources of the BWCA, and the irreplaceability of the life-styles of the residents of the BWCA.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAGEDORN. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, everything the gentleman says would be so true if these were the only lakes in Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. HAGEDORN) has expired.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, in the heat of all of the discussions, I think that most of us here would admit that some kind of a bill is necessary. Most of us would like to see a bill pass. I think, however, some of our experience with recent legislation, notably the Alaska bill, leads me to believe that when we pass an extreme measure over to the other body, it lies over there and we do not have legislation.

It is hard for me to judge between the Fraser version and the Oberstar version. I have the advantage over many members of this committee in that I have been up there. I have seen some of these lakes and know the area a little bit but it is difficult for me to make that decision, too.

It seems to me that if we pass the committee version that we are simply not going to have a bill. Then this matter will come up again and again. I think that is not a responsible way to work. We ought to try to develop some kind of reasonable compromise.

For that reason, while I agree the Oberstar compromise is not perfect, nor maybe even close to it, it seems to me it is a version that would get Senate attention and therefore could become law. For that reason I will support the Oberstar compromise, even though it may be less than perfect.

There are a lot of things about this area that many of the members of this committee do not understand. One really has to be there to see them. In the peripheral lakes where people have been using these areas, where these resort investments developed, it seems to me to be unfair and unwise not to let the motorized use continue. I do not know if the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) has put too much use in or too little, but I am going to support it as the most responsible opportunity.

I believe that a couple of border lakes, Basswood Saganaga, and La Croix, and a couple of peripheral lakes with a history of use and development like Seagull and Isabella, could be added to the bill for permanent motorized use. That would not jeopardize the wilderness in any significant amount, but it would be of great assistance to the local people.

But, if the committee bill is pushed through, there will be little chance for compromise. I will vote for it in any case, because I think it is necessary to keep the bill's chances alive. It is important that we have a BWCA bill this year.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a very good discussion. It has been ably led by Members who know far more than I do about this area.

I have concluded—and I am going to stick with my conclusion—that the committee bill, with a few additional amendments, is the route I chose to go, even though I have to acknowledge that all these fine arguments are good.

I find myself a little like the Governor of Minnesota when he testified before our committee. He talked about one side of the issue, and then he talked about the other side, but he did not seem to come to a conclusion. I said to him, "Mr. Governor, it sounds as though some of your friends are for it and some of your friends are against it, and you are with your friends."

Mr. Chairman, I have a lot of friends on both sides here, but I intend to support the committee bill if the amendments that are going to be offered to it are adopted.

I urge all the Members to make their own judgment on everything that takes place, because this bill is very important. I am very sorry that we could not have had better attendance during the general debate, because all the Members who have participated in it have done a very fine job.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend all the Members who were involved in this debate. The gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON), who is in a very difficult situation, has performed admirably, and the committee has produced a very fine compromise bill.

One of the toughest jobs any Member of Congress ever has is when he has to make a decision on a project in his own district, and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) has performed very magnificently since he has been faced with this very heavy responsibility. The gentleman is a serious, valuable legislator, and it pains me not to be able to agree with him on his substitute amendment and in the major fight we are going to have on this issue.

Mr. Chairman, all the gentlemen from Minnesota, a State which seems to produce so many great political leaders, have acquitted themselves well. I think the debate this afternoon has been valuable, and I am sure the House will make a wise decision.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness Act, H.R. 12250. This beautiful area of northwestern Minnesota has been the focus of debate for many years, and failure to take decisive action now may threaten this unique natural treasure.

At the present time, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, with just over 1 million acres, is the largest unit of the National Wilderness System east of the Rocky Mountains. More importantly, it is the Nation's only lakeland canoe wilderness. The BWCA is a network of more than 1,000 lakes connected by numerous streams and portages. For most of this century, battles have been fought to protect this fragile environment. In 1964, Congress enacted the Wilderness Act, including the BWCA in the newly created wilderness system. Many of the problems we are trying to solve today arise from a paragraph in the Wilderness Act that permitted logging and motorboating to continue in the BWCA, uses prohibited in other wilderness areas.

Since passage of the Wilderness Act, conflicts over the use of the BWCA have steadily increased, particularly in the State of Minnesota. Numerous court suits have been brought to prohibit various activities in the wilderness; the State legislature has wrestled with the problem in regard to its holdings within the BWCA. I think it should be quite clear by now that this controversy cannot and should not be resolved in the courts—Congress must take responsibility for this important decision.

H.R. 12250, of which I am a cosponsor, represents a compromise that balances the wilderness values of this area and the competing uses of the land in a reasonable way. It establishes a Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness, made up of the present BWCA and several additions on the periphery. In addition, a large national recreational area is created, encompassing the three access corridors currently dividing the BWCA.

This compromise bill allows the BWCA to be used by as many people as possible, and as many different uses as possible, while protecting the unique ecology that makes this resource so valuable. Admittedly, this may not go as far as some would like, but I believe it achieves a proper balance. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to vote favorably on H.R. 12250.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER).

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the committee bill and in opposition to the amendment in the nature of a substitute to be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR). The Boundary Waters Canoe Area is an important national asset which deserves the protection, in the interests of the entire country, that the committee seeks to afford.

The legislation as reported by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has been thoroughly thought through, and it simply does not as some would allege constitute a major Federal deprivation of property rights or a "locking up" of lands and lakes preventing public access.

It does not block all access by motorboats from the lakes in the BWCA. It does restrict their use in some areas, in which they would intrude themselves into the quietude of the only wilderness in the country dedicated specifically to canoeing. Moreover, there are thousands of lakes in the region, and a great many of them are, and will remain, available for use by motorboats.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) would freeze into law the existing motorboat usage, whereas the legislation prepared by Messrs. FRASER, VENTO, and NOLAN (also from Minnesota) protects the canoeist's interest and the motorboater's interest, by providing adequate areas for both.

Further, the amendments which Mr. FRASER and his associates will offer shortly will increase—over what the committee bill provides—the continued usage of 41 percent of present motorized use from now through 1984. Given the incredible number of lakes accessible to motorboat users—both within and outside the boundaries of the BWCA—this seems to me eminently fair.

In sum, the legislation now before us, with the amendments to be offered by Mr. NOLAN, Mr. VENTO, and Mr. FRASER, deserves the overwhelming support of the House. The substitute should be voted down and the committee bill and amendments should be approved.

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 12250, a measure which provides further wilderness protection to the Nation's only lakeland canoe wilderness—the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in northern Minnesota. One area of continued controversy seems to be whether or not motorized travel should be allowed to continue in the BWCA and I would like to address my comments to this dispute today.

While I regret I have not had the opportunity to experience the BWCA personally, it may interest my colleagues to know that about 12 percent of all BWCA users are residents of Illinois. In 1974 alone, over 19,000 Illinoisians traveled to the BWCA and approximately 63 percent of these users explored the area without motorboats or snowmobiles, preferring instead to paddle a canoe, snowshoe, hike or cross-country ski.

It is no wonder then that I have received so much mail from my constituents in favor of this bill. One letter in particular helped me to realize the vast differences between the areas where motorized travel is prohibited and where it is allowed. Thomas Burgener of Freeport, Ill., has visited the BWCA a number of times, and he wrote that the difference between these two areas is like "night and day."

> In the paddle only areas I dipped a cupful of water anywhere and anytime I wanted; in the motor areas I could hardly force myself to drink . . . The water was rainbow-colored from oil. It smelled and carried sediment stirred up by propellers. Around the shoreline of campsites, there was often trash in the water.

Mr. Burgener went on to discuss the conditions of campsites:

> The campsites in the motor areas were heavily used; grass was nonexistent, the dirt was either hard-packed or dusty. Despite the container laws, there was an abundance of pop tops and bottle caps. There was always paper litter. In one site a fisherman who apparently didn't want his catch disposed of it under a bush. In contrast, the campsite in paddle-only waters, while they showed use, certainly weren't worn out. And I never, repeat, never found litter.

Mr. Chairman, presently, 72 percent of the BWCA's users are canoe enthusiasts while at least 60 percent of the BWCA's water surface remains open to motorized travel. If enacted, this compromise legislation will reserve most of the BWCA's lakes for canoeists—only about 6 percent of the 15,000 lakes in Minnesota. I think my colleagues would agree with me that there are enough lakes in Minnesota to accommodate just about every type of vessel a person can dream up for his or her recreation pleasure.

With this in mind, I believe the members of the Interior Committee have made every effort to strike a reasonable balance between adequate wilderness protection and motor usage. I believe the concerns and interests of the surrounding communities have been fully considered and dealt with fairly. In fact, if the amendments package offered by my colleagues Mr. FRASER, Mr. VENTO, and Mr. NOLAN is accepted, with only two minor exceptions every resort bordering the wilderness will be allowed continued motor usage of at least 10 horsepower and in some cases up to 25 horsepower on the lake on which it is located. Motorized access is continued, by road and water, for every single existing private home or cabin on the BWCA periphery. Further, a number of my constituents expressed concern that parts of the very popular Lake Vermillion might be included in the BWCA. These small areas have been deleted from the BWCA to eliminate fears that motorboat or snowmobile use on the lake might be affected by this bill. By passage of the amendments package, further concessions will be made to those who utilize motors—about 41 percent of the present motorboat use will be allowed to continue in the BWCA until 1984, compared to the committee bill which would allow only about 35 percent to continue.

In short, Mr. Chairman, I believe the interests of motorboaters have been adequately considered in the bill and I urge its adoption.●

● Mr. McCLORY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12250, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness. The BWCA should be kept open to all of the public and I feel the legislation we are debating here today accomplishes this goal by balancing the need to provide for the interests of the people who live and work in the BWCA with those of the people who enjoy the BWCA as a yearly vacation area and wish it to remain an undeveloped wilderness area. Several areas of the BWCA are set aside for those who wish to enjoy such outdoor sports as motorboating and snowmobiling, while other areas have been kept for those who wish to enjoy canoeing, camping, and hiking.

Mr. Chairman, many of my constituents enjoy spending hours and days of peaceful retreat in this area, one of our last remaining unspoiled wilderness treasures, and I hope the majority of my colleagues in this body will join me in support of this worthwhile legislation.●

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my support to the so-called Burton-Vento version of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area bill. As you know, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area is the only lakeland canoe area in the Nation, providing an ideal environment for canoe enthusiasts and fishermen alike. And since this area is unique to the Nation, it attracts visitors from all over the country who wish to admire and use this wilderness area.

Since its creation in 1964 as a primitive wilderness area, this area of northeastern Minnesota has come under considerable legal challenge concerning the use of outboard motors, ski mobiles, access to lakes and resorts, and timber cutting. This bill seeks to put an end to this drawnout litigation and attempts to create a balance between reasonable access to the area by canoeists and allowing the resorts to stay in operation or be bought out by the Federal Government at fair market value.

It is not only a bill that would benefit the people of northeastern Minnesota, but would benefit all Americans who wish to have the enjoyment of canoeing through an area unobstructed and overdeveloped by commercial interests.●

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill and briefly would like to point out some of the primary reasons for my enthusiastic support.

In 1964, this Congress approved a measure which included the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in our Wilderness System. We have the chance to finish our work today and bring this area a little closer to the intent of the Congress at that time and the true definition of wilderness. The two most critical differences in the amended committee bill and the Oberstar substitute surround the usage of motorboats and snowmobiles. Many people have voiced their concern over the elderly and handicapped who will not be able to enjoy this wonderful area unless they are allowed to use motorboats. On the contrary, these people support an unmechanized wilderness system. Local motorboaters, within a 75-mile radius of this area, account for only 7 percent of the total BWCA users. There are over 11,000 lakes in Minnesota outside this area for motorboaters to vacation on. There is only one Boundary Waters Canoe Area. This amended bill allocates 15 percent of the water area of our Nation's only canoeing wilderness to motorboat use for 22 more years. Personally, I believe this is more than generous considering Lake Superior is right next door for motorboat use.

When this Congress approved the Boundary Waters Canoe Area bill in 1964, to be included in the Wilderness System, that is exactly what we meant—wilderness. No snowmobiles are allowed in any wilderness system, and 2 years ago they were banned within BWCA. We are adding 50,000 more acres to the BWCA, most of which incidently is federally owned. It seems ridiculous to allow snowmobiling to occur if we really want to protect this precious area as wilderness for future generations.

Finally, I would like to say one quick thing about the effect this bill will have on the local economy. Whenever we consider "environmental" legislation here on the floor, there are those who inevitably say that this particular measure will have an adverse effect on business. This could not be further from the truth. In fact, this bill will be a boon to the local economy. This is the only exclusive canoe area in our Nation. More folks have not used the BWCA in the past because of motorboaters than people who do not use this area because of canoeists. Enthusiastic canoeists will happily vacation in the beautiful and pristine waterways of the State of Minnesota if we act accordingly and protect this area. In addition, this bill specifically provides financial and technical assistance to merchants and resort owners to make the needed adjustments for the different clientele.

I applaud the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs for their work on this legislation. I hope my colleagues will overwhelmingly vote in favor of this bill.

Thank you.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the proposal we are now considering, with the modifications proposed by the gentlemen from Minnesota (Messrs. FRASER, VENTO, and NOLAN). Mr. Chairman, the proposal reflects several significant concessions made by the sponsors of the proposal, along with the members of the Interior Committee, in an attempt to limit the so-called economic disruptions that may result from this conservation proposal. The proposal reflects the serious intent of the Congress to eliminate the potential destruction of this pristine wilderness, the largest wilderness east of the Rocky Mountains, and the most heavily visited wilderness in our system. The bill will designate approximately 1.1 million acres as the Boundary Waters Canoe Area Wilderness. This designation will preclude mining and logging in the area. In dispute is the provision of the reported bill, as proposed to be modified by the Fraser, Vento, Nolan amendment, that will limit the use of motorized vehicles such as motorboats and snowmobiles. The limit on these environmentally disruptive vehicles is necessary in order to protect the integrity of this pristine wilderness.

Mr. Chairman, this proposal represents an opportunity for the Congress to finally resolve this 50-year battle over the use of these magnificent lakes. The amendment that is being offered by the three gentlemen from that great State where this wilderness area is to be permanently established, is another compromise of the original proposal. These two significant modifications are designed to resolve the issues in a manner that is both fair and just to the residents of the affected area while still maintaining the wilderness in its natural state. The amendment will still allow for 41 percent of current motorboat usage to continue in the region, until the year 2000. The amendment provides for the continued use of motorboats by resort owners on the lakes on which they are located. However, the amendment also protects the wilderness from the deep intrusions of these noisy "Toys of Man," by limiting the quantity of lakes open to such recreation to 17 percent, serviced by 13 percent of the campsites. This is generous in the light of the available lakes outside of this pristine wilderness that are easily accessible to the motorboat enthusiasts. The region supports roughly 39,500 other lakes, including 2,500 lakes of 10 acres or more in the immediate vicinity of the proposed wilderness, that can be utilized by the motorboat enthusiasts, the wilderness, on the other hand, is the only true sanctuary for the canoeists left in that entire region. Thus, the proposed wilderness will reduce the number of lakes in the State open for motorboats by only 2 percent. Mr. Chairman, that is a small price to pay for such large dividends.

The amendment also attempts to protect the resort owners, with the inclusion of a 3-year program of technical assistance to any resort owner seeking to change over from a motorboat clientele to one oriented to the wilderness. Additionally, the proposal calls for the Government to purchase private properties that are offered for sale, at fair-market prices, at the total discretion of the owners.

The other major point of disagreement that is addressed by the amendment, is the limit on the use of snowmobiles. The proposal that was reported out of the Interior Committee would ban such activities, as it presents a real destructive threat to the wildlife and habitat. The recent studies indicate that the use of snowmobiles is almost entirely limited to the local residents, who find this a convenient mode to assist them in reaching the lakes for winter trout fishing. Again, there are vast areas outside of the proposed wilderness that can be utilized for this purpose. Thus, the committee wisely decided to ban this activity as it was neither necessary nor was it a drawing card for attracting visitors. The ban of these noisy vehicles will allow for the wilderness to exist as undisturbed as possible. Such a ban is consistent with the intent of a wilderness designation.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to conclude with the observation that it is the motorboat and snowmobile enthusiasts who have alternatives readily available to them, not the canoeist or the individual who enjoys the tranquillity and pristine beauty of a true wilderness area. We have an opportunity to preserve this priceless area, an opportunity that may not present itself again. We have weakened the initial proposal twice, we cannot further weaken this landmark proposal and still call it a conservation measure. We must put the preservation of this wilderness ahead of the self-serving desires of a few. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment to be offered by the three gentlemen from Minnesota, it will result in the establishment of a magnificent, national wilderness that can be experienced by all Americans.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.●

● Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12250 which makes changes in the current usage of the Boundary Waters Canoe Area in Minnesota.

I would urge my colleagues to keep in mind as we consider this bill, that while this area has large segments set aside for canoe use only, there are also large areas which have been traditionally reserved for multiple use. While it is my understanding that the mineral and timber issues are no longer in significant dispute, we will be asked to consider provisions which may significantly affect current motorboat usage which relates directly to the continued existence of established resorts and small businesses which depend on the area for their livelihood.

I believe the committee bill was a product of a spirit of compromise but will be improved by amendments regarding increased motor usage and elimination of the National Recreation Area. At the same time, the area reserved for canoe usage will be enlarged to meet increased demand and environmental concerns. I urge my colleagues to support these amendments and to listen carefully to those arguments offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) which would further modify this legislation.●

● Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in enthusiastic support of this boundary waters wilderness legislation, H.R. 12250, a bill which has generated a great deal of interest from all parts of our country—but, particularly from the Midwest whose own wilderness vanished so long ago. I, myself, have witnessed the great amount of interest this issue has generated. People representing both sides of the controversy have spent hours with my staff and me, and constituents from all over my district have written me hundreds of letters.

I believe that the recommendations of the House Interior Committee are based on a careful balancing of all points of view. For this reason I have cosponsored H.R. 12250.

Two days of hearings were held in Minnesota last summer, and 3 days of hearings were convened in Washington in late summer and early fall. At all points during the process, testimony was solicited from all sides. Each of the hearings ran many hours, providing a thorough exposure of the issues involved. In addition, an arrangement was worked out under which the concerns of local residents could be raised directly to the committee—suggestions were made, clarifications presented, questions asked, and amendments offered on their behalf. I think the committee deserves praise for the fairness of its deliberations.

I also believe that the bill itself strikes a reasonable and workable balance between the need to address the legitimate concerns of local residents and the need to protect this unique area for future generations. As the members of the committee have described, the bill contains a number of provisions that should help buffer the impact on local residents.

First, the Fraser-Nolan-Vento amendments have deleted the national recreation area, a provision in the committee bill which many local residents found threatening. Second, the bill and amendments open all or part of 16 lakes in the wilderness to continued motorboat use. Every lake on which there are concentrations of homes and resorts as well as a number of the area's prime fishing lakes is opened to motorboats either permanently or on an extended phaseout basis. Third, the measure authorizes financial and technical assistance to help resorts and other businesses adjust to a more wilderness-oriented clientele. The bill creates a situation in which existing resorts will be in a unique position to appeal to a growing market for edge-of-the-wilderness vacations. They will be located on a lake where motorboats are permitted and yet will lie only one lake away from paddle-only lakes and streams. Fourth, the Secretary of Agriculture is directed by the bill to intensify outdoor recreational programs in the Superior National Forest outside the BWCA; the committee report mentions such programs as completing unfinished snowmobile trails, constructing additional campsites on popular lakes, improving lake access sites, and building new parking facilities. The Department is also authorized to construct a new system of hiking trails in the BWCA, particularly in locations where existing resorts might benefit.

Just as the bill takes into account the concerns of the local communities, it also sets out a plan for management that enhances the wilderness character of the Boundary Waters. It calls for a prohibition on mining and logging, goals on which all parties are now agreed. It scales down the amount of motorboat use in a way that does justice to the area's designation as this Nation's only lakeland canoeing wilderness. It continues the ban on snowmobiles promulgated by the Department of Agriculture in 1976. These steps go a long way toward guaranteeing that our children's children will be able to enjoy and learn from one of our country's most unique natural treasures. This is needed legislation that I feel deserves our support.●

● Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, in supporting the Fraser-Vento-Nolan substitute, I wish to make one point in particular. That is, the version which goes as far as is practicable in preserving quietness in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, in my judgment deserves support. The Fraser-Vento-Nolan bill does that.

The area we are dealing with is a canoeing area, not a motorboat or a snowmobile area. These latter two means of conveyance are noisy, no question about that. Minnesota rightly boasts of being the land of 10,000 lakes. It seems to me a few hundred of these lakes should be preserved against the noisy intrusion of motors, leaving the remaining 9,000 and more for motorboats in the summer and snowmobiles in the winter. Furthermore, this is the only area in the whole country set aside exclusively for canoeing.

Canoeing is a quiet activity, almost noiseless for the expert. Raucous noise such as that created by gasoline motors is altogether inconsistent with the essence of canoeing recreation which is soft, hushed, contemplative, and soothing to the nerves. Even in white-water canoeing, such as may be enjoyed in streams connecting the many lakes in the BWCA, there is relative quiet except for the noise of the rushing water.

I have been canoeing in this marvelously beautiful area many times. Its stillness is a major part of its charm. I can remember paddling a few hundred yards off from shore at dusk and listening to the echoes that resound off the low hills that surround many of the lakes. The tapping of a finger on the side of a canoe will produce an echo as will the snapping of one's fingers or even the clicking of one's teeth. That is how still it is. At such a time a few ducks taking off from the water will sound like 100. An outboard motor in such a setting would be incongruous and deafening, a totally unwelcome intrusion. Somewhere in this country, not too difficult to get to, there have to be a few places of such stillness.

Well, there are other, more weighty reasons for preferring the version of this bill which cuts back on noise. But this is the aspect I wish to emphasize. It is not unimportant when you stop to think about it.●

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, several points have been raised during today's debate on H.R. 12250 that must be answered and clarified. I believe that such a clarification will be most useful for my colleagues in their deliberations.

It has been stated that motorboats do not have any harmful impacts on the lakes within the BWCA. This statement is inaccurate and must be corrected. The lakes of the BWCA are very sensitive and vulnerable to pollution because of their natural chemical characteristics, high quality water, and the characteristics of their surrounding watersheds. At this point in time, the lakes have been able to assimilate the pollutants discharged by motorboats and motor canoes. However, as the demand for outdoor recreation opportunities increase, so will the use of motorboats in the BWCA dramatically increase. Currently in the BWCA there exists no system for controlling the number of boats that can have access to a given lake. On some of the more popular lakes, lines of speedboats already wait to be launched and these lines will grow longer each year unless some restrictions are imposed. In May of 1977, the Minnesota congressional delegation, led by the late Senator Humphrey, wrote to the Department of Agriculture regarding the status of the BWCA and potential impacts on its use, quality, and future. Included in the questions that were asked was "What is the suitability of water routes and aquatic life in the BWCA for travel by canoe and motorized craft?" I think that it is appropriate at this time to read excerpts of Dr. Cutler's response:

> Motorized water travel, by either canoe or boat, could have a greater potential impact on lakes than does paddle canoe travel. Pollution results from spillage, exhaust emissions, and direct discharge of unburned gas and oil into the water by outboard motors. Outboard motors commonly waste 10–20 percent of their fuel by discharging it directly into water through the exhaust system. Although this wasted fuel has the potential for creating impacts in the sensitive water no effects on water quality have been measured to date on motorized routes in the BWCA. Lakes and streams have an assimilative capacity to withstand pollution up to a point, and apparently motorized use on most of the routes has been within, or has not significantly exceeded this assimilative capacity. Thus, motorized use at current levels has not had a measurable amount of impact on water to date. However, it should be noted that intensive investigations of this potential problem have not been conducted on these lakes.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, America has been fortunate that the lack of proper precaution has not destroyed the pristine qualities of the lakes of the BWCA. Only the hitherto limited motorboat use within the BWCA has prevented measurable degradation of the water quality. But we can no longer leave such matters to fate, Congress must act quickly to correct this potential destructive force. Urgency is a key factor in our deliberations. The water temperature and the terrain of this region make assimilation of pollutants a slow process. The city of Ely has one of the most complex tertiary treatment systems in our country. Because of the conditions of the water, biodegradation is a slow process and the capacity of the lakes to assimilate pollutants is much lower than warmer lakes throughout the country. Unless Congress acts to protect the BWCA, the threat to the lakes throughout the area will become a very real possibility.

Motorboats and motorcanoes also pose a threat to the waterfowl that nest in the BWCA. Large populations of loons and eagles use the BWCA as their nesting ground and recent studies seem to indicate that motorized disturbances have a disruptive influence on nesting patterns. As the Department of Agriculture letter of July 1, 1977, states:

> Motorized travel may have an adverse impact on the nesting success of loons and eagles. Both are common to the BWCA. A recent study suggests that loon nesting success is higher on paddle-only routes than on motor routes. In addition, research has demonstrated adverse impacts on bald eagle nesting due to disturbances caused by snowmobiles and other motorized use during the nesting season.

Much attention has been paid to the availability of the BWCA for handicapped and senior citizens. In considering this issue, we must emphasize how best to allow senior citizens and the handicapped to participate in the wilderness experience offered by the BWCA. In a June 2, 1978, resolution, the Minnesota State Council for the Handicapped stated:

> Therefore be it resolved, that the Minnesota State Council for the Handicapped advocates for the inclusion in any legislation and/or regulations governing the BWCA, specific recognition of, and the allowance for reasonable accommodation to, the needs of persons with disabilities.

Be it further resolved that any legislation pending on the BWCA, direct the appropriate regulatory agency, in consultation with persons having disabilities and/or organizations representing them, including but not limited to the Minnesota State Council for the Handicapped, to incorporate within the management plan and policies, guidelines which will support participation in the wilderness experience by persons who are disabled while maintaining the wilderness environment. (Emphasis added.)

Only in H.R. 12250 is this goal accomplished. By designating motorized and nonmotorized peripheral lakes, the House offers the handicapped equal opportunities to enjoy the BWCA. For those who wish to use motorboats, a large portion of the water within the BWCA remains open to motorized use. For those who wish to enjoy a canoe wilderness experience without the disruptions of motorboats and the difficulties of portaging, some peripheral lakes will now be available for their use.

This bill also directs the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a program to expand the outdoor recreation opportunities for the disabled. Such a program has long been needed and I am proud to see it incorporated into this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that these clarifications will help my colleagues in their deliberations.●

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank God that the Committee on Rules allowed only 2 hours instead of 20 for general debate, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, it shall be in order to consider the amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 31, 1978, by Representative OBERSTAR of Minnesota if offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill.

The Clerk will read.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that it is necessary and desirable to provide for the protection, enhancement, and preservation of the natural values of the lakes, waterways, and associated forested areas known (before the date of enactment of this Act) as the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, and for the orderly management of public use and enjoyment of that area, primarily as wilderness, and of certain contiguous lands and waters, while at the same time protecting the special qualities of the area as a natural forest-lakeland wilderness ecosystem of major esthetic, cultural, scientific, and educational value to the Nation.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. OBERSTAR

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. OBERSTAR: Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that it is necessary to provide for orderly management of the lakes, waterways, and associated forested areas known as the Boundary Waters Canoe Area (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the BWCA) so as the provide for the widest public use and enjoyment of the area, primarily as wilderness, and to assure protection of the area's primitive character.

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to provide for such measures respecting the BWCA as will—

(1) maintain high water quality in such area, and protect against chemical degradation.

(2) protect the natural character and environmental quality of lakes, streams, shorelines in such area,

(3) assure access to such area by all Americans, including senior citizens and the handicapped,

(4) prevent the exploitation of mineral resources throughout the area,

(5) provide for the optimum management of fish and wildlife in such area and enhance the recreational enjoyment of such resources, including fishing and hunting,

(6) prevent further road development throughout the area, and restore existing roads in the area to a natural condition.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall administer the BWCA in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the Wilderness Act, and in accordance with other laws, rules, and regulations generally applicable to areas designated as wilderness, except that any reference to motorboats in section (4)(d)(1) of the Wilderness Act shall not apply to the BWCA.

(b) Paragraph (5) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act is hereby repealed and paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) of such section 4(d) are hereby redesignated as paragraphs (5), (6), and (7).

SEC. 4. (a) The use of motorboats and snowmobiles shall be permitted by the Secretary in the areas within the BWCA designated for such use on the map entitled "Motor Recreation Zones—Boundary Waters Canoe Area" dated April 1978. The use of motorboats and snowmobiles under this subsection shall be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) In administering the areas in which the use of motorboats is permitted under subsection (a), the Secretary shall not impose any horsepower limitation on outboard motors which are ten horsepower or less except that in the case of the following lakes, the Secretary shall impose no horsepower limitation on outboard motors which are twenty-five horsepower or less:

Trout.
Lac La Croix.
Fall.
Newton.
Brasswood.
Moose.
Newfound.
Birch.
Sucker.
Snowbank.
Saganaga.
Seagull.
Brule.
East Bearskin.
Clearwater.
Pine.

(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to provide that mechanical portages necessary to serve motor routes permitted in the BWCA shall not be permitted to remain in operation.

(d) In establishing limitation on outboard motors used on canoe towboats and utility boats, the Secretary shall consider—

(A) the size of any lake on which any such boat primarily wil be used, and

(B) the size of any motor necessary to provide towing or utility service.

SEC. 5. (a) In addition to any other applicable prohibition or withdrawal from entry or appropriation under any provision of the Wilderness Act or under any other provision of law, no permit, lease or other authorization may be issued by any agency or authority of the United States for—

(1) exploration for, or mining of, minerals owned by the United States within the BWCA; or

(2) the use of land owned by the United States in relation to any mining or exploration for minerals in the BWCA.

The prohibitions contained in this subsection and any withdrawal from entry or appropriation for mining or exploration for minerals applicable to the BWCA shall not apply to the extent specifically provided in legislation enacted by the United States after the date of enactment of this Act pursuant to a national emergency declared by the President.

(b) The provisions of paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act (78 Stat. 890; 16 U.S.C. 1133d(5)) shall not apply to the BWCA.

(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed to acquire any minerals or mineral rights alleged to be owned by persons other than the Federal or State governments in the following manner—

(1) The Secretary first shall seek to acquire these minerals or mineral rights by donation. In seeking a donation, the Secretary shall inform the person alleging the ownership interest of the procedures and limitations to be followed in acquisition by purchase as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) If the person alleging the ownership interest does not donate his minerals or mineral rights to either the Federal or State governments, the Secretary shall acquire the rights by purchase, within the limits of funds appropriated for land acquisition in the Superior National Forest, and in an amount appropriately discounted for the following factors existent in relation to the particular mineral interest:

(A) The original patenting from the Federal public domain was fraudulent. The patenting of lands in the BWCA is prima facie fraudulent if (i) the Act under which the patent was issued was one of the Acts intended to put settlers on the land, such as, but without limitation, the Cash Purchase Act of 1820 (chapter LI, Act of April 24, 1820, 3 U.S. Stat. 566, 567, as amended); the Preemption Act of 1830 (chapter CCVIII, Act of May 29, 1830, 4 U.S. Stat. 420, 421, as amended); the Homestead Act of 1862 (chapter LXXV, Act of May 20, 1862, 12 U.S. Stat. 392–394, as amended); and the Timber and Stone Act (chapter 150, Act of June 3, 1878, 20 U.S. Stat. 88, 89, as amended, particularly by chapter 375, Act of August 4, 1892, 27 U.S. Stat. 348); and (ii) the land was patented after 1875 and before the establishment of the Superior National Forest by proclamation on February 13, 1909. The Secretary also shall consider any other evidence of fraud when determining the values of the minerals such as (i) the transfer by the entryman or patentee of whole or partial interests in the property during the patenting process or soon thereafter, (ii) the appearance in the chain of title of persons known to have participated in land speculation as land brokers, entrymen, or in other capacities.

(B) The date of separation of the mineral or mineral rights from the surface interest, if the separation occurred after 1927, the year when the courts have determined, that the roadless policy was established by the Secretary for the area.

(C) Any other factor, such as restrictions on mining within the area imposed by State or local government, or by operation of treaty.

(3) In the event any legal action or proceeding arises in relation to minerals or mineral rights where the patenting is prima facie fraudulent, the Secretary shall assert his right to constructive or public trusts or to recover money damage for the land acquired through fraud.

(e) Notwithstanding any requirement of this section, the Secretary shall have authority to acquire within the BWCA, existing mineral interests by donation, purchase, exchange or through exercise of the power of eminent domain.

(f) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary such sums as may be required to carry out the purposes of this section, to be available until expended.

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary is directed to terminate, as of the date of enactment of this Act, all timber harvesting in the BWCA whether under contracts in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act or otherwise. Immediately following the date of the enactment of this Act the Secretary shall act expeditiously to remove from the BWCA all structures, bridges, culverts, debris, and other human impacts associated with logging and take such similar ameliorative measures as he may deem necessary in order to facilitate the reforestation of cutover areas, the obliteration of roads, and other disturbed areas.

(b)(1) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Interior are directed to replace the softwood timber withdrawn from production under subsection (a) with softwood timber sale contracts on other Federal lands in Minnesota which are available for timber harvesting, at competitive prices, and comparable in species, species mix, volume, accessibility, and economic operability. The substitute timber shall be located within the eighteen Minnesota counties of Aitkin, Becker, Beltrami, Carlton, Cass, Clearwater, Cook, Crow, Wing, Hubbard, Itasca, Koochiching, Lake, Lake of the Woods, Mahnomen, Pine, Roseau, Saint Louis, and Wadena. In replacing softwood timber under this paragraph, the Secretary shall insure the replacement of equivalent amounts of saw timber as near as practicable to the sawmill locations existing on the date of enactment of this Act. For purposes of this Act, the annual allowable softwood yield of lands withdrawn from timber production under subsection (a) shall be deemed to be forty-seven thousand cords, not to include more than five thousand five hundred cords balsam fir.

(2) The United States shall pay just compensation for any timber contracts terminated under subsection (a), consistent with amendment V of the Constitution of the United States. Losses due to costs incurred in directly fulfilling the terms of such contracts shall be paid by the United States. Any action for the recovery from the United States of costs as provided above shall be brought in a court of competent junrisdiction. Any such judgments shall be paid from the claims and judgments fund (31 U.S.C. 724a) no later than one year after the filing of such judgments.

(c)(1) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Interior, in consultation and cooperation with the State of Minnesota, are authorized and directed to implement a program of intensive forest management within the Superior National Forest and on other Federal lands available for timber production within the eighteen counties referred to in subsection (b)(1) for the purpose of replacing softwood timber withdrawn from production under subsection (a), consistent with the existing applicable laws and regulations. Such program shall be designed to immediately enable such lands to produce a sustained yield of softwood timber equivalent to the 1976 softwood timber yield from such forest and other lands plus forty-seven thousand cords of softwood, not to include more than five thousand five hundred cords balsam fir.

(2) The forty-seven thousand cords amount referred to in paragraph (1) may be reduced in any year by an amount equal to the number of cords of softwood timber which is—

(A) available in such year at competitive prices, in comparable species, species mix, volume, accessibility, and economic operability from lands owned by the State of Minnesota, and

(B) in excess of the 1976 annual timber production from lands owned by the State of Minnesota.

(d) In administering the Superior National Forest, the Secretary is authorized and directed to engage in planting, direct seeding, natural regeneration, release, site conversion, and site preparation.

(e) The Secretary is authorized to employ twenty additional employees (including not less than one hardwood utilization and marketing expert) at levels on the General Schedule not in excess of level 16 and not below level 5 for purposes of administration of the Superior National Forest.

(f)(1) There is authorized to be appropriated $12,000,000 for each of the five fiscal years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act for the purpose of fulfilling the requirements of subsection (c) as it relates to lands in the Superior National Forest in Minnesota. Of such amount, not less than $2,000,000 shall be used for road development for each such fiscal year, not less than $1,000,000 shall be used for timber stand improvement (including release, thinning, and pruning) for each such fiscal year, and not less than $1,000,000 shall be used for reforestation for each such fiscal year. Any of the amounts specified in this paragraph not appropriated in any fiscal year shall remain available for appropriation in subsequent fiscal years.

(2) In addition to amounts authorized under paragraph (1), there is authorized to be appropriated $3,000,000 for each of the five fiscal years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act to be used for grants to the State of Minnesota for the development of the commercial softwood timber base on State lands in Cook, Lake, Koochiching, Saint Louis, and Carlton counties in the State of Minnesota. Not more than 80 per centum of the cost of such development shall be paid from amounts made available under this subsection. The State of Minnesota is authorized to use any portion of the amounts available from the United States under this subsection for assistance to such counties to assist such counties in the development of commercial softwood timber production on lands owned by such counties.

SEC. 7. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the State with respect to fish and wildlife in the BWCA.

SEC. 8. Nothing in this Act shall affect the jurisdiction as established by law of any governmental authority over any waters included in the BWCA.

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall cooperate with the State of Minnesota, any political subdivision thereof, or both in the administration of the BWCA and in the administration and protection of lands within or adjacent to the BWCA owned or controlled by the State or any political subdivision thereof. Nothing in this Act shall deprive the State of Minnesota or any political subdivision thereof of its right to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction within BWCA and impose land use controls and environmental health standards on non-Federal areas within the BWCA or of its right to tax persons, corporations, franchises, or other non-Federal property, including mineral or other interests, in or on lands or waters within the BWCA.

SEC. 10. The Secretary is authorized and directed to develop a program of dispersed outdoor recreation in the BWCA. The Secretary shall consider, in developing such program, the need for additional lake access sites and parking facilities outside of the BWCA to provide more widely dispersed access for canoe use of the BWCA, especially with respect to lightly used canoe routes.

SEC. 11. Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of any treaty now applicable to lands and waters which are included in the BWCA.

SEC. 12. The provisions of Executive Order 10092, dated December 17, 1949, establishing an airspace reservation over certain areas of the Superior National Forest, are hereby incorporated into this Act.

SEC. 13. Nothing in this Act or the Wilderness Act shall be construed to prohibit the maintenance of the Prairie Portage Dam (on the international boundary chain between Birch and Basswood Lakes), and the Secretary is authorized to perform such maintenance work as may be required to keep that dam functional at its present height and width. Dams or other impoundments which are in existence within the BWCA on the date of the enactment of this Act on any waterway within the BWCA may be maintained or replaced as the Secretary deems necessary to preserve the wilderness character of the area.

SEC. 14. All authorizations for funds to be appropriated under the terms of this Act shall not be effective until October 1, 1978. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act, authority to enter into agreements or to make payments under this Act shall be effective only to the extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

Mr. OBERSTAR (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment in the nature of a substitute.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, after the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) completes his remarks, it will be in order then to offer a substitute amendment for the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR); is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a proper substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute would be in order.

The gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the amendment in the nature of a substitute which I offer at this point brings us down to the final issue in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area dispute, one that has extended over the past 75 years, going back to the turn of the century when that area was first reserved by a great Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt, who set aside 1,000 square miles of border country which later became the Superior National Forest and out of which was carved the 1,000 square miles we are discussing today, the Boundary Waters Canoe Area.

This area has loudly been proclaimed as the Nation's last and only canoe wilderness country, and it is a great and beautiful canoe country.

But that statement is made in some sense as if to say that the people of the area, who live there, the people who use motorboats, are going to do some harm to it. That reflects badly on my constituents. That reflects upon the people and their custodianship of that beautiful country. They have used and managed it well and wisely and responsibly. Their livelihoods depend on it. Their lifestyle, their way of life, is inextricably linked to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area. It is not exactly as if there were no other places to go canoeing in the State of Minnesota.

The Minneapolis Star newspaper reported last week on all of the charted canoe areas in Minnesota. There are lots of areas all over the State, including right down the Saint Croix, a wild and scenic river, for canoeing, as the Interior Committee set aside for canoeing some years ago. "Canoeing fun on the Cottonwood," it says. There are even some uncharted canoe routes. You can canoe all over the State if you want to canoe. You can canoe for 800 miles in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area if you want to canoe. There is plenty of room to be undisturbed by motorboaters. All the people of my district are asking for is a little piece of that area, just a little piece of it for themselves.

In one county, 25 percent of the total revenue generated in that county is dependent upon the resort industry. It is dependent upon motor access to the boundary waters canoe area. Only 6 percent of that county's 900,000 acres is open to private development. All of the rest of its is either in Federal or State or county ownership. Ninety-four percent of the 900,000 acres is in public ownership. Six percent is in private ownership. And now they want to take away the rest of it. Oh, yes, there is a provision in this bill for a buyout. But if you shut out motor access to the area, as the committee does, you can force the Government to buy your resort, under a provision of the committee bill. What do you get? The Government does not give you anything for the "goodwill" you have built up in your business. You have worked at your business all of your life. Many businesses have been in the same family for three generations. There is a whole lifetime tied up in that resort. Then the Government comes along and gives a fair market value price, if you get that. There is one person who is today fighting a BWCA acquisition battle that has lasted over 15 years. We are going to have more court cases like that over a longer period of time if the committee bill passes. And then they say, in that bill, "Well, we have got a little provision that will help the resorts. We will train them to do something else. We will take away your means of making a livelihood, but we will give you a training program." Maybe they will put them on CETA, or some on-the-job training, making hulahoops, or something. Nonsense.

Mr. Chairman, this is my district. These are my people. There has not been a new industry located up on the north shore in 15 years. There will not be any in the future if we shut off motor use in the BWCA. There has not been a new industry located in the city of Ely in 15 years, and there will not be if we wipe out the resorts and wipe out the outfitters. We will shut down the whole town. Many resorts have already lost 40 percent of their business because they cannot use snowmobiles in the winter months.

We have heard a little bit about newspaper editorials and polls in today's debate. The greatest poll is the one that happens in the voting booth. The most reliable poll is the one that happens when the people in the area speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. OBERSTAR) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. OBERSTAR was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the people who live up there are little people. We have eliminated the extractive industry, we have eliminated the consumptive industry, the wood fiber industry, from this area. The BWCA has been managed in the past as a two-zone area. My bill will eliminate the two-zone concept and make the whole BWCA a wilderness. Yet, we are going to give up 25 percent of the existing motorized lakes to be used exclusively for canoe zones.

The people of this area work in the iron ore mines and taconite plants. If they have 2 days off and they want to go out and fish, this committee bill says, "You cannot do that. Get in your car and go to some other place, away from where you live, and go fish there." So a group of steelworkers met with one of my colleagues recently and he explained this proposition, our committee bill.

They rejected the proposal and wrote this statement:

> We, the undersigned, remain in favor of the Oberstar bill concerning the B.W.C.A. issue in Northern Minnesota. The Burton bill is a class discrimination policy, which due to year-around vacation scheduling, would bar our members from the B.W.C.A. Traditionally this has been our recreation area. It also discriminates against the retired members.

The statement is signed by the presidents of numerous Steelworkers locals of northern Minnesota, representing 15,000 members and their families. That statement is their policy. They are opposed to a no-motor wilderness.

This matter of who is going to use this pristine area or whether it is to be locked up as though it was going to be destroyed is absolute nonsense. It has been used with motors for the last 60 years, and the Forest Service monitors the water quality constantly. There is no adverse effect on the water from motor use.

The main issue is whether the people who live there, whose lives and livelihoods depend on that land, are going to be able to use it in a responsible way, in a sensible way; and I hope my colleagues will allow them to use it in the way that I have designed in my bill, which I think is a responsible proposal.

I urge your vote for my substitute.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VENTO AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. OBERSTAR

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VENTO as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. OBERSTAR:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following new text in lieu thereof:

FINDINGS

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that it is necessary and desirable to provide for the protection, enhancement, and preservation of the natural values of the lakes, waterways, and associated forested areas known (before the date of enactment of this Act) as the Boundary Waters Canoe Area, and for the orderly management of public use and enjoyment of that area, primarily as wilderness, and of certain contiguous lands and waters, while at the same time protecting the special qualities of the area as a natural forest-lakeland wilderness ecosystem of major esthetic, cultural, scientific, and educational value to the Nation.
